New Books on

Christ in Today's Life

In the amazingly puzzling times in which men find themselves today, there is no fact of greater significance, or more hope-radiating, than that thoughtful men are turning for guidance to the great Teacher and Master. New book catalogs bristle with striking titles which point to Him who alone can lead men out of darkness into light. The Christian Century Press has selected the following as really great books. All of them endeavor to see Jesus, not merely as a hero of the first century, but as the true leader for men and nations in this twentieth century.

Jesus and Life

By Joseph F. McFadyen, D.D.

A fresh and searching interpretation of the Gospel of Jesus in its social implications. The author, who is professor of New Testament in Queen's University, Kingston, Canada, says in his preface: "We are realizing as never before that the christianizing of men, of all men, in their relations is not so much a matter of interest to the church as a matter of life and death for the world." ($2.00).

The Guidance of Jesus for Today

By Cecil John Cadoux, D.D.

This book is an account of the teaching of Jesus from the standpoint of modern personal and social need. Says Canon James Adderley: "It recalls by a shock to the bewildering problem of applied Christianity and makes us once more suitably uncomfortable. I want everybody to read it." ($2.00).

The Open Light

By Nathaniel Micklem, M.A.

This interpretation of Christianity by one of England's younger Christian thinkers takes its title from William Morris's lines, "Looking up, at last we see the glimmer of the open light, from o'er the place where we would be." The author says: "I hope this book may help to make Christianity appear more reasonable and more beautiful." ($2.00).

Christianity and Christ

By William Scott Palmer.

"Twelve years ago," says Dr. Palmer in his introductory note, "I was profoundly influenced by the critical examination of Christian documents and of Christian origins, by science generally and by the new movement in philosophy. I felt impelled to revise my religious beliefs. It was a kind of stocktaking, and took the form of a diary, now long out of print. Many trials have come upon the Christian religion and the church since then. It seems to be time for a new stock-takng on my part; and I propose to write a new diary and in it ask my new questions and find, perhaps, new answers." Dr. Palmer is author of "Where Science and Religion Meet." ($2.00).

Studies in the Inner Life of Jesus

By Principal A. E. Garvie, D.D.

This is not a new book, but a new edition of a very great book by the noted head of New College, London. The Congregationalist says of the book: "Its chief value is in its emphatic insistence upon the genuineness of the human experience of Jesus, coupled with the constant acceptance of the uniqueness of his nature as the only-begotten and well-loved Son of God." ($3.00).

Note: Add 10 cents for postage on each book ordered.

Here is a fine library of books on the greatest possible theme. Their possession and study will insure a fruitful year for any churchman or churchwoman.

The Continued Tragedy of Expatriated Armenians

TWENTY thousand Armenians, refugees from their homes in Asia Minor, are today trying to get on their feet again in Syria. Their story is a tragic one. The war drove them from their homes, breaking up families and destroying property and livelihood, as well as causing innumerable deaths. Of a typical group of 5,500 from Marash only 27 reached Adana in Cilicia. But the ones who did reach shelter set to work to found homes. They borrowed money, toiled eagerly, and within two years attained self-support. And people of that very type, coming from all over Asia Minor, were the ones who gave their mites to help new refugees as they came in. In this way 300 girls rescued from harem slavery about New Years of 1920, and put into pitiful refugee camps outside Adana, the only habitation available, were supported as long as necessary by the gifts of the earlier arrivals. So they lived and improved their condition, and the sun was beginning to rise for them once more, when the French decided to give up the Cilician mandate which they had demanded, and to substitute for it an economic treaty with the Turks. Once again disaster almost overwhelmed the Armenians. Loans were called in, business dropped to a practical standstill, and panic gripped the men and women who knew that the Turks would bring massacre to this Christian population who had once escaped. So a second time everything had to be given up, and something like 75,000 refugees rushed from Cilicia to the coast, at Mersine and Alexandretta, hoping to escape by ship. But ships were few and the lands willing to welcome such immigrants fewer still. Weeks passed before the French finally aided in the evacuation of the country, and made it possible for broken families to escape. And it is 20,000 of these people who are now in Syria, starting again. They find the cities of Syria already overcrowded, both by refugees from outside and by Syrians who were driven from the mountains during the war. They find a majority of the people opposed to the French mandate in Syria, and equally opposed to the influx of Armenians under French protection. And they find the high prices and hard times which are prevalent in most parts of the world. The country districts in which the French would locate them are unsafe because of the Arab-Syrian dislike of alien intrusion. With hardly any possessions beyond the very clothes on their backs the position of these hapless homeseekers could hardly be more appealing; yet such is their ability and grit that all but three thousand, including many children, are entirely supporting themselves, and those who have not found work are asking for only the minimum help that will keep them alive. A missionary in Syria writes that he never saw such magnificent determination and recuperative power in the face of apparent disaster. It is another proof that this oldest and staunchest Christian nation deserves the help America is giving and the opportunity for rehabilitation.

Genoa, Jerusalem and Christian Unity

DR. JOWETT has proposed a Christian Genoa at which the leading churchmen of the world shall meet and at least arrange a sectarian truce. Such a gathering would do no harm, and as little good. The tragedy of both Genoa and Geneva is that the same Holland, Britain, Italy, France and Russia, having the same mind as before, make negotiation unfruitful; and the same would be true of the churches. What is needed is a better mind, more insight, more sympathy, more appreciation. The new Lambeth report on Christian unity, signed by the archbishops and Dr. J. D. Jones, reminds us of Bunyan's "Mr. Anything." Dr. Glover writes a stinging criticism in which he says, "The document represents out-classed scholarship and old-style thinking; it is conventional, sentimental, diplomatic.

It is bad for a future church to rest deliberately on bad thinking and superannuated scholarship." Surely, if we are to achieve a Christian unity worth having, it will be realized, not by the bargain and dicker of venerable ecclesiastics, but by forgetting the hair-splitting distinctions about which men made so much ado in other days, and learning to do the things which Jesus told us to do—feed the hungry, clothe the naked, open the eyes of the blind, set at liberty the captives, and preach the gospel to the poor. What we need is not apostolic succession, but a succession of apostles—a Christian leadership that shall express and interpret the pent-up yearnings of the people for a more heroic Christianity; setting the Christ spirit and word as the standard of the new world. Not Genoa, not Geneva, but Jerusalem is the hope of mankind!

When Did Commencement High-Jinks Commence?

FROM all over the land have come laments that college commencements are no longer worthily observed, and that the grotesque costumes, caperings and wild revelry on the part of young people today are tokens of decay of a sense of law and order and decorum. To all this a writer in the New York Times opposes the facts about the good old days about which we hear so much and know so little. He tells how the first Harvard commencement, in 1642, was marked by hilarious levity—even when there were no "old grads" to blame—and that John Winthrop complained to the governor against the ribaldry of it all. Two generations later the conditions had not improved, and Samuel Sewall writes in commendation of a sermon "against excess in commencement entertainments." Cotton Mather, not celebrated for his high spirits, was much put out in 1717 about commencement frivolity, which he described as "time sorrily enough thrown away." If these glimpses of the days of old should diminish somewhat our zeal for returning thereto, they may at least show us that we are not so near gone to the dogs as we had imagined. If the commencement season is gladsome and full of frolic, let us thank God that it was born that way.

Prison Yawns For a British Jingoist

SEVEN years in penal servitude is the reward which Great Britain has given one of her loudest exponents of patriotism. Horatio Bottomley has been for a number of years editor of John Bull. This was the red rag of super-patriotism in the British isles, corresponding in its tone in large measure to some of the journals owned by William Randolph Hearst in this country. Each week all the inflammatory things that were obtainable were put in this paper which boasted itself not only of its loyalty to the empire, but on the restriction of its loyalty to the empire. Mr. Bottomley is going to prison not for his patriotic views, but for the embezzlement of three quarters of a million dollars. Some of the money he has paid back since he fell into trouble, but all of it he could not pay. He had the effrontery in his trial to plead his patriotism as an extenuating circumstance. He is an outstanding example of a type of citizen which is to be found on both sides of the water. Their sort of patriotism is a matter of flag-waving. They urge enlistment in war time, and bond-buying and food conservation. But at the same time they are trying to get a corner on food products, and are not above a good slice of graft on government contracts. Some of our people still think there is some connection between patriotism and obedience to the law. They feel that patriotism ought to involve unselfish conduct in times of great national emergency. The truest patriot is not the one who professes the greatest hatred toward some enemy, potential or actual. One may truly love his native land, but see his nation's destiny in terms of service to the holy cause of civilization. It is a pity that the American courts have not yet gained custody of our jingoists and buccaneers. In most communities of any size one can point to men who hang out the flag on the Fourth of July but collect graft whenever they can find it. These are usually ready for war at the drop of the hat for that makes the graft come easier.

Forecasting the Church Program

WHEN the Comity Commission of the Chicago Church Federation on a recent occasion called in Mr. E. Thurston of the Chicago Telephone Company to speak on the future developments of Chicago, they were taking advantage of the wisdom of this world which now underlies the policies of all the great public service corporations of the city.. These corporations in order not to waste money, must be able to anticipate the growth of the city in specific directions, and keep ahead of such growth. Mr. Thurston in speaking to the ministers gave his sober estimate of Chicago's population from the standpoint of a big corporation that must provide telephones for many new sections of the city now only beginning to be built. He asserts that in 1940 Chicago will be a city of four million people. That is to say, in eighteen years a million people will be added to the present population. The comity commission of the church Federation is desirous of using all the knowledge of these big corporations in order to anticipate the church needs of the city. If we allow only one church to each two thousand of population the new million will require in the next eighteen years five hundred new churches, Protestant and Catholic. Many smaller denominations which have been seeking places in the city where they need not be competitive can find in these new sections an opportunity to organize their churches. A few larger denominations will pre-empt most of the territory, however. If ever there was need of Christian unity it is in the planting of these new churches. Chicago has a cooperative council of city missions made up of representatives of the city mission societies of five denominations. It also has the comity commision of the Church Federation which includes all the evangelical bodies of the city. With this double-headed comity program, it will be impossible to meet the challenge of the new situation which confronts the churches. What will happen no doubt as the religious needs of a million people are in some measure met

The Future of the Congregationalists

By Lynn Harold Hough

THIS article is not a study in Eschatology though the title might bear that interpretation. I suppose that since those far off sixteenth century days when Robert Browne lived and wrote and went up the hill of Congregationalism and then came down again to the fold of the Anglican church, as many kinds of people have professed and practiced the way of the Independents in ecclesiastical life as have entered the other denominational groups. One would doubtless need the larger hope in writing eschatalogically of the future of the members who have belonged to any of the great churchly groups. The diverting thing about discussing individuals in their churchly relationships is not only that there are as many kinds of them as there were varieties of beasts in the sheet of Peter's vision, but that so often they somehow fall into the wrong division. It is highly instructive to the student of ecclesiastical biography to find a man who was meant by nature to be a Jesuit high in the councils of Rome to have lived his life out in the Methodist Episcopal church or a man who was meant by the same token to have been a high church leader in a contemporary Anglican communion to be standing each Sunday in a Congregational pulpit. Perhaps in these curious ecclesiastical misplacements we come nearer to the reality of church union than we believe.

However this study must pass by the alluring field of speculation regarding individuals and deal with the class to which they belonged. For the purpose of this discussion we will follow the fashion of the realists of the middle ages and assume that the general is more real than the particular that the church is more significant than its members. If this seems the frankest flouting of a fundamental Congregational principle at the very beginning we must hasten to remind ourselves that there is and there has been a Congregational organism in spite of the fear of system which has characterized the group in all its history. It is true that Congregationalism has been a spirit rather than a highly articulated ecclesiastical organization. It is true that it has been an invisible ideal rather than a finished set of concepts. But the very central matter in all this is just that the Congregational thinker has contended that so you reach the only valid organism. This spirit and this ideal are the very means by which a group is made one with an eternal oneness. There is a wonderful organism but it is produced not by the mechanical union of antagonistic elements held together by artificial pressure. It is a union produced by the free movement of elements whose very principle of life unites them.

GREATNESS OF THE PAST

There is no doubting for a moment the significance, even the greatness, of the past of Congregationalism. In seventeenth century England the deepest notes sounded in the days of the commonwealth came from the inspiration of this group. And in seventeenth century America it was this spirit which poured into the life of the new world its most priceless elements. To quote a too frequently overlooked bit of Lowell:

> They were rude men unlovely, yes, but great,
> Who prayed about the cradle of our state.
> Small room for light and sentimental strains
> In those lean men with empires in their brains;
> Who their young Israel saw in vision clasp
> The mane of either sea in taming grasp;
> Who pitched a state as other men pitch tents,
> And led the march of time to great events.

It cannot be denied that on both sides of the sea the Congregational group had its share in the spiritual sterility which characterized the eighteenth century. With the nineteenth century better days came and looking over the whole period with a flashing glance many a notable figure emerges. To me at least two of them are the men of most outstanding significance. In England Robert William Dale, who for so many years was the minister of Carrs Lane Congregational church in Birmingham, was a man whose massive mind formed a meeting place for all that was noblest in the Congregational tradition and most full of hope in its aspiration. In America Horace Bushnell passed Congregational principles through the alembic of a personality from which they came forth glowing with new radiance and alive with new power.

FOUR PRINCIPLES

Four principles as I see it have kept playing through the thought and action of the Congregationalists. They have not been held in equal emphasis. Sometimes a great leader has lived in the light of a part of them and has already ignored the rest. There has been the most free and easy movement of their influence. When they have met in noble harmony all has been well with the Congregational group. When they have become confused and distorted all has been very far from well. All these are the principles. Or rather these are the passions. For they have been principles on fire with personal devotion when they have been most powerful. First, the passion for freedom; second, the passion for justice; third, the passion for the intellectual life; and fourth, the passion for the knowledge of God. The passion for freedom made these men Independents. It made them ready to be the founders of new states. The passion for justice was the inspiration back of much that occurred in the days of the commonwealth. It lived in the planning of the theocratic forms of government in New England. It has enabled Congregationalists to provide leaders in many a reform. It found dramatic expression when Henry Ward Beecher sold slave girls from Plymouth pulpit in order to give them their freedom and to rouse the conscience of the nation.

The passion for the intellectual life found characteristic expression in all the subtlety and keenness of the New England theology. It became a deep and abiding spirit inspiring ministers who were men of letters as well as ministers. It lifted the level of the intellectual life of America and produced in England a ministry which was almost an intellectual aristocracy. The passion for God ran so deeply and was expressed with such noble self-restraint that the attempt to locate examples of it is like the endeavor to photograph an atmosphere. But a study of the fashion in which a deepening and growing Christian experience dominated all the thought and feeling and activity of Horace Bushnell will give some suggestion of this profound and far reaching influence.

MODERN INTERPRETERS

In some respects Congregationalism was particularly well equipped to meet the transitions which the period immediately before us brought. The scientific view of life, the critical study of the documents upon which our religion rests for literary expression, the diffusion of the social passion found in men of this tradition welcoming and interpreting minds. It was not an accident that Dale had a notable share in making Birmingham the best governed city in England. It was not an accident that Washington Gladden became an authoritative interpreter of the social gospel. It was not an accident that Lyman Abbott helped to make the idea of evolution at home in the church. It was not an accident that Fairbairn became a masterly interpreter of the philosophy of the Christian religion. The richness and the variety of the Congregational life are revealed in the fact that as time went on the delicate and rare beauties of the inner life were given unsurpassed expression in the preaching and writing of J. H. Jowett, and the dialectical vigor of evangelical thought centering in the cross was put forth in the flashing sword play of Principal Peter T. Forsyth.

All the while some very interesting things were going on. With some men the intellectual interest clearly predominated. There was little of the richness of the inner life, or if richness a rarified and intellectualized quality which was nobly serene and lofty but rather far from the intense experiences of the common life. Dr. Gordon in a sense became the high priest of this section of the church. The opposite extreme was found in those who took mighty plunges into regions of hot and passionate rhetoric seizing the popular mind by constant dramatic flash and powder. Dr. Hillis made this type known everywhere in America. A certain intellectual stateliness, a wielding of a large brush upon a great canvass and the attempt to mobilize thoughts and currents of the mind and views of life on a vast and impressive scale characterized the preaching of Dr. S. Parkes Cadman who became in an unusual sense an evangelical humanist. There were men of wonderful heartiness and dash and open mindedness with a zest for religion and a constant capacity for comradeship like Dr. Nehemiah Boynton who created a highly useful and forceful type.

SECRET OF AMIEL

There were men who might have learned their secret of lonely brooding thought and of distinguished and vital expression from Amiel, and of these perhaps there is no better example than Dr. Gaius Glenn Atkins. There were apostles of rude and bustling efficiency who forgot the nobler traditions of Congregationalism in the rush of immediate activity and the desire for instant returns. We will name no representation of this group. There were men who caught a vivid and authentic vision of the great God and poured it forth in sentences tingling with energy and with spiritual vitality. Such an utterance is Dr. Albert Parker Fitch's "Preaching and Paganism." There were Congregational leaders who as if discouraged with preaching turned to a new emphasis upon worship. It is easy to find this note in the utterances of Dr. Boynton, Dr. Fitch and Dr. Cadman. These men have been referred to not so much as individuals as in order to indicate trends which they seem to typify and express. It all indicates vigorous life and energetic thought and ardent action. There are no end of other distinguished names which might be mentioned. Some of them are buzzing in the ears of the writer of this article at this very moment. But we will let the above characterizations stand for what they are worth and we will not add to them. We pass to the great question: What does it all indicate? Where is Congregationalism going? What further contributions is it to make to our religious life? In the remainder of this article as in the paragraphs which have immediately preceded we will confine ourselves generally to the situation and the outlook in America.

PERIOD OF READJUSTMENT

Congregationalism shares with all the rest of the churches the experience of unrest and readjustment and confusion which characterize the period in which we are living. There is interesting illustration of the way in which the leaders themselves are finding their way and taking up new positions or at least new points of emphasis from day to day in the contrasts which emerge when we compare Dr. Fitch's little brochure, "Can the Church Survive in the Changing Order?" with his Yale lectures on preaching to which we have already referred. It was one thing to be a Christian leader in the days of Herbert Spencer. It is another to be a Christian leader in the days of Einstein (not to mention Freud.) And no group of leaders feel the pressure more than the men of the Congregational communion. It is also true that there is a temptation in a time of unequalled mental hospitality to carry open mindedness to the place where a man wakes some morning to find that he has no major premise. And it can safely be asserted that just this has happened to some in the Congregational church. The opposite danger is to settle into an intellectual scholasticism which is the constant menace of a church which puts a great emphasis on the things of the mind.

And from this danger all living Congregational ministers I suppose cannot be said to have escaped. In all the churches some of the fine young bloods of the ministry are tempted to be so busy with the doing of the will of God that they forget that there is such a thing as communion with the God whose will one is trying to do. In the long run such young leaders awake to find religion a rather uninspired branch of social statistics. It is easy to see where Congregationalists may make mistakes. I think it is easy to see where some of them are making mistakes. Most of these mistakes are being made in other denominational groups as well for the lines dividing the men of light and leading in the various communities are not the sort of lines they once were. In any city you could organize a ministerial club of men who hate the critical study of the Bible and who fear every movement of the modern mind and another club of men who welcome each rebuff that turns the church's smoothness rough and hold the faith in glad freedom in the new day. And if you organized these clubs the lines which divided the men would not be denominational. A Congregational friend whispers in my ear that none of his group would belong to the club of obscurantists. I wonder if he is right?

The tendency upon the part of influential leaders of the Congregational body to put a new emphasis upon worship is a most interesting and significant thing. It will have many happy results. No doubt in the end it will make many services which have been hard and austere and barren warm and rich and beautiful. There is something almost disconcerting in the thought of Congregationalism speaking to the spirit through the senses, but I dare say it is quite likely to be. Only one thing ought carefully to be guarded. If a gracious and beautiful worship accompanies the noblest and most commanding preaching all will be well. But if the Congregational communion should ever come to the day when beautiful or even exquisite forms of worship take the place of the living word, and replace the emphasis upon the force of prophecy, a day of decadence and decay will indeed have come. And Congregationalism will have forgotten some of the most significant chapters of its history. I do not believe that such a day will ever come. But in all seriousness I would like to warn some of my Congregational brethren that while the aesthetic expression of religion is a most happy and legitimate supplement of its intellectual expression if the appeal to the taste ever takes the place of the appeal to the mind there will be the most fundamental moral loss.

TENDENCY TOWARD SYSTEM

I suppose that it is almost inevitable that as a Methodist I should say a word of the contrast between our highly articulated forms or organization and the fear of system to be found in the Congregational church, at least in so far as this contrast may be said to have a bearing on the future of the Congregationalists. There are not lacking indications that Congregational leaders are thinking with some seriousness of the advisability of some more definite articulation of their own ecclesiastical life. Perhaps one may be permitted to observe at this point that a closely knit organization is a very wonderful and also a very dangerous thing. If the spirit of life is in the wheels (as in the case of Ezekiel's vision) you have a very happy situation indeed. But if all the complex wheels become a substitute for vitality instead of the expression of vitality you have the sort of condition which made Emerson write in a mood of rare pessimism: "Things are in the saddle and ride mankind." As a matter of fact the only safety of Methodism lay in the fact that all of its intricate organization was the by-product of a wonderfully intense and mastering spiritual life. And even as it is I observe that some of our younger brethren are willing to admit if pressed that sometimes the wheels get in the way of the spirit. And it is not quite always those who have failed of some ecclesiastical recognition who say this. I do venture to believe that the Congregational churches will be able to work more effectively if their organization becomes a little more practical and complete. But this must be worked out in such a fashion as to preserve the historic freedom of the members of the group if there is not to be serious loss.

Already we have referred indirectly to the great revival which changed the aridity of the eighteenth century. It is most significant that both Dale and Bushnell were profoundly influenced by currents which came from the Great Revival. The emphasis of each of these powerful Congregational leaders was in a measure an inheritance from that movement. When one re-reads such a book as Dale's "Living Christ and the Four Gospels" he is arrested by its high note of spiritual reality. Here was a man who was a notable practical leader. He was a minister of the deepest social passion. He was a commanding dialectician. He was an expert in education. He was completely familiar with the processes of criticism as they had developed in his day. He was the master of a literary style which Sir William Robertson Nicoll has counted among the supreme achievements in expression in the use of our good old English speech. But you reach the real secret of Dale's power as you go back of all these things and stand with him in the hour of authentic awareness in respect of the things of the spirit. One moves very reverently in these sacred places. But one must say as much as this. Dale was a sure and creative leader because he had come to know that Christ is alive. The experience put new power into his thinking. It put new acumen into his criticism. It put new and perpetual energy into his social passion. With the same vision and the same manifold application of its meaning the Congregational churches of America and of all the world can meet the future with clear eyes and singing hearts and ready hands.

The Challenge of the Tillers

YE say to us, 'tis we who feed the world;
Ye give us loud enjoining of our task;
Ye scruple not the boon of boons to ask—
Our toil's allegiance to a flag unfurled.
Hear then our cry, in righteous anger hurled
Upon the easeful ones who blink and bask
Within the halls of greed, who wear the mask
Of truth, yet are as waiting adders curled:
How shall we serve ye if ye possess the land?
How long shall we be herded like the kine
With mete and bound and harsh dividing line?
Without the soil, what use the willing hand?
If then your words be aught but mouthings vain,
Restore our rightful heritage again!

RICHARD WARNER BORST.

Beethoven in the Back Yard

By Frederick F. Shannon

WHILE passing a certain house, my eyes rested upon a statue of Beethoven in the rear of it. At first I was keenly aware of the disharmony of the thing. Here was one of the immortal names in music; and here, also at the back of the house, and in a yard distinguished for nothing save the composer's head done in stone, was the silent, stony, majestic face of one whose very name is synonymous for moving melodies.

As already intimated, my first impression was a kind of mental discord, a feeling that the sense of fitness had been violated. But I hold that opinion no longer. Many times since have I gone past that house; each passing has tended to do away with the feeling of inappropriateness. Now, remembering the delight of seeing Beethoven in his back yard, I go out of my way for the pleasurable sensation of resting my eyes upon that materialized symphony in stone. There he sits, calmly looking out on his surroundings. He seems quietly determined to turn them all—the ugly and the beautiful, the chords and the discords—into rolling rhythms of harmony.

It may be that my inward change was wrought by the words of a quiet man to whom I unbosomed my original repulsion. "Discord!" he exclaimed, with scarcely any sign of exclamation in his convincing tones. "There's no discord at all. Beethoven needs the back yard; the back yard needs Beethoven; and we need both." Unable to forget the man's words, I have decided to set down some random reflections upon Master Beethoven in the back yard.

"Beethoven needs the back yard." Well, at any rate the master was acquainted with the back yard of things long before anybody dreamed of chiseling him in stone. His father was a drunkard; his mother was the daughter of a cook—which is recalled, in this connection, just to remind ourselves what glorious things proceed from the kitchen; he was deaf before middle life; he endured the stupidity of a churlish brother. What a delicious story is that of this brother calling upon the composer and leaving his card worded thus:

JOHANN VAN BEETHOVEN,
LAND PROPRIETOR.

On returning home the musician found the card, wrote the following words on the opposite side, and sent it back to his pompously stupid kinsman:

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN,
BRAIN PROPRIETOR.

One might indefinitely extent the list of ugly back yards through which the mighty genius was doomed to pass in his pilgrimage across the years. There were jealous teachers; there were designing women; there was that scapegoat of a nephew; there were kinglets and princelets and—well, so many glorious and inglorious obstacles in his way that it is simply enchanting to stand at a meaningful historic distance and see him overleap them.

On the whole, therefore, I think, with my deep-seeing friend, that Beethoven needed the back yard. How much did life's back yard have to do in lending the deathless note into his compositions? Having asked that question we are thrust headlong into the mystery of human life. Not, if you please, human life in its celebrated expressions—not the Beethovens, nor the Shakespeares, nor the Lincolns only; but worthful, red-souled, clean-motived, high minded human life in its common, everyday, universal might and majesty.

Once I went to minister to a sick woman. There were miles and miles of gray stone to travel, reminding one of Thomson's "City of Dreadful Night." The house was not much, but it was artistically tidy, immaculate in its cleanliness, and occupied by two maiden sisters, who had fought with poverty, hardship, and menacing environment the long years through. And now one of them was desperately ill. But the well one—the one who was still struggling to keep the vanishing remainders of their home-life together—was not content to have a doctor and her own watchful love at her sister's beck and call, day and night. A trained nurse must also draw upon her scanty savings. Reminded that perhaps this was an unnecessary expense and that there were "rainy days" ahead for her, she said: "What are a few dollars to me, after my sister is gone?" With the going of her sister, a part of herself was being passed on also—a something which neither few dollars nor many could alter in the least.

THE POWER OF IMMORTAL RESERVE

Within that toiling woman's face there was a power of immortal reserve—a splendor, a radiance, a godlikeness—that one could well go far to see, and be handsomely overpaid at the end of his journey. What, for example, is "the light of setting suns" to the light of love that beamed in her patient eye? What is the fragrance of heliotropes to the aroma of self-forgetfulness distilled from her heart? What is the grandeur of mountain summits to the moral height of her unfaltering will? Unacquainted with the luxury of self-dispraise, as Wordsworth might say, she was so unconsciously and yet so nobly planned, that any soul having an appetite for what is finely beautiful could not possibly have missed it here in this bloomingly spiritual back yard.

"But there was nothing unusual in her unselfishness," the cynic may interpose. "Such cases are very common." And is not the cynic half right? At the same time, does not all half-rightness disclose the inexhaustible wonder of the wholly and holy right? It is even so here. For the unusualness of unselfishness could only truly be seen by its absence. Just let the world jog along a single day without these commonplace and usual tokens of goodwill, and at nightfall our planet would be conspicuous by reason of the enlarged area of hell upon it. Therefore, the deadly and deadening power of the familiar is to be shunned like a plague. The fact is, we have learned to call that something genius in people who can paint a halo around the brow of the ordinary. Is not this in itself sufficient proof that, beyond all cavil, there is really no ordinary; everything is extraordinary, as every perceptive and receptive nature thrillingly knows. It is just our ordinary, humdrum, non-vision of things that makes it possible for us to snub the back yard with its commanding Beethoven.

The reaches of our Lord and Master into this prolific realm are, of course, unparalleled. Christ's awareness of the living universe is immense. Anywhere and anytime he throws a window open toward the infinite. It is all the more impressive by the very economy of the words he employs in reporting his world-consciousness. Adjectives are not popular in the master's vocabulary. He is so perfectly alive that he seems fearful lest he should waste a breath of his being through a meaningless word. Reality pressed so strongly upon the centres of his soul that nouns, uncolored and unqualified, are the verbal sluiceways through which he pours the tides of eternal life. Yet, according to accepted standards, did not Jesus spend his earthly career in the back yards of the world? This fact, commonplace as a matter of history, becomes positively acute with wonder and awe for every thoughtful person who tries to grasp it. Born in a manger, toiling with his hands, teaching by lakeside and in market-place, surrounded by a company of unlettered peasants, frowned upon by the important and misunderstood by the ignorant, forsaken at last by his own and crucified by his enemies, the story, in view of its deepening, transforming hold on the human heart, is almost incredible as it is entirely unimaginable. John Stewart Mill is right—only the fact of Jesus can account for the story of Jesus. The human mind, said Mill, was incapable of inventing it. One might as well talk of inventing stars or oceans or mountains as of inventing the character, words, and deeds of the God-Man!

WHAT CALVARY MEANT

And not the least invigorating and uplifting thing about it all is this: he needed the back yard; which is just another way of saying that God himself, for any truly humanizing revelation of his godhead, could not avoid the back yard. Personally, I have scant sympathy with that theological doggerel which pictures God as out in the universe looking for himself, not yet arrived at the point of self-consciousness, a kind of hectic, emaciated, ghostly becoming, without having fully arrived! That sort of thinking advertises the quality of mental milk-and-water mushiness some of us are capable of stirring up. Of a different grain, however, are those new testament strata of thought upon which the incarnation immovably rests. "Though he was a son"—yes, the son, the only begotten son—"yet learned obedience by the things which he suffered." And what were the things he suffered? Some of them, unquestionably, were these: Human dullness, meanness, slander, hatred, jealousy, lying, misunderstanding, misinterpretation. He suffered them all, and some of them in the Bethany household. "For even his brethren did not believe on him." When he died on Calvary, his brothers, James and Jude, in common with every other mortal, thought that an end had been made of him. More than once, his mother undertook to revise his plans, being naturally and motheringly proud of such a son. Verily, the new testament is full of the things he suffered. Whatever the unfathomed immensities contained in the unique and solitary death on Calvary, that was not all he suffered. But—in all and through all the things he suffered—he learned; and he learned, though he was a son—the son of God!

So I infer that there was more than the mere human need—awful and profound as that is—of our infinite Beethoven in the back yards of time. If God underwent a new experience in the incarnation, as Christian philosophy and revelation lead us to believe, then the back yard, and all that it signifies, has taken unto itself a value that the human generations cannot exhaust. What if the back yard has already become a suburb of the new Jerusalem, and we know it not? The final greatness, argues a philosopher, is not with the man who alters matter but with the man who alters mind. And does not the true altering of mind rest with Christ, and Christ alone? It is a gigantic task. It will require other ages and other worlds than ours for its complete realization. But both the ages and the worlds belong to him. Considering our own world, it is not always easy to discern how and where he is altering its mind for the best. But he is, just the same. Not without loss—great and immeasurable, perhaps irretrievable loss; but none the less with gain—deep, golden, and imperishable.

There are more things, truly, in the back yard than the casual observer sees. Oh, yes, the wash is there, to be sure! And the rubbish! And the croaker! But the clothes are in process of cleansing; underneath the rubbish there is the unspeakable mystery of life; at the feet of the croaker blooms the crocus, and he sees it not. So I am glad, after all, that Beethoven needs the back yard. For one thing, his deaf ears may hear better there. Anyway, the stars look down upon him by night; the sun lights up his forward-looking gaze by day; April rains wash his massive cheeks, as if tenderly striving to mingle their drops with tears not yet all unwept; playful winds whirl about his dead ears, and he looks as if he might be listening to harmonies that would "create a soul under the ribs of death." I am grateful that he beckons me to come and visit with him betimes. Standing in his mute presence, his lips of stone seem to be saying: "Who has more obedience than I masters me, though he should not raise his finger. Round him I must revolve by the gravitation of spirits." And then—

> All suddenly the wind comes soft,
>   And spring is here again;
> And the hawthorn quickens with buds of green,
>   And my heart with buds of pain.

Yet is there not something poignantly creative in these "buds of pain?" Does not one look with other, deeper eyes upon the groaning, travailing universe? Even groaning within ourselves, do we not already have the "first-fruits of the spirit?" If so, then the crimson buds of pain are unrolling into spiritual buds of green! Wherefore, we shall make no terms with Giant Despair and his obstreperous myrmidons. Rather, we shall go on our way in quietness and hope, reinterpreting the pilgrim-rune of David Grayson: "I am living deep again."

America Through an English Woman's Eyes

By Maude Royden

It is very difficult for me to speak in an unbiassed manner of a country to which I have been for such a very brief visit, and where I enjoyed myself so enormously; for I did enjoy my visit to America very much. It is difficult to detach oneself sufficiently from people who have been so kind, and who are, in some ways, so funny; I suppose we are funny, too.

When I went to the United States my immediate object was to do the piece of work that the Young Women's Christian Association had asked me to do; my second object, not less important, was a great desire to see things from the American point of view. I wanted to understand how things looked to people over there, people of many races and all classes. I even tried to understand the point of view of the multi-millionaire; and I am told that some of you are horrified because I seem to understand him so well. Even multi-millionaires have got points of view ,and we should try to understand them. Wherever I went Americans wanted to understand our point of view. I had not set foot in New York, before my cabin was filled with a surging flood of reporters, all of whom wanted to know what I thought about prohibition, whether I thought that women ought to smoke, what I thought about dancing, and what I thought about flappers. There were dozens who asked me what I thought about flappers. The flapper here in England has no idea of the enormous importance of the flapper in America. A distinguished scientist from Europe went to America, and he had not landed very long before the reporters asked him what he thought about flappers. He said that he had not thought anything about them; and the next day they had two columns in the paper as to what he thought about flappers.

AN AMERICAN STORY

It was difficult for me to get through this barrier, and understand what the Americans were thinking about us. Even when I talked to people alone, I found them tremendously interested in the English point of view, and very many of them were specially interested in your point of view at the guildhouse. They said to me, "Are your people pre-millenarians?" I said I had not even heard of a pre-millenarian. From what earthly paradise did they come? "Then are your people post-millenarians?" they asked again. I thought for some time, and then I said, quietly but firmly, "There are no millenarians of any kind at all, so far as I know, at the guildhouse." They said, "It must be like heaven in the guildhouse." I said, "Yes, it is rather like heaven there." "But what is a millenarian, whether pre or post?" I asked. "Well," they said, "to give you a rough idea. One of them moved a bill in the legislature of Kentucky against evolution." I said, "I always thought you Americans had a singularly touching belief in legislation. Did he think it would stop evolution?"

There was an American who was very rich, and he was rather worried because our Lord had said that it was harder for a rich man to get into heaven than for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle. He devoted a considerable amount of money to finding out whether you could so render down a camel as to enable it to pass through the eye of a needle. That is just an American story!

ON AMERICAN SINGING

One very curious episode occurred. I wanted them to understand something of what we are trying to do here; and, among other things, I spoke about our music. Americans will, I hope, forgive me if I say that they are not a musical people. One or two great composers have already emerged from among the negroes of the southern states; but the native American is not a musical person. You can imagine my amusement and my smug delight when I heard somebody who was trying to teach the people who were going to lead the singing at my meetings, say, "Now you must do better. Try to think you are English." I made no comment. Then I took a little courage, and I said to them, "We sing your battle song at the guildhouse, but we sing it to quite a different tune—I hope you do not mind." They said, "Oh, no, we do not mind. Bring the tune over with you the next time you come." They immensely admired Blake's "Jerusalem" to Sir Hubert Parry's setting. They asked if they could have it. I said I thought they could, but when I heard them sing it they sang it quite differently, and I knew they must be singing it wrong. They were practicing it in a special train that was running from St. Louis to Hot Springs. American carriages are open from end to end, except one priceless bit of the carriage which is cut off for millionaires. I was in that! I heard them practicing and I could not bear it any longer, so I went to them, and said, "You are singing that all wrong." "Then show us how to sing it," they said. "Well," I replied, "I cannot show you what is wrong, but it is not right." So they rolled up a newspaper and made me conduct.

Now to come to the serious part of my lecture. The first thing that strikes you when you get to America is the extraordinary feeling of hope there. That and the kindness of the people I met is the reason why I found it such a refreshment to be there even for such a short time. The people there take hope for granted. To live in peace and hope, to be magnificently self-confident, to be sure that however great your problems you are going to solve them; that creates a refreshing atmosphere, and it is very enchanting to people coming from the old world. That is true, although the problems in America are so great. Distances are so vast. We arrived on Easter Sunday, and I was hoping to get off the boat that night. But I was told that New York would be very crowded on Easter Sunday, and we should not be able to get accommodation; for the hotels would be so crowded. "Short distance trains of about twelve hours run would be coming in," or something like that. "Twelve hours run a short distance," I exclaimed. "Why, a country of this size is preposterous. There ought not to be countries so big." Many of the delegates traveled two and a half days to get to the convention, although it was held in a central place.

IMMIGRATION

In that way I had a very comprehensive view of American public opinion, at least among women. Although I spent almost the whole of my time in one place, I was talking to people who had come from all parts. I saw the color problem at close quarters in the southern states. It was very interesting to discover, for example. the way in which the United States looks at the European problem, and the world problem, and the way in which their own problems strike them. For instance, there is the question of immigration. You no doubt know that America now refuses to admit more than a certain number of persons. But when you realize that America has a population just about double ours, and that they are receiving immigrants at the rate of two million every year, you realize the sheer impossibility of absorbing into such a homogeneous nation so many people coming from such different places as Japan, on the one side, and innumerable European nations on the other. Bearing these facts in mind, you realize that America had some right to restrict immigration, and to ask herself how it is possible to absorb so many strains of blood from outside, and yet remain a nation in any real sense at all.

Many Americans do not believe any longer in the theory of the melting pot. They say, an immigrant does not really become an American, that his race feeling persists, and he becomes a jarring element in the state, and very often he himself, or his children, become jarring entities. The race mixture is so great. The difference is so great between yellow and white that it is fair to reflect whether they are not justified in taking a long view. Of course, the whole color question is a problem. And although there is not in the world, I am confident, a more heart-rending problem than the position of the Negro in the American states, I would deprecate any English person, or, indeed, any North American, from pronouncing hastily upon a problem which involves so much about which we are ignorant.

I know that no one here will suspect me of not understanding or sympathizing with the position of the Negro. As we passed into the southern states, my guide, philosopher, and friend, Miss Macmillan, pointed out to me at every little town that we passed that there was a kind of annex, a little slum, and that little slum was always in the water, and it was obvious that when the floods were out that was the place that would immediately be flooded. This little group of squalid shanties was "nigger" town; and one realized from that sort of segregation what it all implied. When I arrived at Hot Springs I found it was not possible for us to stay in the same hotel with the colored delegates. If we had dared to share a meal with any of them we should probably have been broken up by the Ku Klux Klan.

We had a colored bishop to address us at a meeting; to look at him no one would have supposed that he was anything but pure white, a man whom you would not have singled out as a specially dark man. Yet we dared not offer that man a cup of coffee before or after the meeting; and even to ask him to speak on the same platform with a white woman, Mrs. Luke Johnson, was considered a most daring thing to do. It is true that these Negroes were brought over from Africa by the people of America, but how does that help now? You cannot send them back. There are eleven millions of them. You cannot put them into reservations, because they are an increasing race, and the reservations would continually have to be enlarged. It is a problem as to how it is possible for races so different to cooperate, and, above all—for this is the crux of the whole difficulty—to intermarry.

THE COLOR PROBLEM

I have met Americans who soberly believe that intermarriage was the right solution of the problem. While I never met one who would dare to let me use his or her name in public as advocating that, it is conceivable that such may be the right solution. I always feel, and I have felt it much more strongly since I have been there, that it is a problem on which we need a very much greater amount of light and scientific knowledge than we have yet; and if America, with her great genius for applying her scientific discoveries to works of destruction, would apply a little of it to her racial problem she would be helping the world; because it is going to be a world problem in the future. When you get a book, such as "The Rising Tide of Color," which all of you ought to read, written by an American, asserting that if you intermix two races, the inferior one will be more stable, and the superior one will gradually die out, you realize, that it is rather a crude statement, and, I imagine, a crude misunderstanding, and requires to be corrected.

In the northern states the problem is not nearly so acute. In the southern states it is absolutely almost a nightmare. I felt its shadow over the convention the whole time. The Y. W. C. A. insisted that all its colored delegates should sit among the white delegates in the body of the hall. This was regarded by some of the white delegates as a most outrageous insult, and by the Negroes with a gratitude that was almost heartbreaking. They asked me to speak to the colored church. And their heartfelt gratitude was touching because a white woman should choose to go and speak in a colored church. I remember that the minister, when he was praying, again and again thanked God for this great honor done to the humblest of his creatures. You look at their faces, and you see the tragedy of ages already written there, although their history in America is comparatively short. In their musical literature, sacred and secular, there is not one single word of bitterness or of revenge; and you ask yourself whether you are right in speaking of the Negro as the inferior of the white race. I do not think it can be said of any other race in the whole world that, having suffered as they have, they have never threatened revenge. I know there have been terrible things on both sides; but here is the very soul of the black people in their songs. Some of them are comic, some merry, some are sacred, and some sad; but none of them savor of revenge.

AMERICANS AND EUROPE

Then I want to speak upon the attitude of America, not towards her own problems only, but also to ours. We should try to see things from the American point of view. We have all felt disappointed in the refusal of America to come into the league of nations, and that she has refused in a way that rather suggests a little of the pharisee who will not mix himself up with anyone so badly decayed as the old world. But think of how it seems to them. America has never touched European politics. It has been her tradition, and she is very proud of it. America has always kept herself to herself. But during the war she broke that great tradition. You do not know what it meant to her to break it. It was really a great triumph of idealism that America came into the war at all. When she did come in it was with just the same kind of idealism that we entered the war. Those of you who hate war most will admit that the rank and file of the people thought that we were going to achieve something great, something unselfish by the war. America came into the war in the same spirit. When the nations of the world came to draw up a basis of peace America had not been in the war long enough to understand that most of the countries in it had lost their ideal. She was on the very crest of the wave. Think of us at the end of nine months of war. Many of us still believed that the war was going to make a better world. America came in for that sole reason; and then she watched us drawing up that thing we called the Peace of Versailles, and she said, "Thank you; never again!" Is it really so surprising?

Over and over again the Americans put me to shame by their own shame at their country's attitude. The financial men whom I met in New York were filled with the sense that their country had failed to realize its responsibility; that its withdrawal from old world politics had been a great blunder and a moral error. They felt it perhaps more strongly because you always care so much for what is your own. I could well understand why that comical fellow, the 100 per cent American, did not want anything more to do with European politics. He said, "This is what they call peace. I do not want to have anything to do with it." He waited and waited, and he saw the league of nations, which was simply a band of victors from which the conquered were excluded. Then he said, "These countries went to war to make a better world, they went to war to end war, and yet no power on earth will make them reduce their armaments, or disarm their men. They ask us to pour out money like water to rescue Austria, or Poland, or Russia—and in Poland every second man is in uniform—and the United States is asked to support their populations; and England wants us to wipe off her war debt. (This was, of course, before the Washington conference). England is building great battleships. Who against? We do not know, but we do not exactly see why we should pay for them." You see how different it looks over there. Although I feel that America will lose her soul if she tries to pretend that she can cut herself off from the world—and I said it when I was there—I do feel that one ought to be able to understand why it seemed to America impossible to consent to come into the league of nations. There is a great deal of party politics behind it.

You have no idea of the depth of their hatred of Woodrow Wilson. To us he seems a broken and tragic figure. Not only to the Republican party, but to many also of the Democrats he has become an object of absolute hate. When I said that we in England thought that Woodrow Wilson was going to bring the kingdom of heaven when he came over the Atlantic, they said, "Why, that obstinate old man? He would not take anyone with him, he would not take any advice, he cut himself off from everybody who understood a little more than he did what he was going to tackle. When he came back to America, he said, 'There is the league of nations; take it or leave it!' When we said we would like to alter it, he said it was not to be altered by a hair's breadth." I confess their attitude seemed to me rather understandable. When I tried to make them realize how tragic it seemed to us that there should be such an ending to the great ideal, they said the best thing that could happen for the league of nations would be that Mr. Wilson should die; the people would then perhaps forget that he had anything to do with it. It is a tragedy, but everywhere I found Americans increasingly convinced that they must ultimately come into the league of nations.

WOODROW WILSON AND THE LEAGUE

The change in the attitude of the Americans towards the league of nations greatly encouraged me. Of course, I know that in the west the opposition is much the strongest, but there the people are so very far from Europe. But, in spite of that, the people of the east assured me that the logic of events would force America into the league of nations; and many people told me that they were hoping for it, and working for it. I met the man who runs the league of nations, so to speak, in New York, Mr. Fosdick, brother of Dr. Fosdick, the author of "The Manhood of the Master," and "The Meaning of Prayer." And he told me that he was absolutely certain and so was Mr. Rockefeller, and so were the women at Hot Springs, that the logic of events would compel America to come into world politics again. It is absolutely certain that America will have to come into the league, although we may have to call it by another name. We regret that she was not at Genoa. We rejoice that she has a judge on the international court, and we believe that Washington was only the first of a series of conferences which will gradually draw America into the orbit of the old world's interests, and that public opinion in America is getting ready to realize her responsibilities.

Lady Astor, who was in the United States part of the time I was there, was a most wonderful ambassador for England in America. There was some things I could not say because I am not an American, but there were far more things that Lady Astor could say because she is an American. At a banquet given in her honor she said, when replying to the toast, "There is one subject on which I am told I must not speak, or if I do speak about it I must do so under my breath." Putting her hands to her mouth like a trumpet, she shouted, "It is the league of nations." There was a perfect hurricane of applause. It was like throwing a stone into a pond. Nobody had dared to speak about the league, or to admit that they were changing their mind; and Lady Astor, with that gallant charm and courage that characterize her, simply threw a stone into the middle of the pond, and started everybody talking about the league. When you sum up the reasons why you should love America, and indeed you ought to love her, for she is our relation, put at the top the existence of Lady Astor.

PROHIBITION

Now, lastly, there is one subject on which I wish to say a few words—prohibition. No question is more discussed in America, or on the Atlantic liners. We hear that it is both a success and a failure. I am not going to attempt to pronounce judgment on an experiment so new, for over a vast area like the United States it is still very new, and which I had no opportunity of judging at first hand, I heard that the prohibition of alcohol was completely ineffective, that everybody was able to get as much as they wanted, and did get much more than they used to, because the moment you tell people they must not have a thing they will begin to want it. Also I was told that nobody could get alcohol, and therefore people were taking to drugs. I was also told that prohibition was passed for very sordid reasons—that it was passed in order to secure greater efficiency, that money was behind it, that capitalists were interested because drunkenness makes for inefficient workmen and decreases production. I was told it was passed by an excited country in the middle of the war because they wanted more efficient soldiers. I was told all these things, and I had no opportunity of judging how far they were true, how far they were false. But I was told two facts on which every person I questioned agreed. One was that prohibition was carried by an enormous majority, and the other was that there is no possibility of its being repealed. You can draw your own conclusions from that.

I do want to protest against the ill-conditioned and ill-timed jests that English people perpetually make about prohibition, and by which serious-minded Americans are justly and deeply wounded. For the American people, enormously wealthy and practically without danger from the rest of the world, voluntarily to deny themselves what has been the characteristic vice of the white peoples, whether they have proceeded about it in a wise way or not, is something rather heroic. I do not know whether America could have proceeded in a wiser way or whether prohibition is the best way to attain the end in view—Americans have a rather touching faith in legislation—but when I consider the possibilities of luxury, the wealth and the absence of any real dangers, I confess I could not deny the splendor of the scale on which this great adventure, this great experiment is being made, and it galled me to see English people perpetually indulging a sense of humor on the subject. I do not think drink is funny in the least, I have no sense of humor about it myself, perhaps because I am a woman—for women and children suffer most from the effects of drink—but this silly, exasperating kind of joke about prohibition I do beg you all to protest against and refrain from.

It may not be a success, but if it is not a success it will be largely because over the vast frontier of five thousand miles which divide the United States from the British Empire it is so terribly easy to smuggle alcohol—but that does not make one feel any prouder of the British Empire. But if it is a success, have we any right to sneer when we are told that Americans passed prohibition in order to become more efficient in every way. During a war which was declared to be a war of ideals and which in the end became to a large extent to many European countries a war for national existence, a nation that at such a time persisted in using 425,000 tons of sugar or its equivalent in making beer when not only adults but children were definitely suffering from lack of sugar—such a country can hardly despise America because she gave up alcohol. During the war 3,750,000 tons of malt and corn—food stuffs—were used to make alcoholic drinks, and 180,000 tons of rice and maize. I believe it is an uneasy conscience that makes English people laugh at prohibition, because during four years of war we could not refrain from using valuable food for the production of beer.

If prohibition is a failure it will be a mournful failure. Who would not wish it to be a success? If it is a success —and I say it with an undying love and admiration for my own country—I believe that the United States, having found a way to unite the initiative, the courage, and the optimism of the west with the abstinence and the self-discipline of the east will become the greatest nation in the world.

Tradition

By Arthur Rhinow

JOHN STONE purchased a rare old volume from an antiquarian. He had it carefully cleaned by expert hands, and was delighted with the cover. The contents of the book related to medieval fables, and were of little value. Ah, but the cover! The beauty of the grained leather was set off by slightly impressed points and lines of gold, and in the middle was stamped a picture of David with his harp. A bibliophile told Mr. Stone that the volume might have belonged to Jean Grolier, a famous collector in the time of Francis I.

The owner was very much impressed.

"This must become an heirloom in the Stone family," he mused.

He admired the cover over and over again, and came to the conclusion that so rare a treasure ought to be protected. He decided to have it covered. So he asked a book-binder to rebind it in soft leather.

When it was finished it was very presentable. The color was a rich maroon, and the workmanship was perfect. Mr. Stone, however, was not satisfied. While the second cover was to be merely a protection, he thought it ought to be ornamental enough to serve as an introduction to the beauty of the original, so to speak. Of course, very few besides himself knew of the treasure beneath the maroon, and very few were to know it, but even the exterior of a book of that value ought to be artistic. So he had an artist paint a coat of arms on it, a conception of his own, in which a stone figured prominently.

John Stone died suddenly. His son, Henry Stone, found the book and was delighted with the cover. He found the volume in the private drawer of his father's desk, and he concluded that the book had been very dear to him. Of course, he would keep it and cherish it as an heirloom. In fact, it was too precious to be left unprotected. So he made up his mind to have it covered with a cloth binding. Just as a protection, to be sure, but secure, and as artistic as possible, for the volume, so dear to his father, was precious to him. The bookbinder, cautioned and encouraged by promises of reward, did his very best, so that even Henry Stone was delighted. It was too sacred a matter to talk of to any one, and the volume was locked away. War broke out, and Henry Stone died on the field of battle.

"Look at this volume of old legends," the executor said to young Samuel Stone. "What a thick cover; but a pretty one. Your father must have thought a great deal of the old book. He kept it with his valuables."

Samuel Stone agreed that it was a pretty cover. And he revered the book. On the title page he found the names of his father and grandfather, and the volume became venerable to him. He decided to have it covered.

"Just to protect the cover," he confided to the binder; "but, of course, firm enough to give it a permanent appearance."

The binder was going to make objections, but he was cut short by Samuel, whose possessions made him a man of authority. It was just a paper cover, but it was beautiful. The color was a soft purple, and the names of John Stone, Henry Stone, and Samuel Stone were embossed in gold, truly a royal combination. The craftsman was paid a handsome sum, and the book was laid aside in a safe place.

Samuel Stone was hot-blooded. Books had little attraction for him. He was sorry there were no wars at the time. He tried to satisfy his passions in various ways, and finally died of a sword cut received in a duel.

One day the widow sat by the fire and wept over a beautifully bound book which the man of law had handed her. The three names embossed on the cover were dear to her, especially the last, that of her husband. Charles Stone, heir to the estate, sat on the floor, carving a boat, despite the gentle protests of his mother. He had the stubborn spirit of the Stones.

As she wept, she laid the book on a chair beside her, and gave rein to memory. The cover attracted the boy. What in all the world was finer to try his new knife on than this pretty book. A longing seized him to cut out those bright letters and play with them. So he cut, and cut deeply.

"Charles, what are you doing?" the mother cried in alarm. "The heirloom! Oh, how could you! This book was very precious to your father. He revered it. He kept it with the jewels of the family."

Charles did not understand, but he was anxious for further developments. Meanwhile the mother noticed another cover beneath the pretty one, and another beneath that. She wondered. The butler asked an expert antiquarian to call. When the latter came and began to peel, his cheeks flushed. He removed the paper cover and they beheld the cloth cover. He removed the cloth cover, and they saw the leather with the artistic coat of arms of almost a hundred years ago. That was taken off, and their eyes feasted on the quiet beauty of the original.

The antiquarian was enrapt.

"And to think of it," he exclaimed. Each generation revered a layer of less value."

They Tried to Take You From Me

THEY tried to take You from me.
They said You were but an idle myth,
A delusion and a childish superstition;
When I prayed they mocked me,
And when I worshipped You they called me mad.
But, O, my Master—I have met You, and I know!
I have heard You in the stillness of the night,
And in the infinite silence I have beheld Your glory;
In the hour of pain I have felt Your comforting hand.
How can I doubt You whom I know?

They tried to take You from me.
They proved in learned discourse that You never were;
They told me I was simple, and that You were but an empty dream;
Scientific proof they gave, and spoke wise words I could not understand;
They ridiculed and scoffed and laughed—
But, Oh, my Master—he that once has met You cannot doubt!
He that once has felt Your holy presence never questions more.
Though they are blind, yet have I seen Your splendor;
Though they are deaf, yet have I heard Your voice.
How can I doubt You whom I know?

Paradise

I CANNOT think of paradise a place
Where men go idly wandering to and fro,
With harps of gold and robes that shame the snow;
With great wide wings that brightly interlace
Whene'er they sing before the Master's face—
Within a realm where neither pain nor woe,
Nor care is found; where tempests never blow;
Where souls with hopes and dreams may run no race.
Such paradise were but a hell to me;
Devoid of all progression, I should rot,
Or shout for revolution, wide and far.
Better some simple task, a spirit free
To act along the line of self forgot—
Or help God make a blossom or a star.

The Better Way In Industry

"LABOR may be a commodity," said an efficiency engineer out in the lumber country of Oregon, "but it is a commodity with a kick. It is the product of human beings, who out in the Northwest at least—cannot be bought."

Lumber has been a source of much labor trouble in the Northwest. The camps are isolated, men live largely with men only, a condition which brings sordidness and discontent. The labor turn-over is from two to six times that of industry as a whole and it has been figured that it costs about $75 every time one man quits and another has to be found to take his place. A committee from the Federal Council of Churches found discontent and radicalism general, due to dirty, vermin infested bunk houses, poor food, lack of entertainment, long hours, arbitrary bosses, and the prevailing idea that the companies were making great profits out of nature's gift and the toil of men.

Many of us recall that there was trouble when we entered the war and special timbers were wanted in large quantities. There were charges of disloyalty, sabotage and radicalism—and there was truth in them. Colonel Disque was sent out and discovered the reason. He found what the Federal Council committee had found, that profiteering and wretched conditions provoked sabotage, radicalism, and a great increase in the I. W. W. membership. He secured clean bunk houses, (in many cases new ones had to be erected), put the eight hour day into effect, and organized the Loyal Legion of Loggers and Lumbermen with group autonomy and conference relations with the employers for the men. The result was peace, loyalty and production.

Thirty days after the armistice was signed 600 representatives of employers and employes met in Portland to decide whether or not they would continue to work together or go back to the old system of boss at one end, "Red" at the other, secrecy at the top and sabotage, discontent and loafing at the bottom. In other words, should they continue conference through representatives with a spirit of conciliation or go back to ill will? There seemed to be little question about it after the enforced war experience, and the organization was enthusiastically voted continued life. So the big task of organizing on a permanent peace basis was begun.

The "Foureller" Plan

The fundamentals of the plan are simply stated. They consist in each side appointing representatives who meet around a table and, laying all their cards on it, discuss all problems through to a conclusion, with an impartial chairman to cast a deciding vote if there is a draw. His function is much more that of guiding discussion than of casting his vote. Each side has often voted the other's requests. There is a committee in the local industry, district boards, and a general board.

"Many mistakes were made," said Norman F. Coleman, former university professor and the impartial chairman, "as the result of pioneering, but they were overshadowed by worthwhile accomplishments." He sums it up thus: "Slowly there is developing a commonwealth of industry, based upon the conviction that there is a common interest between competing companies as well as with employes. There are "wobbly" operators as well as the labor "wobblies" (I. W. W.), who acknowledge no community of interest with fellow operators or employes, and undermine industry with selfishness, suspicion, and the 'fox and wolf' method of doing business. But with conferences, confidence, and understanding we are building up this commonwealth of industry upon good will, mutual faith, and a basis of common action agreed upon by elected representatives."

The past year has been a testing time. Deflation offered some companies a chance to save money by going back to "care-for-yourself-and-devil-take-the-hindmost" system, with the result, says Mr. Coleman, "that the devil gets the wage earner" surely and the more unfortunate operator also. "Never before were there such man-to-man talks concerning the vital facts of industry, and such sharing of losses." The operators laid their cost and balance, sales and production sheets on the table. Some thought that while wages could be raised in conference they would have to be lowered autocratically. Of course a few lost faith and withdrew and some men quit but the difficulty was negotiated by the greater body with peace and good will and an unbroken production. The eight hour day was retained, wages reduced and a demonstration made that conference is better than arbitrary action on one side and dissatisfied men on the other.

What They Think Of It

"We won a strike and went back to work on the ten hour day," said one big operator, "but our victory was an empty one. There was bitterness both in our plant and the community, and an utter lack of cooperation and efficiency. We welcomed the 4L and we have never in our experience had such harmony and efficiency." Recounting that in three years of 4L experience they have gone through two very difficult periods, another big operator says, "it was good for us and good for our employes, and it is good for the community." Other employers say, "It has improved relations between employer and employe with moral and material benefits to both." "Without it managers would have tried to operate through a period of falling prices by taking losses out of labor, which would have been disastrous to us all." "Each places his cards upon the table with faces up and no one holds an ace up his sleeve. It works." "We learned long ago of the profits that acrue from paying high wages and through fair dealing and cooperation." "We have gained everything and suffered no losses by cooperating." Such testimonials from employers could be multiplied. One of the finest we keep until the last. It sounds like a labor leader talking, so adequately does this man see labor's viewpoint—and seeing the other side of it is the moral secret of peace in industry. He says: "I think we have been able to maintain the eight hour day only through the organization. Had it not been for the 4L we would be on a ten hour basis today with a lower wage than is now paid." If space allowed we could tell of production increases that exceed by far the gains others think they have secured by longer hours and the drive system.

The employe's satisfaction is no less heartily expressed. Here are typical remarks: "The largest labor troubles in the decade have been through the refusal of employers to meet the men through their representatives. Our members have actually received a bonus in wages above non-4L rates and yet the employer has actually produced lumber cheaper." "If we got nothing but the spirit of good-fellowship between fellow workers and employer we would be rich beside those without that relationship." "If the company pays the least possible, of course the men do the least possible," said an employer; "If the employer hires for as little as he can get men for, the [illegible] retaliate by doing as little as they can get away with," s[illegible] a worker, and adds that "the 4L draws us together and each realizes he is getting a square deal which means efficiency in production." "It is the American method," says one. "Cooperation and arbitration is 100 per cent Americanism," says another, and lumber is the greatest industrial creator of "I. W. W's." "It has brought larger production, better wages, shorter hours, better feeling and we get the cooperation of the local business men," says another. "Before we had the 4L if a man suggested an improvement in the plant he was called a "wobbly." Now we are free men and may present our suggestions and our side of the case. The good results are easily seen."

Summing Up the Gains

Mr. Coleman sums up the gains thus: To the employe: the

8 hour day, reasonable working conditions, the best wages possible. To the employer: Settled labor conditions, minimum labor turnover, maximum production at minimum cost. To the public: Industrial peace, better citizens, more steady operation. To the industry: Higher morale, higher standards of management, workmanship, wages, hours and conditions. A labor leader sums it up in this way: Loyalty, cooperation, efficiency of production, improved living conditions, end of strikes and lockouts, eight hour day, peaceful adjustments, steadier employment, free employment service, and a square deal on both sides. An employer states it thus: Better conditions, good food, clean beds, decent living in camps, the eight-hour day, peace and higher production. He says: "Why go back to the old days of over-production and resulting low-priced conditions, combined with poorly paid men who cherish resentment and soreness? We have worked with our men and found operating costs decreasing without decreasing wages."

The eight hour day has been the breaking point in lumber of late in the west. The 4L organizations have maintained it. The state conciliation board declared against an increase in hours, saying the eight hour day makes "better citizens and homes and greater efficiency by the worker." Mr. Coleman says the markets will not now absorb the production of an eight hour day with all men at work and declares against a return to the conditions that made "bowed shoulders, stunted frames and dulled minds." He challenges sharply those who cite the farmer or manager of his own business as working longer days by contrasting their self-managed lives with the drive of a machine industry.

British Table Talk

London, June 4, 1922.

IT IS not necessary to have very long memories in order to measure the change which has come over our ecclesiastical scene. This week the report has been issued from the joint committee of Anglicans and free churchmen, met to consider the appeal of the bishops who assembled at Lambeth in 1920. The report may be considered as the answer to that very sincere and generous appeal. It is signed by all the twelve members of the committee and by its chairman, the Archbishop of York. When the names of the free churchmen who signed are weighed, it will be seen how great an influence they carry. If Dr. J. D. Jones and Dr. Garvie cannot speak for Congregationalists nobody can. Dr. Scott Lidgett for the Wesleyan Methodists and Dr. Peake for the other Methodists, Dr. Carnegie Simpson for the Presbyterians, and Dr. Shakespeare for the Baptists, can speak with the assurance that they are trusted by their people. And yet there is a great deal of spade-work to be done in local churches before the rank and file are ready for positions like these:

"In view of the acceptance from early times of the episcopate, and its acceptance now by the greater part of Christendom, 'as the means whereby this authority of the whole body is given, we agree that it ought to be accepted as such for the united church of the future.'

"Similarly, in view of the place which the Council of Presbyters and the congregation of the faithful had in the constitution of the early church, 'we agree that they should be maintained with a representative and constitutional episcopate as permanent elements in the order and life of the united church.'"

But think of twenty or even ten years ago! Could such a report have been drafted then? We do move!

Religion in Current Literature

The literary man may decline to deal with religion out of a deep reverence for its truth. That may be said for the most part of such writers as Thackeray, who will indeed satirize the follies and absurdities of religious circles, but will not find material for his art out of the inner struggles of the soul, out of its joys and agonies, its hopes and its terrors, when it is dealing with its God. Other artists may leave out religion because it seems to them of drifting moment; there was a time in the eighteenth century when in certain literary circles it was assumed that religion did not matter. In his recent volume of essays Mr. Lytton Strachey, our most celebrated essayist of the moment, has described the attitude of such a group in France. What to that group could be more preposterous than to treat literature and art as serious. "Only one thing, and that was to indulge in the day-dreams of religion or philosophy the inward ardors of the soul. Indeed the skepticism of that generation was the most uncompromising the world has known, for it did not even trouble to deny. It simply ignored. It presented a blank wall of perfect indifference alike to the mysteries of the universe and to the solution of them." That may have been the attitude of skeptics in the eighteenth century and later. It is most certainly not the attitude of the finest literary artists of today. They do take the "inward ardors of the soul" into account. They treat religion seriously, even if they cannot accept its promises. Here are some instances taken almost at random. Thomas Hardy in his preface to his "Late Lyrics and Earlier" writes concerning religion that it "must be retained unless the world is to perish." Mr. Compton Mackenzie has chosen for the title of his latest work, "The Altar Steps." Mr. Nichols in his "Guilty Souls" avowedly deals with those very "inward ardors of the soul." It is just to claim not indeed that religion is becoming more widely accepted, that may or may not be, but this at least is true that it is nowhere ignored today by the finest minds.

Christianity and Business

This saying of Dr. Orchard I have cut from "Public Opinion," an indispensable weekly selection, so made that it becomes not only a guide to other journals but an inspiration in itself. The editor of this paper, it will interest the readers of The Christian Century to know, has his eye upon their journal of religion. Last week, not for the first time, he gave the honor of his front page to an article from the pen of Dr. Rufus Jones, quoted from a recent issue of The Christian Century. But hear Dr. Orchard:

"I can imagine that when Christianity really gets going a man will go into business in order to build up a vast concern, not to make money at all, but first of all for the sheer pleasure of doing it; secondly, for providing people with honest goods; and, thirdly, for solving the industrial problem of getting people to work together in a spirit of comradeship and goodwill," says Dr. W. E. Orchard in the Crusader. "I can imagine a man at the head of Selfridge's living by choice in a cottage the same size as that of one of his porters. You had better be very careful about Jesus Christ. If you start playing about on the fringe of his religion you do not know what may happen at any moment. It is the sword of Christ—disturbing, severing—and his sword only that is going to bring peace to the world. If we can get back our Lord's conception of riches and poverty—and we have got to get it back or be driven back to it—we are going to stop the avarice which is the poison at the brain and heart of us all."

In the Lull of Summer

Some of us smile when we hear of the rest, supposed to be enjoyed during the summer months by workers in the churches.

It is the rest which comes from a change of work, that is all. Summer schools and conferences of all kinds fill the programme for the next three months. They are delightful but not precisely occasions for rest. Some of our Congregational leaders will know little respite this year. They are moving to and fro pleading for the forward movement. Dr. J. D. Jones is no novice at this work. When he believes a scheme is a good one he is without any hesitation, he does not spare himself and he is prepared to beard any rich man in his castle or to visit any remote village. With him will be Mr. Sidney Berry and others and though they will find it no easy task to raise 500,000 pounds they will emerge some day with their treasure. . . . The British conference of missionary societies meets at Swanwick on the week beginning June 11. They will have a long programme of co-operative work. One achievement will be welcome with great satisfaction—the progress of the press bureau under Mr. Basil Mathews. . . The Christian Endeavor Whitsuntide congress will be held at Oldham this year; I am going down to speak on Monday evening upon "Christ for all" and I am looking forward to learn more of the present prospects of the Christian Endeavor in this country. It is not so strong in the Congregational churches, as it used to be, but I am under the impression that many feel their lack of something, which it used to supply.

The World Menace of Opium

My friend, Mr. Basil Mathews, has just returned from Geneva where he has been a member of the League of Nations Commission to inquire into the menace of opium. The commission, he tells us, has revealed clearly the need for world-wide inquiry and action, honestly carried out. It is not enough to suppress the growth of opium in China. Evidence was brought forward by Sir Jordan of a great increase in the Chinese crop. From Mr. Mathews' valuable account of the commission, I have only space to quote two most significant paragraphs:

"The principal cause of this increase, of course, is the disorganized state of the country. This is one of the phases in China's evolution and the world must be patient with her. Practically all the country is in the hands of military rulers who have usurped all authority. Contributory causes are the fact that some large quantities of morphia have been sent to the Far East while there has been an immense amount of smuggling of foreign opium. It is true that the Indian Government sacrificed four million pounds worth of revenue by agreeing to cease sending opium to China in 1917, but its policy in continuing to send opium to Hong Kong and other places has been very unsatisfactory. The Chinese argument is that if India and other countries are supplying the people abroad with opium why should they not grow it for their people at home themselves.

"By the time the Commission has closed its session practical proposals will certainly be arrived at. In the meantime, the one clear fundamental conviction that comes home repeatedly to everyone here is that nothing short of world-wide public opinion in China and Japan, as in the West and in India, brought to bear continuously upon the governments to enforce the honest attempt both in law and in administration, to suppress the world traffic in these drugs will solve the problem. If public opinion is the ultimate force to be relied upon, it becomes emphatically clear that the moral of this opium commission which I have been watching continuously on the shores of Lake Geneva is that the alert action of the church by continuous educational propaganda is the primary duty of the churches."

Faith in a Better Day*

THE time has gone by when the book of Daniel should be a favorite vehicle for freaks. A certain type of badly jumbled mind has always fixed upon Daniel and Revelation for the most fanciful and improbable predictions. The Pope of Rome, the World War, the end of the world, the fate of the Jews, anything and everything can be proved (to the vast satisfaction of the freaks themselves) from these apocryphal books. This is naturally true. The writers had to use veiled language and such language can easily be twisted, by the ignorant, to fit the case in hand. The situation, briefly, was this: The fall of Samaria was in 722 B. C. and the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B. C. The Jews lived in exile until 536 when the first group came back to rebuild the waste places. Alexander conquered Persia in 323, and we enter the Greek period of Jewish history. The book of Maccabees is the story of the brave resistance to Grecian oppression. The arch-enemy of the Jews was Antiochus, the Greek. He tried to make Jews into Greeks—an impossible feat. He captured Jerusalem on a sabbath day when the Jews would not fight; he sought to overcome their religious habits; he put a Greek altar in the temple; he burned the holy writings; he made it a death penalty to worship Jehovah. In this stormy period the book of Daniel was written to encourage the Jews to endurance and to religious loyalty. The burden of the message was this: withstand like Daniel and God will deliver you.

This portion of Daniel is particularly appropriate to the present time. In every dark age the prophets of gloom flourish. Today we hear men talking about the second coming of Christ; they are obsessed by that idea. According to their notion, the world is going to get worse and worse until Christ shall suddenly come, take his few faithful children home and send the rest of us to everlasting fire. They believe that they have only to preach the gospel regardless of whether anyone accepts it or not and that when the time is ripe and the certified number have come into the ark of safety, the violent end will come. They have no social gospel nor any faith in one. They capitalize wars, fights, strikes, panics, epidemics, crimes, divorces, indications of failure in the church, falling off of attendance, lack of interest in holy things; they revel in these things; they glory in them. The Baptist church and the Presbyterian church, both, are torn by these premillenarian hosts.

But is it as bad as all that? Does a sane, balanced view of the old earth convince you that the world is degenerating? Dr. James H. Snowden, whom I have the honor to call a friend, has written a book entitled: "Is the World Growing Better?" He lectured upon that theme before nearly five hundred Pittsburgh ministers recently. His lecture is convincing. He takes a long look and shows how modern social conditions are better than ancient ones—take the single contrast of slavery and brotherhood. He makes a study of present day laws and compares them with the laws of yesterday. He shows the growth of the Christian religion. In 1760 Voltaire said: "Ere the beginning of the nineteenth century Christianity will have disappeared from the earth." As a matter of fact, the church is growing everywhere. The Bible is being better understood and deeds are being made tests of life.

In all our churches we should sing the "Hallelujah Chorus"—The kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever. What though the world offer the king's meat, what though we must pass through fiery trials, what though the lions roar and bar the way, Christ will conquer. "It is daybreak everywhere." Be brave.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Chicago Preachers Now Up on Ladders

What must be the consternation of a staid Chicago business man to go out to lunch and find his pastor up on a stepladder in the midst of the loop haranguing a crowd! It is unusual, but the Chicago Church Federation insists that it is effective in the spreading of the gospel. It is said that last summer 12,000 outdoor meetings were held in this way. Dr. Howard Agnew Johnston has made some facetious observations on the psychological results of preaching from a ladder. He says: "Incidentally, it's good for the preacher. If he doesn't ramble physically over a platform maybe he won't ramble mentally. The power of suggestion, you know. One form of concentration teaches another. Then it teaches him balance—a good thing for everybody to have. Preaching from a stepladder is a shaky business from one standpoint, but stabilizing from another. But the best thing is it enables us to establish a pulpit anywhere on a moment's notice and preach the gospel to hundreds who never enter a church or hear it otherwise."

Baptist Professor Defies His Critics

The attack of the Conservatives of the Southern Baptist camp on the freedom of teaching in southern Baptist schools has brought strained relations in more than one educational institution. The Nashville, Tenn., ministerial association recently passed a resolution calling upon Prof. C. W. Davis to resign, or to publicly repudiate his former attitude in favoring the theory of evolution. It is said that most of the faculty and the student body of the institution are defending the teacher who is under fire. The board of trustees has only one man who is opposed to him. The result is that the Nashville ministers have very little opportunity of affecting the situation in Union university save by the processes of boycott, now the weapon that is most used by those who maintain their theological orthodoxy by an ostrich-like process.

Nation Still Touchy on Militarism

Though it is the clear duty in these days of peace for the ministry of the church to declare in favor of world peace and against militarism, nevertheless there is a section of the public which through a mistaken sense of patriotism is very much opposed to such activity. The Nation in a recent issue tells the startling story of Rev. Russell H. Stafford, pastor of First Congregational church of Minneapolis, who was an officer and chaplain in the 313th Medical Regiment. He made an address in which he questioned the good results of drilling high school boys. The chaplain was formally charged with conduct unbecoming to an officer, and with associating himself "with an objectionable element in the community." The thing the minister said which called forth this severe arraignment was as follows: "The mechanical obedience which military training develops discourages initiative. . . . It does not cultivate the whole body; it does not cultivate resourcefulness; and for this reason it is not the best preparation for war. The American soldiers in France were generally recognized to be the best fighters over there, and military experts attributed it to the fact that

Fundamentalists Lose in Baptist Convention

BAPTISTS have felt for months that this year's Northern Baptist Convention at Indianapolis, June 14-20, would mark a new epoch in the history of their communion. All eyes therefore were turned toward the Hoosier capital while two thousand delegates of the churches of thirty-seven states discussed issues raised by the Fundamentalist agitators. For three years the Fundamentalists have been organized to commit the denomination to premillennialism, a mechanical theory of the inspiration of the Bible, an attitude of opposition to modern science, and a drawing in of many lines of cooperation with other Christian bodies with which the modern church is in some degree realizing its common fellowship. Underneath the dogmatic interest was a revolt of discontented spirits who hoped that the officials of the denomination might be displaced and room be made for more conservative leaders. The Fundamentalist conference held in Indianapolis the day before the convention gave opportunity to marshal the conservative forces, to state once more the grievances and objectives, and to appoint the floor leaders who would go into the convention and present the demands of the group. At the adjournment of one of the Fundamentalists' sessions the chairman stated without any attempt at apology that the objective of the group was to displace the present officiary of the Baptist organization with an officiary whose connections were such as to guarantee executive action in harmony with Fundamentalist views.

The liberals, as they were generally called, were in a pessimistic mood. One or two prominent members of the Board of Promotion had conceded in advance a Fundamentalist victory. An unprecedented thing developed. The liberals also organized a parliamentary strategy, and appointed a floor-leader. In two hotels nearby, the respective groups met after the sessions each evening to consider the events of the day and to project a course of action for the morrow.

On the opening day of the convention it is the custom for the state delegations to be segregated for the purpose of appointing representatives on the various committees. Four important committees have thirty-seven members each, and each state delegation appoints one member of each of the committees. Thus the very first day it was possible to poll the sentiment of the convention. The Fundamentalists on this poll controlled only three states out of the thirty-seven. One of these was Ohio, with over two hundred delegates, but another was a state with only five delegates, three of whom were father, mother and daughter. Illinois with over two hundred delegates was so nearly divided that only two votes changed would have thrown the state to the Fundamentalists. The poll showed that among two thousand delegates approximately four hundred were convinced Fundamentalists. The crucial committees were those on nominations and resolutions.

Prior to the convention the Fundamentalists had announced a most ambitious program. They wanted the Board of Promotion abolished. They desired that conservatives be chosen for the offices. They insisted that the denominationally-owned organ, the Baptist, should be sold. But the outstanding objective was the adoption of a creed which might be used as a measuring stick on Baptist teachers, missionaries and denominational officials suspected of heresy.

Naturally the initial poll helped to abate some of these demands, for it was apparent that majority could be secured for any Fundamentalist measure only by floor strategy and skillful debate. The Board of Promotion came forward with its own proposals of reform. This organization raises all the money for all the Baptist boards and so vast a task has been rather expensive in the past few years. The changes proposed were mostly in the direction of cutting down expense, and Dr. J. C. Massee, Fundamentalist leader, announced that he was satisfied with the changes made. Not all of his faction agreed with him on this, however.

The first debate and test of strength came in connection with a recommendation of the executive committee providing that only those should be considered who represented churches which had contributed to at least one of the major societies of the denomination. An amendment was at once offered by Rev. M. P. Boynton of Chicago who moved that the financial provision be stricken out of the report. He asserted that the provision was punitive. The whole matter was sent back to executive committee to frame in a way that was not re-

Methodist Minister Not Afraid of Evolution

The discussion of evolution as a scientific theory has been for a long time a neglected subject in the average community except in the classrooms of the public schools. At Waverly, Ill., this year Rev. C. W. Hamand, a Methodist minister, gave the baccalaureate address to the young people of the high school, and openly avowed that the Bible was not a textbook of science and furthermore that one might be both a Christian and a scientist. The town has evidently been waiting for some pronouncement on the part of their ministers for the editor of the Waverly Journal says: "The Time has come when Christian men and women should no longer have to be labeled as atheist, infidel or what not, because they accept the findings of science on the theory of evolution. Such labels have been referred to by one writer as libels. The time has come, too, when the ministers, most of whom do accept the findings of science upon that question should speak their minds instead of being fearful of its effect upon the people of their congregation and community."

College of Internationalism in Denmark

The promotion of Christian internationalism will be accomplished by a new college located at Helsingfor, Denmark, which opened its doors in October, 1921, with 24 students. In the initial group, 8 different races were represented. These came from both sides of the battle line of the great world war. While anyone may enter, the purpose of the new institution is to assist men of the working class to get an education while in part paying their way by daily service on the farm that is operated in connection with the school. The faculty as well as the student body is international and instruction will be chiefly in German and English. A committee of distinguished Americans are interested in the project, among them Jane Addams. President Emeritus Charles W. Eliot says of the project: "The proposed International People's College in Denmark as described by its founder, Dr. Peter Manniche, is a very interesting educational and industrial experiment for which Denmark is at present the best site. It aims to establish industrial democracy on sound ethical and economic foundations. It deserves the financial support of persons who are both willing and able to aid far-reaching beneficent projects as well as to contribute to the pressing needs of today."

Federation Secretary is College President Again

The inauguration of Dr. R. H. Crossfield as president of William Woods college recently was carried out with eclat. The occasion was dramatized by having the president of the board of trustees deliver to the new president of the college the keys, seal and charter of the college. President J. C. Jones of the University of Missouri delivered an address in connection with the occasion. Among the distinguished visitors were Dr. B. A. Abbott of St. Louis and President Elmer Ellsworth Reed of Westminster college. President Crossfield was a teacher in Lawrenceburg, Ky., before he entered the ministry. After seventeen years in pastorates at Glasgow and Owensboro, Ky., he became president of Transylvania University, College of the Bible, and Hamilton College, all Disciples institutions of Lexington, Ky., and served for thirteen years. During the past year Dr. Crossfield has been a secretary of the Federal Council of Churches with offices in New York.

Missions Will Be Interpreted At the University

The University of Chicago has been zealously building up a good department of misions in recent years and at the summer quarter this year there will be five strong courses given. Dr. Frank G. Ward will teach "The Missionary Function of the Church," Dr. Archibald G. Baker "Christianity in China," "Christianity and other Agencies of World Civilization," "Christianity in Japan and Korea," "Christianity and other Agencies of World Civilization"; Dr. A. A. Bedikian of New York will teach "Mission and the Eastern Churches." The university has for many years featured its summer school of theology at which regular university work is done. Sixty courses are being offered to the students of religion this summer, and several hundred men will be in attendance upon them.

Professor of Sociology Stresses Spiritual Note

One of the interesting phenomena of the day is the increasing friendliness of sociologists to the institutions of religion. Dr. Charles A. Ellwood of the University of Missouri has recently written a book dealing with religious problems. At the commencement address before the school of economics he said:

A motion was introduced by Dr. J. C. Massee of Boston that the Baptist, the denominationally-owned weekly, should be sold out to a private group or an individual. Debate on this motion was cut off by a motion to refer to the executive committee. On this vote the Fundamentalists carried more than their usual strength.

It was expected that the statement of belief adopted by the Fundamentalists at the Des Moines convention last year would be offered to the convention as a creed for the denomination. It was evident to the leaders that it was hopeless to offer a premillennialist document, so at the last moment Dr. W. B. Riley of Minneapolis, offered the New Hampshire confession of faith for adoption. This document, it was made clear in the discussion, had never been adopted by any state or national convention, and in its present form is largely a revision by one man of a document produced by only two original authors. Dr. Riley read the creed, and moved that the convention recommend it for use in the local churches. Thereupon Dr. Cornelius Woelfkin of New York offered a substitute resolution which declared that "the New Testament is the only standard of belief and practice for Baptists and that we need no other." The debate had to be upon Dr. Woelfkin's substitute motion.

Mrs. Helen B. Montgomery, the convention president, proved to be a master hand in controlling the debate. All attempts at disorder were promptly quelled, and a two hour discussion was carried on with clear statement of the issues involved and very few personalities. It was argued by the Fundamentalists that men tended everywhere to draw up statements of belief. The liberals agreed, but insisted that every man should be allowed to make his own. They read clauses from the New Hampshire confession showing that it gave no recognition to the love of God, to missionary work or to some other precious interests in the modern man's religion. The debate continued to the dinner hour when a standing vote was taken which was two to one in favor of Dr. Woelfkin's substitute motion. Probably the speaking did not much influence the vote, though without doubt conservative speeches made some liberal votes. Rev. John M. Dean who delivered an eloquent tribute to the New Hampshire confession, urging its adoption and then stated that he did not believe two of the articles in that creed helped some minds to see the absurdity of giving men of another age the privilege of stating the faith of our time. Mr. Dean was once a Unitarian, and he asked how Dr. Woelfkin's resolution would keep Unitarians out of the Baptist churches.

Following this decisive defeat, the Fundamentalists foregathered and declared that instead of being defeated they had only begun to fight. They declared their purpose to set up a nation wide organization of 120 committee men, with three headquarters, one in the east, one in Chicago and the other in the far west. Men of other denominations will be invited to cooperate. Before the convention the Fundamentalists declared that they did not seek to divide the denomination, but the present shift would seem to be in the direction of a coalescence of the minority groups of several religious bodies to form a new conservative denomination. Mr. Dean threatened the formation of rival state conventions. The curtain was rung down on the Fundamentalists in a meeting at Moody Institute in Chicago the day after the convention closed, which looked toward an interdenominational organization of premillennialists.

"Religion cannot get along without social service. while religion likewise is necessary to the success of social work. If you go into social work without an essentially religious feeling you will either end in pessimism or become impatient revolutionists. Religion will not be able to get along without you, if only it knows it. Certainly it is unethical and irreligious to preach high ideals to men when you leave them unfed. Again, if you forget that men are essentially spiritual beings, you are likely to fail in your work."

Daily Vacation Bible School Movement Spread Widely

The daily vacation Bible school movement has been extended to touch many parts of the nation. Hastings, Nebr., will have a school for the first time this summer. In this school the following denominations will cooperate: Baptists, Congregationalists, Disciples, Methodists, Presbyterians, United Brethren, United Evangelical, and Episcopalian. Miss Lehr, who recently returned from Columbia University with a doctor's degree, will have charge of the school.

Catholic Archbishop Rails Against the Fashions

The public is quite accustomed to the sensational utterances of certain Protestant ministers on the subject of the styles in women's dress, but it becomes serious when a Catholic archbishop joins in the hue and cry. Archbishop Messmer of Milwaukee has recently issued the following order which is effective throughout his archdiocese: "Let pastors publish as a rule for their parishes that no woman or girl with a dress cut below the collar bone or with naked arms will be allowed to receive communion. Let priests refuse absolution to all Catholic girls going out in so-called hiking suits, a most outrageous, downright immodest and sinful fashion that threatens to become general. No decent Catholic girl with any sense of Christian modesty will go on the street in such an abominable attire. I know of nothing that will more effectively blunt the instinct of maidenly modesty, supplant it with disgusting shamelessness than this scandalous fashion that seems to be growing among American girls. There is no reason for such fashion. The modern girl's dress is short enough for any hike or other need."

Will Put Home Mission Service on Respectable Basis

The treatment the churches have given to home misionaries is notoriously unjust. The joint committee on town and country work of the Home Missions Council and the Council of Women on Home Missions has resulted in the following important recommendation of policy: "In view of the great need of detaining missionary workers, especially ministers in rural fields, that the boards of home missions employ selected and approved missionaries for a longer period than one year, we recommend that, in the case of approved missionaries a contract be made between the board and the misionary for seven years of service; one of seven years be given the missionary primarily for study in an approved university; that, in the case of these approved missionaries and in others of high efficiency a complete equipment be provided, including a parsonage, monthly mileage, payments for the use of a car, or upkeep for a horse, where necessary; and in case of all missionaries giving their full time to church work, a salary sufficiently large to satisfy the needs of a normal family and provide for the education of children. The purpose of this recommendation is the enlistment and holding of a permanent home mission force."

Baptists Face Financial Problems

ASIDE from theological controversy, the Baptist denomination has been confronted with no more serious problem this year than that of its finances. While more money has been received during the past year than ever before in the history of the denomination except in 1920-21, the Northern Baptist convention at Indianapolis was face to face with deficits that were staggering. The deficit in the treasury of the Board of Foreign Missions alone was nearly a million dollars. The denominational leaders had expected to receive fifteen million dollars the past year for all boards through the operation of the nation-wide drive for funds by the Board of Promotion. Instead only a little over nine millions was received. The foreign board is one of the largest among the foreign mission boards of the world, but it staggers under the weight of debt. Collections have been slow due both to general economic conditions and to the theological controversy in the denomination. Budgets are being cut, and the cooperation of the leading laymen of the denomination has been secured in facing the financial problems.

The failure of the five year objective of $100,000,000 for Baptist causes has sobered the leaders, but not broken their spirits. Mrs. Helen B. Montgomery, one of the most indomitable spirits of the denomination, in her keynote presidential address sounded a call to cooperation in behalf of Baptist enterprises. She said: "We face great opportunities, too great for us to rightly measure them. One hundred million people in Europe, as the result of the war, have religious liberty for the first time. Our distressed brethren in many lands need us to help them set up the standard of a free church in a free state. From all sections of our mission fields comes the news of rising tides of evangelism that are lifting our missionary enterprise in their mighty arms. Is this a time for us to diminish our aid when from Assam, from Burma, from India, from Africa, from China and Japan and the Philippines come tidings of nations in commotion prepared for Zion's war? If we look to our own beloved America the prospect is the same. The Sunday school world is awakening to a new sense of responsibility for the moral welfare of our nation.

"Brethren, are we big enough for a co-operative movement? Has our Christian democracy learned the lesson that the political democracy of the United States has learned, to acquiesce in the decisions of the majority? Our American nation fights things out at the polls, then adopts the successful candidate as the president of all the people, and goes on quietly for four years. South American nations do not so accept decisions, but are in a continual broil of revolution. Which model do we tend to approximate?"

The theological adversaries of the boards had hoped to make great changes in the personnel of the leadership. They had even threatened to bring in an opposition ballot into the convention. But the election passed off quietly. Rev. Frederick E. Taylor of Indianapolis was chosen as president of the next convention. Called a "middle-of-the-road" man, he is thoroughly cooperative with the various secretaries of the denomination. Rev. W. S. Abernathy of Washington, the "President's preacher," is president of the Board of Foreign Missions, Judge F. W. Freeman of Denver continues as president of the Board of Home Missions, and Mrs. Helen B. Montgomery will continue as before her presidency of the convention to head the Woman's Board of Foreign Missions. Dr. Aitcheson, at the head of the Board of Promotion, reported $27,000,000 had already been collected in connection with the Baptist World Movement.

Dr. F. L. Anderson, veteran foreign mission leader, spoke of the "defeat of 1921-22," but asserted that better days were ahead. His reports from the field were inspiring. He said: "In Africa an evangelistic ingathering has been taking place which has served to recall the historic Pentecost on the Congo thirty-five years ago. The Burma Mission reports 4,783 baptisms during the year, making a total church membership of 73,653. One of the most encouraging reports comes by cablegram from the new field north of Kentung, Burma, across the Chinese border, where since Jan. 1, 1922, more than 2,500 converts have been baptized. Missionaries in Assam have written of unusually large accessions of church membership. India never seems to have been so wide open to the gospel as it is today. Letters from Russia reveal an astonishing growth in Baptist churches there. According to the estimate of Russian leaders, the proposed union of the two Baptist bodies now known as the All-Russian Baptist Union and the All-Russian Evangelical Christian Union, would constitute the second largest Baptist body in the world, with about 2,000,000 members." transformation of a celebrated American church: "The first Hebrew Christian synagogue in the United States was dedicated February 25, 1922, by Bishop Thomas J. Garland, of the Protestant Episcopal church. The building was originally the parish house of the church of the Advent, at 517 North Fifth street, Philadelphia, Pa., where Phillips Brooks was at one time the rector. It has now been rearranged to suit the requirements of Hebrew Christian worship and missionary service. This is said to be the fifth Hebrew Christian synagogue in the world. The only other one on the American continent is at Toronto, while there are three in eastern Europe. Relatively few converts have been made from Judaism to Christianity in the last few centuries, and these have become identified as individuals with other Christian churches."

Unitarians Complete Beautiful Building in New York

West Side Unitarian church of New York is about to complete the first section of a four hundred thousand dollar building. Dedication week will begin Oct. 15. This splendid achievement was made possible through a loan from the American Unitarian association of $75,000. While waiting for the completion of the building, the congregation has been meeting in one of the halls of Columbia University, although a service

ing attention to the meeting of the Baptist World Alliance, in July, 1923, in Stockholm, Sweden, Dr. Anderson said: "World conditions make it appropriate that Baptists from all lands send representatives to this meeting, to consider not only the promotion of denominational solidarity, but also the best contribution which the denomination can make at this crucial hour in history."

The question of the location of the next convention is always interesting. The Seattle people gave up the convention this year that fundamental issues might be debated nearer the center of population. There is now a gentleman's agreement that the convention shall go to Seattle in 1925. The Board of Sabbath Schools and Publication will celebrate its centennial in 1924 so Philadelphia is asking for the convention that year. Therefore a mid-west convention city will be chosen for 1923. The date of the convention is also unsatisfactory. This year Indianapolis was like a furnace on the important days of the convention. Next year the convention will meet the Wednesday before the first Sunday in June, two weeks earlier than the present date.

The machinery of a Baptist convention is simple and informal. Each church is entitled to one delegate for each one hundred members, but in no case more than ten. Delegates present credentials and secure badges. On close votes the state delegations may demand a show of badges. As already indicated, the important committees are composed of representatives from the various states, one to each state. Elections are conducted by printed ballot, issued to the delegates through the leaders of state delegations. The nominating committee makes its report in the form of a ballot, but independent ballots are permissible and scratches on the official ballot are also allowed. All society officials are elected by secret ballot in the convention just as in the case of convention officials. The chief weakness in the plan would seem to be that there is seldom a representative of more than one in six of the churches. Delegates must bear their own personal expenses unless provision is otherwise made by their local congregations. This makes representation to a large extent sectional and the place of holding conventions has large importance owing to the theological complexion of the various sections of the nation. Baptists make much of liberty of thought and speech and in no ecclesiastical group in America are leaders more freely and frequently challenged than among the descendants of Roger Williams.

National Christian Conference in China

IT IS ten years since the last national Christian Conference of China. In that decade events have changed the whole course of the world's life. The conference of 1922 was in session in May, and the reports are just now beginning to come through the mail from China. The difference in viewpoint between the conference this year and that of previous decades is seen in the selection of a native Christian to precide. Dr. C. Y. Cheng occupied the chair which was held by Dr. John R. Mott ten years ago. Dr. Cheng was Dr. Mott's interpreter ten years ago.

This was to symbolize the fact that the foreigner in the Chinese church must decrease like John the Baptist. Among the statements in this conference was this one: "Chinese never think of Buddhism as a foreign religion even though it came from India. They never think of Mohammedanism as a foreign religion though it came from Arabia. The time has come when the next steps must be taken which will cause China to cease thinking of Christianity as a foreign religion."

Many of the Chinese dress like Americans, but in the National Christian Conference they all wore native dress. There were 565 Chinese present. The foreigners numbered 626, but many of these had only a visitor's privilege. The Methodists were particularly keen in putting their native leaders forward, and no American Methodist appeared on the platform. The foreign group were largely recruited from the older missionaries. The fact that 80 per cent of the missionaries present had been in China for over twenty years resulted in much conservatism in the missionary group, but wise leadership prevented this conservative bloc from pressing any ecclesiastical legislation.

The most important action of the conference related to the matter of the adoption of a creed. The fundamentalists toured China recently, and in the China Inland Mission they have constant representation of their cause. The result is that fellowship in the missionary group has lost its unanimity, and in place of trust there is suspicion. The demand of the conservatives that the conference should adopt a creed was successfully resisted. On the credal question the following important pronouncement was made: "We the members of the conference joyfully confess our faith in, and renew our allegiance to, God the Father Almighty, Jesus Christ, His Son, our Lord and Saviour, Who loved us and gave Himself for our sins, and the Holy Spirit, the Lord and Giver of life; and acknowledge our loyalty to the Holy Scriptures as the supreme guide of faith and conduct, and to the fundamental Christian beliefs held by the churches to which we severally belong. The conference, however, is not constituted as a church council with authority to pass upon questions of doctrines and of church polity or to draw up a credal or doctrinal statement of any kind. While the conference believes it to be a matter of vital importance that the Church of Christ in China should be established on a basis of true faith and sound doctrine, it recognizes that the authority to determine what are the essential affirmations of the Christian faith lies with the several churches of which those attending this conference are members."

The most important forward step was in the formation of a National Christian Council. Many advocated a single independent church for China, but the time did not seem ripe for this achievement. The council will henceforth symbolize the unity of the native Chinese Christians for it is at the outset put into the control of native Christians. The council is composed of one hundred, 53 of whom are natives. The Methodists were entitled to ten representatives, five Chinese and five missionaries. They chose four missionaries and six Chinese. Henceforth a great many people will speak of the Chinese church, for the union formed in the council is very intimate.

Important pronouncements were made in the conference on internationalism. The following are quotations from prominent Chinese speakers: "I believe that if internationalism is to be brought about anywhere it is to be done in the church. To me, even the church can be allowed to be national only in so far as a national organization will be able better to promote the kingdom in the nation." "We do not wish to see the church in China develop in the church a spirit of China for the Chinese as we believe this is not in harmony with the universal character of the Christian church nor with the spirit of Christ."

Detroit Minister Holds Crowds in the Summer

The problem of a summer audience presses hard on most ministers and those who succeed in the summer time must have originality and initiative. Dr. William L. Stidger, pastor of St. Mark's Methodist church of Detroit, has a new plan for the Sunday evening service during the summer months. The service lasts just one hour. High class nature pictures lasting ten minutes are shown; the second feature is a travel book dramatic sermon which lasts for five minutes; each night there is a distinctive and unusual musical number. The sermon each evening is called a nature sermon. With out-door illustrations the gospel is brought home to the minds of the people.

University of Chicago Preachers

The University of Chicago has completed its list of preachers for the summer quarter, and it contains some of the most eminent religious leaders and thinkers of the country. President J G. K. McClure, of McCormick Theological Seminary, Chicago, was the first preacher, the date being June 25. On July 2 Herbert Lockwood Willett, professor of the old testament language and literature, University of Chicago, will be the preacher; July 9, Ernest De Witt Burton, head of the department of new testament literature and interpretation, University of Chicago; July 16, Harris Franklin Rall, professor of systematic theology, Garrett Biblical Institute; July 23, Theodore Gerald Soares, head of the department of practical theology, University of Chicago, and July 30, Allan Hoben, professor of sociology, Carleton College. In August the university preachers will be Professor Henry Burke Robins, of Rochester Theological Seminary; Rev. James Francis, of the First Baptist church, Los Angeles, Calif.; Professor Gerald B. Smith, of the University of Chicago Divinity school; and Rev. Lathan A. Crandall, of the Hyde Park Baptist church, Chicago, who will be the convocation preacher Aug. 27.

THE JOURNAL OF RELIGION

Issued by the Divinity Conference of
The University of Chicago
Edited by Gerald Birney Smith

What It Is

It is a non-sectarian periodical to promote the understanding of region in all its vital phases.

Its contributors are leading thinkers and scholars connected with universities, churches, and mission fields in all parts of the world.

It deals with religion as a vital spiritual reality in history, in society, and in individual experience, rather than with documents or philosophies.

The May Issue

Three aspects of the conflict between theological dogma and scientific method were in this number of the journal presented as chapters in the story of the significance of the current campaign against the doctrine of evolution.

The Kentucky Campaign Against the Teaching of Evolution.
By ALONZO W. FORTUNE.

The Constitutional and Legal Status of Religion in Public Education.
By CARL ZOLLMAN.

Can Christianity Welcome Freedom of Teaching?
By GERALD BIRNEY SMITH.

Forthcoming Numbers

Articles will soon appear on other important religious questions, among which is that of the modernist movement in Protestantism. Some of the more important papers to be published in the early numbers are:

- "The Conservative Reaction in China," by DR. PAUL HUTCHINSON.
- "The Value of the Social Survey for Religion," by DR. WORTH M. TIPPY.
- "The Present Status of the Psychology of Religion," by PROFESSOR E. L. SCHAUB, of Northwestern University.
- "The Modernist Movement in the Church of England," by REV. C. W. EMMET, University College, Oxford, England.
- "The Passing of Paternalism in Foreign Missions," by PROFESSOR KENNETH SAUNDERS, of the Pacific School of Religion.

A Journal Read by Statesmen

A special introductory offer of the next 13 numbers of The Outlook for only $1

A RELIABLE, authoritative weekly review of important news is as essential a part of the working equipment of the business executive or professional man as his desk, telephone, or staff of assistants.

In order to make it possible for business and professional men who are occasional readers of The Outlook to become better acquainted with the character of the journal and to see it regularly each week for a trial period at but slight expense, we make the following special offer:

> We will send The Outlook each week for the next three months (13 numbers) for the small sum of $1 to any one who is not now a subscriber. The regular yearly subscription price is $5, and this offer is made to non-subscribers in order to show them what they are missing by not having The Outlook each week.

A World-Famous Editorial Survey

First in position and importance in each issue of The Outlook is the editorial survey of the outstanding events of that week, discussed without partisanship or prejudice and with first-hand knowledge and conviction.

This terse weekly editorial summary and interpretation of the world's news is world-famous. In Japan, for instance, according to one of the leading Japanese publicists, The Outlook is the most popular of all American periodicals. At home it is the most-quoted periodical on the floor of Congress.

Each number contains hours of reading, all of which is bracing, refreshing, and brain-expanding. Distinguished contributors write for every issue. The fascinating running story of the world's progress is prepared for you by eminent journalists, statesmen, diplomatists, scientists, men of letters, artists, educators and business men.

Why You Will Need The Outlook During Your Summer Vacationing

Wherever your summer jaunts may take you, The Outlook will reach you each week. Due to a remarkably efficient change-of-address department, we can guarantee immediate action on all change-of-address orders received by us. Other periodicals often require from two to six weeks to get action on such orders. But no matter how often, or how quickly, you change your summer whereabouts, The Outlook will be there each week to keep you clearly, reliably, and authoritatively informed as to what is happening in the world. Many of our readers will get along without newspapers this summer—but not without The Outlook.

"The Most-Quoted Weekly Journal in America"

You have noticed, of course, that the leading newspapers of the country are almost constantly quoting from The Outlook, which is noted for getting hold of articles of such sharp and timely interest and importance that their publication is actually a matter of news. But why rely upon the fragmentary reports in the newspapers, when you can have the entire, unabridged contents of each week's issue of The Outlook before you for the next 13 weeks for the small sum of only $1?

By starting your trial subscription at once, you will be sure to get all the distinguished articles that are scheduled for the summer.

Is Your Business Insured

Against Losses Caused by Failure to Obtain Accurate Information in Advance of Business Commitments?

The nationally known institutions listed in the column at the left have placed the Encyclopedia AMERICANA in their working libraries as insurance against misinformation.

Losses due to errors of judgment can sometimes be excused. But losses caused by a failure to ascertain available facts are inexcusable.

Executives of large business institutions are learning that an adequately organized Intelligence Section is as vital to the general staff of a business as to that of an army.

It is a pretty small business these days that doesn't directly or indirectly touch the four quarters of the globe, and business executives find that they must have constantly available trustworthy information on a thousand and one subjects.

An up-to-date (not a ten-year-old, pre-war) authoritative reference work of the knowledge of the world is indispensable in modern business.

There is no substitute for the AMERICANA. That is why banks, manufacturing concerns, trading companies and public service corporations throughout the country are ordering it for their executive offices.

Its 80,000 articles by more than 2,000 eminent specialists cover the knowledge and thought of the world of today—not the world of ten years ago, before the Great War revolutionized thought and progress and made a new map of Europe.

Commerce, industry and finance—from the American point of view—are thoroughly and accurately covered.

The AMERICANA is new on every page of its thirty well-printed volumes.

THE AMERICANA is as useful in the home as in the office. It is an ideal gift from one member of the family to another.

At Last—A Chinese Church!

Many Creeds—One Faith

THE confusion of the present time has for many persons but little of cheer. To them modern life is inspired by a spirit of selfishness and hatred that can lead only to chaos. Deeper-seeing minds can detect beneath this unprecedented confusion the tidal heart-beat of a new democracy whose ruling motive is the spirit of brotherhood.

The prophets and poets have usually looked forward in confident hope of this event. The hymn-writers have almost invariably done so. Even when theologians, with their creeds, have divided humanity into groups, the world's great singers have persistently sounded the unifying note of love and fellowship. There is no feature of the hymnal—

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

Edited by CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON
and HERBERT L. WILLETT

which has stirred so much comment as the spirit of Christian brotherhood which prevails throughout the book. Note the following extract from the preface:

> "The editors regard as of greatest significance their discovery through these hymns of a spiritually united Church. Many creeds seem to melt together in the great hymns of Christian experience. A true Christian hymn cannot be sectarian. It belongs to all Christ's disciples. From many sources, far separated ecclesiastically, there comes one voice of common praise and devotion. It is from this perception of a united Church existing underneath the denominational order, a Church united in praise, in aspiration and in experience, and expressing its unity in these glorious hymns, that the title which this book bears was first suggested. Hymns of many creeds are here, interpreting, however, but one faith. It is our hope that wherever these hymns are sung the spirit of unity may be deepened and Christians be drawn more closely together as they draw near to their common Father in united worship."

This great hymnal is preeminently fitted for use in churches where there is an aspiration for real fellowship and cooperation among the followers of the Master

EDITORIAL

Educational Leadership for Sunday School Forces

DURING the past four years a quiet movement of reform has been going on within the Sunday school enterprise, which now reveals itself in the splendid achievements of the recent convention in Kansas City. The election of Dr. W. O. Thompson, president of Ohio State University, as president of the Sunday school organizations for North America was destined to be the beginning of a new epoch. Christian business men of good intentions have led this mighty army of Bible students from time to time, but the hour has struck for the schoolmaster. The church is convinced at last that the Sunday school should be in reality what it always has been in name, a school. The election of Prof. Hugh S. McGill, field secretary of the National Education Association, as secretary of the International Council of Religious Education is in accord with the new movement. The latter is the name by which we will know the organization which directs the Sunday school work of North America henceforth. The change of name is in itself symbolical of a change of ideals. The declared purpose of the lesson committee to work in the direction of graded lessons for all schools is of large significance. This movement is being resisted by a few reactionary voices, but the policy is so well established that it is no longer seriously debated. The period for debate is over. Of course the reform in leadership must yet be carried down through denominational units to the local school. The denominational secretaries are in many instances former ministers and business men instead of trained educators. Many of them carry on their work in blissful ignorance of the things taught in the religious education department of a first class college. In the local church the superintendent of the Sunday school is more often chosen for his ability as a "booster" than for his knowledge of education. The hour for the schoolmaster in religious education has arrived, and the reform that has been accomplished at the top should be carried all the way down to the local school until the religious education of the church can really deserve the ambitious title by which it is designated.

Catholic Welfare Council Agitates Hierarchy

THERE are signs to show that no small perturbation is going on underneath the smooth surface of Roman Catholic ecclesiasticism, in respect to the National Catholic Welfare Council. Rumors run rife and facts are hard to find; but probably not since 1887, when the late Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Ireland championed the cause of the Knights of Labor, has there been such an interest in the outcome of any decision of Rome as that which will affect the activities of the Council. The program outlined by the social action department of the council has been branded as "radical," and that word is as a red rag to ecclesiastics as well as politicians. Father John A. Ryan of Washington, D. C., has been the chief constructive force both in formulating the social principles which have come to be called the Bishop's Program, and the most aggressive champion of a social policy for the Catholic church. The pronouncement of the council is not a whit less "social" and liberal than that made by the Protestant Federal Council of Churches. Archbishop Hanna, of San Francisco, chairman of the administrative committee of the council, has issued a statement in which he says that much that has been going the rounds of the press is inaccurate. No doubt; and we may well await the authentic facts in the matter. None the less it is plain that the vast and venerable communion feels, like the rest of the religious world, the clash of two points of view with regard to the application of Christian principles to world disorder. Even if the Welfare Council should be abolished and its program repudiated in this hour of reaction, it means much that it was formulated and proposed by the most conservative of all communions.

Immortality and the Modern Mind

THE Ingersoll Lecture at Harvard for 1922, by Dr. Kirsopp Lake, dealt with "Immortality and the Modern Mind," and it is a notable utterance. No words of Jesus, he says, have been so sadly minimized as his saying that he who would save his life shall lose it, because for ages men have been thinking of nothing so much as saving their souls. The result has been a type of selfishness all the more repulsive because it is sanctified. But today there is a new attitude of mind, and men have almost suddenly ceased to think about immortality, finding their work more important than their souls—the work of making a better world for their children to live in. "No movement more important than this has affected life in the last hundred and fifty years, and when history has been written at a sufficient distance it will appear as great as the rise of Christianity, far more important than wars or revolutions." Dr. Lake thinks the greatest discovery of our time, so great that it will take a generation to see its full meaning, is that man has the power to control his circumstances in this world so as to make existence better and nobler than it has ever been before. He is so absorbed in this enterprise that he forgets all about saving his individual soul, which is the clearest proof that it is worth saving, and that by making a better world he will bring down to the gate in the mist something which cannot die. Such labor and aspiration beget a sense of unity "which resolves difference yet preserves distinction," a sense of being "a part of one great strength that moves and cannot die," more comforting, more satisfying, than balancing probabilities about individual survival.

Who Is Guilty of the Murders?

NO right minded citizen will condone the killings in Williamson county, Illinois, at the coal mines. No shift of moral teaching can be made to justify one group of workers going out and brutally killing members of another group. Not even the officials of the miners' union condone killing, and much less should any Christian citizen outside the immediate zone of trouble. The report of the coroner's jury which placed the guilt of these killings alone upon the coal company is of course wrong-headed and immoral. Had the report of this coroner's jury distributed the blame for these killings it might have carried public sentiment with it. When once it is said that the men who used the guns are the murderers, there still remains the duty of assessing the moral responsibility of the mine owners. They are accused by the miners' union of using agents provocateurs. Such tactics are now a demonstrated fact in American industry, but as yet there is no evidence to prove their employment in Williamson county. We have only unsupported charges. The essential moral indictment against the operators is that they have refused arbitration. Standing stubbornly by their own selfish interests and against their men, they have acted in a way to harm every citizen in the United States. In bringing in non-union labor to take away the jobs from men who had served them well in the past, they acted in brutal disregard of the obligations that every employer has toward men who serve him. There is a sense in which the report of the coroner's jury in fixing guilt upon the coal operators is justified. Their attitude has been provocative, and they have refused friendly arbitration. It is now time for the government to force the hand of the coal barons. America refuses to face the winter with empty bins. We want no more wholesale killings. The mine operators have proved their inefficiency as industrial leaders. The union officials have proved that they lack the leadership to instill in their followers respect for law and for human life. It is time for the government to set aside these inefficient leaders for leaders who can usher in a force of justice.

American Participation In Near East Inquiry

THE three little republics of the Caucasus are making history. After the armistice Armenia was declared self-governing at Erivan, Georgia at Tiflis, and Azerbaijan at Baku. Governments were set up and a considerable spirit of cooperation was manifested. Then with the growth of the Turkish nationalist movement their life was threatened and as the only visible means of safety they accepted the soviet form of government and the protection of Moscow. Since November, 1920, their situation has not greatly changed. Their boundaries are indefinite, their power is small, their territory limited, their people penniless, and their industries destroyed as a result of the war. The very act of rug weaving, long a national heritage, is only being kept alive because the Near East Relief has rescued native girls from Moslem harems and put them to work under the tutelage of expert rugmakers. Yet the tiny nations cling to the semblance of independence, issue their own stamps and paper money—both about as depreciated as those of Russia from face value—and are pooling their interests under the nominal direction of Moscow. And while they struggle for existence the Turks are reported to be again at the self-imposed task of exterminating all the non-Turkish, non-Moslem groups within their reach. The statements to this effect are convincing, but are not official. So Great Britain has asked France, Italy, and the United States to cooperate in a commission of investigation in Anatolia. After considerable delay and pondering we have added our consent to that of our late allies, and the officers for the commission will be appointed. If they find that massacres are going on, that the plan of the Turks to wipe out all the minority groups is an actuality and not a bit of anti-Turk propaganda, as some would have us believe, then our task as Christians is clear and definite. We may leave it to our government to decide upon the method, but ours must be the decision that action shall be taken to save from annihilation the Greek, Jewish, and Armenian inhabitants of Asia Minor who have not already paid the penalty of their race and their religion.

Motion Picture Producers Are in Politics

MOTION Picture Magazine has stated that the photoplay interests are in politics. The candidates for public office will be quizzed with regard to their attitude toward censorship. Only those who stand utterly opposed to any form of state control will be given support. Just how the theatres will work in behalf of their favorite candidate is not stated, but one must admit that the theatres have in their hands a most valuable agency of political propaganda. A long time ago, the producers sold out to the liquor interests of the country. On the screen there has been the most persistent misrepresentation of the operation of the prohibition laws. So long as law violation is pictured nightly on the screen as a good joke, it is to be expected that people will not have much respect for the law. Church people have patronized the movies along with the "hooch hounds," and probably in larger numbers. They have paid their money for recreation and not for a propaganda which belittles much that religion holds sacred. How little the producers respect this great constituency is manifest in the pictures of Protestant clergymen committing crimes, or making themselves great fools. Ordinarily the church people would be no more interested in censorship of moving pictures than in censorship of sheet music. The moving picture producers have a better weapon against censorship than political action. They have only to listen to their constituency for a little while and then put on pictures that will please their patrons, not those that express the perverted standards of some of the members of the moving picture actors' colony. The Presbyterian church has declared in behalf of censorship. That will be the attitude of most denominations until the evils that are complained of all over the nation are abated.

Operations Without Anaesthetics

CONDITIONS in medical practice in Russia are now past all belief. Surgery is carried on without anæsthetics. There are no materials for modern surgery, and the country lacks almost entirely the equipment to stay the plague of typhus. New patients are doomed by being placed on the old beds where typhus patients have died. The lack of the delousing equipment necessary for an effective fighting of the plague, not only condemns successive patients to death but threatens all the world. To refuse to fight the plague in Russia will in a few months subject all the nations to the same scourge, for plague knows no international boundaries once it gets started. The American Medical Aid for Russia is now organized to receive contributions for the medical staff in Russia. The work of this organization is commended to the Quakers, those good Samaritans to the Russian people. The present call is for one hundred thousand dollars, a sum so small that it should be subscribed over night. The Amalgamated Clothing Workers have contributed fifteen thousand dollars toward this sum. The number of typhus cases in Russia in an ordinary pre-famine year was about a hundred thousand. During 1920 these cases increased to nearly three million. Statistics for relapsing fever are equally alarming. Over a million suffered from this disease in 1920, and the disease grows beyond the power of statistics to keep up with the facts. No man is more deserving of contempt than one who raises the question of political orthodoxy while millions die. Were churches to stand idly by and neglect humanitarian work on account of theological heresy, there would be an out-cry all over the world. Is not this new kind of prejudice an even more damnable thing?

Keeping Victory Christian

THE outraged middle-of-the-road Baptist leader or the discomfited Fundamentalist, whichever he is, who, at the Northern Baptist Convention, scathingly rebuked those who gloated over the routed Fundamentalists, was entirely justified in his rage. It is beside the point to insist that had the rout turned in the other direction, and the victory been with the Fundamentalists, the gloating would have been the pæan of trampling hosts and the cachinnations of ruthless demons. Those so completely worsted by the emphatic liberal tendencies of the Northern Baptist Convention may not deserve pity, but they should get it nevertheless. They have fretted themselves into a feverish zeal for what they esteem to be righteousness. Inquisitors with the power to work their vindictive will are, indeed, a frightful prospect, but, shorn of their power, the last resort of the truly liberal should be the attempt to match or outmatch their vindictiveness. Though it were only a crestfallen Fundamentalist himself who thus cried out for the better and more truly liberal way, his rebuke was just and his appeal was worthy of heeding by the victorious hosts. It is perfectly evident what the Germans would have done if they had won the war. They would have made the reparations now exacted of them seem the merest bagatelle, when it should have lain in their power to exact reparations and add tribute amounting to slavery. But such considerations are no proper guide to the victorious nations of Europe in their treatment of a fallen Germany. They inevitably breed new wars by a vindictive program. If it is desired to continue indefinitely the disgraceful controversies of the past few years in American ecclesiastical circles, only let victorious liberals do to the worsted conservatives what they know would have been done to them had the gauge of theological battle gone to their foes. Nor is this genuinely liberal attitude discounted by the certainty that the reactionaries will mistake lenity for weakness, and will "come back" from their defeat with new venom and vindictiveness. The estate in American religion to which all should strive is not one where the liberal has all his own way, and can keep the conservative and reactionary under, suppressing by spiritual violence or institutional authority the capacities for mischief which the Fundamentalists have developed in such deplorable and vexatious fullness, but rather an estate in which no group whether liberal or conservative shall have the power, or indeed shall desire the power, to dominate and lord it over their foes. It is, on its face, an indictment of our present ecclesiastical system that such a state of affairs can exist as that which has prevailed and still prevails in our American churches.

No ends worth the effort will be attained by establishing the liberals in unrestrained authority, now that the conservatives have been rebuked for their presumptions to power. This is true in the Northern Baptist communion and everywhere else. Battling for place, and influence, and majorities on boards, and the controlling hand in the administration of massive "benevolent" funds, is no way to fulfill the aims and carry out the program of the Christian hope. In such a conflict the devil may as well take the whole at once, for he is bound in the end to get both the victors and the vanquished. Not that the Fundamentalists deserve mercy; mercy is justified in itself, and the gospel of good will is sufficient unto all things. Immeasurably more important than a liberal victory is the vindication of the right to think and believe and work and love in all sincerity each for himself and supremely for the good of all.

The Turn of the Tide

FOR some months apprehension has been felt among the leaders in several of the denominations regarding the aggressiveness of conservatives in their ranks. It has been apparent that reactionary forces were preparing for an attack upon the denominational machinery on the plea that to too great an extent the activities of these denominations were in the hands of progressive or liberal people. No doubt the facts have warranted such a feeling on the part of the conservatives, for in nearly all the religious bodies men of progressive views on biblical and theological questions have proved the constructive workers in the areas of Christian service. A man who has the qualities of vision, information and urgency is likely to be progressive in his convictions on most religious themes. This has been true in most periods of the church.

It is restlessness at this manifest condition in a number of the churches that has led to active efforts on the part of more conservative people to change the nature of the leadership and turn back the current of ecclesiastical control into more sluggish and undisturbed channels. No blame can be attached to such an effort. It is not only the right but the supreme duty of men of faith to contend for that faith as they understand it. It is the constant friction between conservative and progressive that keeps the air stirred and wholesome. It is a sign of the vital and efficient character of our religion. It would be an evil day in any Christian body when all its defenders of the ancient formulas should disappear. Equally unfortunate would be the church in which the spirit of prophecy and agitation subsided. Young men will see visions, and old men will dream dreams to the end of the day.

But the movement in favor of conservativism has been unusually determined since the outbreak of the war. The forces of literalism, obscurantism, millenarianism and the static view of Christianity have taken advantage of the disturbed conditions of public thinking, and have planned a vigorous attack upon the entire body of modern institutions, teachings and hopes. It has been affirmed in loud tones that nothing but a return to the theological ideas of a half century ago could save the church from destruction. Since only a small proportion of the membership of the church has any considerable information regarding the points at issue, or any especial interest in the outcome, the men with loud voices and the air of finality sounded very convincing to a large proportion of the membership of the churches. And there has been no reticence on the part of such propagandists to employ repetition and emphasis, two of the most effective arguments to the popular mind. Among the Presbyterians, the Baptists, the Disciples, and to a certain degree the Congregationalists, this movement has spread. It was feared for a time that it might become really formidable. It looked dangerous. Complete control, or at the very least, division of the ranks was threatened.

Today that crisis appears to be passing. The Presbyterians suffered no defeat of progressive measures, but took several advance steps in the direction of economy, efficiency and a modern attitude of mind. The Baptists, who came together in a tremulous state of apprehension, were astonished at the easy overthrow of the forces of reaction in their midst. It will be surprising if the other religious bodies, whose judicatories are yet to assemble this year do not add other chapters to the story of progressive and constructive achievement. For the drive to create the sense of alarm and pessimism in the church has largely spent its force. The theologies of despair thrive in times of calamity and depression. Out of that period we are surely though slowly emerging. There is little out of which to construct a fabric of reaction. People are thinking more clearly. Popular education is winning its way. The average member of the church is becoming more intelligent. And with the waning of alarm, superstition, literalistic views of the Bible, and apocalyptic hopes, the movement for an overstressed conservatism no longer carries conviction.

Back in the sixteenth century there lived a man who in a humorous story that has attained the status of a world classic furnished a delightful comment upon people who go forth with the best of intentions to demolish the imaginary enemies of their times. Cervantes and Shakespeare died on the same day in 1616. The English dramatist created a world of imagination in which a multitude of figures move, all the children of his brain. The Spanish romancer created one immortal character, who has amused and instructed all the generations since. Don Quixote is the beloved and delightful gallant who had read the romances of chivalry until his mind was full of concern for the defense of unprotected females and threatened causes. Mistaking the windmills and other objects on the horizon for fearsome giants about to ravage the fair fields of Spain, he furbished up an old suit of armor, bestrode his antique and wobbly charger, and set out accompanied by his devoted but comical squire, Sancho Panza, to do battle with all and sundry. His purposes were admirable. There is a certain pathetic dignity about the old knight errant. His chief difficulty was that he lived a century too late to be of any use, and imagined that the lady Dulcinea was a heroine in distress, whereas she was only a poor country wench.

The literalistic, fundamentalist, reactionary group of the present time is the Don Quixote of the new age. There is something genuinely engaging about the devotion with which they take arms against imaginary foes, and go to their own undoing. They are convinced that there is danger in the air, and that the cause of Christianity is threatened. Giants of unbelief are striding about in menacing attitude. What can a brave spirit do in such a time but get to a horse? The weapons are rusty, and the charger is bony and tottering, but away they go, followed by the ludicrous, mule-mounted Sancho, who tries at times to do a little tilting on his own account. And never is the outlandish character of the cause and the equipment comprehended till some commonplace but effective windmill wing knocks horse and hero into an astonished and inglorious heap.

And what are the giants these modern knights-errant are fighting with such unhappy results? One of them is the historical and literary study of the Bible, which has become a new book to the generation of college students, Sunday school scholars in properly administered churches, and others who are availing themselves of the newer learning harvested from the rich fields of archæology, ancient history, linguistic science, and comparative religion. Another is the study of the sciences that deal with the physical world, the biological history of humanity, and the development of human society. This evolutionary discipline has made clear the fact that the Bible has nothing to fear from the most searching inquiry into the story of primitive times, and is little likely to be disturbed by the diatribe and performances of men who in their anti-simian obsession go far toward demonstrating the aboreal origin of the race. If evolution proves itself to be the divine method of procedure, it is as comforting to find that the movement of humanity is upward from lower forms as that it is downward in its tendency.

Another of the dreaded monsters with which our Don Quixotes are tilting today is the social service program of the church. The time of mere individual salvation has passed, and forever passed. There can be no such thing as an isolated Christianity. Society is involved in a common salvation or a common tragedy. It was the task of Jesus to send forth his friends to save a world, and not a few individuals out of the world. The social solicitude of Christianity is one of the most convincing proofs of its divine origin. It is the promise of a new world wherein dwells righteousness.

And if these monsters so much feared by the conservatives in the church today turn out to be no foes at all, but quite useful agencies for knowledge and service, it may also be that those idealized objects of concern, the threatened doctrines of the past, such as verbal inspiration, extreme supernaturalism, the dogmas of election, baptismal regeneration, trinitarianism in its balder forms, and adventism, may prove to be in no sense the fair forms with which the heated imagination of their gallant defenders has clothed them, but like the Dulcinea of the story, only quite unattractive and wholly unconvincing figures, from which the modern mind turns uninterested away.

It may be that one of the aids to faith in this time of pseudo-chivalry in behalf of inconsequential conceptions of the truth is a fresh reading of the humorous and keen-witted Cervantes.

Chinese Christianity Coming of Age

ONE of the leaders of the recent National Christian Conference, just returned from China, tried to make clear, the other day, what happened at Shanghai. "China," he declared, "feels like a man who, a member of a wonderful family, living in a wonderful house, welcomed guests a good many years ago. The guests brought with them some remarkable presents, and during these years the host has been absorbed in studying those presents. Now he suddenly feels that the guests have been guests too long, and he is politely inviting them to cut short their stay. Of course, they can leave the presents, if they want to, and the host will be very grateful. But China is fed up on company, and wants to be alone for a while." Such an interpretation labors under the limitations of all parables but it at least makes graphic the entire change in outlook and spirit that is coming over the Christian enterprise in the far east. And Christians in the west, who may be amazed in the presence of such movements, need to remember what the Chinese Christian is facing these days. For then they will see that these are inevitable developments.

The Chinese Christian sees before himself today a nation in sad moral need. Beneath all the surface disorder he perceives a moral disintegration that promises complete national ruin. He sees any number of new movements attempting to remedy the national ills. The most important of these—the so-called New Tide of Thought—applies the tests of modern scientific criticism to every phase of Chinese life to determine what is fit to survive. Religion comes under as searching scrutiny as any other features of society.

A Christian in China sees the propagation of his own religion held back by its undeniable taint of foreignism. Almost every commission report to the Shanghai conference emphasized this, and the gigantic survey volume, which supplied the facts upon which all the discussions were based, stated that: "In practically two-thirds of China the leadership of the church is still largely in the hands of the foreign missionary." Church order and architecture, administration and hymnody, alike conspire to set the Chinese Christian as definitely apart from his fellows as though he ordered apple pie for breakfast and ate it with a knife and fork in good occidental fashion.

And just at this juncture, when moral needs demand the united service of all the forces of salvation, when minds awakened by new intellectual movements demand an approach in harmony with the scientific standards of the age, and when a rapidly mounting tide of nationalistic feeling precludes the possibility of rallying any large number to foreign shibboleths, the Chinese have seen the missionary body tormented by the emergence of fundamentalism, with its insistence upon division, upon traditionalism, and upon categories essentially western.

In the face of these thngs, the five hundred and more Chinese who came to Shanghai as duly elected representatives of the native church naturally demanded that they be allowed to have their own church, with their own leadership, and with an interpretation of religion that will be progressive, indigenous, and free. Shanghai proved a bad place for men who wanted to perpetuate the issues upon which denominationalism has fattened in the west. One good Anglican bishop who ventured to assure the delegates that they would require the "historic episcopate" in the Chinese church was swept down by derisive laughter from the floor and no one even had the nerve to mention immersion. Chinese took the leadership on the opening day of the conference, and held it. And why should they not, when their spokesman could picture a church that "shall teach her members to agree to differ but to resolve to love?" If such an ideal can be realized, the church in China will prove herself already ahead of the church in the west in respect to the essentials of Christianity.

But one turns from the study of the Shanghai conference with sympathy for the problems that it raises for the mission boards in this country. Think of the caliber of men who must be discovered to work as missionaries in such a ticklish situation! At the conference there was universal agreement that the day of the missionary is not done, but there were multitudinous expressions that his work must be carried on in the background, as adviser and inspirer, able and willing to live most effectively in the lives of others. Not every man, even with advanced preparation can do that. Even harder may be the effort to secure proper support for a church in so vital a world danger-spot, while giving the measure of self-control that will satisfy the aspirations of the Chinese Christians. For those aspirations look toward not only self-control, but a passing of the denominational divisions that have been carried over from the west. How are the boards to deal with such a situation? It is possible that they will fall back on the old dictum that they must retain control until the native church is self-supporting. If they do, it must be in plain contradiction of the judgment of the field, which has said: "Self-support, while closely related to self-government, should not be a condition upon which self-government depends. In some instances self-government may beget self-support. It is better that the two develop as concomitants, each an expression of the spirit of indigenous Christianity."

However, the difficulty of the task does not relieve the boards from the necessity of facing it. For either they will face it, and solve it in a manner that commends itself to the reason of the Chinese (who are probably the world's most reasonable people), or they will find, before another national conference marks the end of this new ten-year period, a revolution on, in which the majority of Chinese Christians will violently cut themselves loose from the church in the west. And, in the face of the age's need of international living, to allow such a catastrophe would be treason to the great responsibilities that face the boards.

There are almost four hundred thousand Chinese Protestant Christians. Four hundred thousand determined men have an influence anywhere. In China just now they can exert a power that may be felt around the globe. If they stand for Christian unity on the basis demanded by the Chinese-composed commission on the message of the Church, they will not only secure that unity for themselves, but they will demonstrate how dead are the issues that now divide their Christian brethren of the west.

Just a little more than a hundred years ago the first Protestant missionary went from the schism-rent Christianity of the occident to the evangelization of China. To this day the impulse of condescending pity has not entirely departed from our missionary determination. But now we hear a voice come back to us from the land where the forms of the first pioneers have scarcely been lost to view: "We confidently hope that the church of China thus united will be able to serve as an impetus to the speedy healing of the broken body of Christ in the west." Christian missions in China and the entire orient have reached a degree of success which now calls for a reconceiving of the whole missionary enterprise by the churches and mission boards of all Christendom.

The Man and the Elevator

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE was a man who lived in a certain Town, and he though himself a Great Man. And in size he was Great, and if in anything he was less than that, I am not here to speak ill concerning him. And he made a Visit to a Great City. And he did some business in an Office upon the Top Floor of an High Office Building. And when he had done his Business, he went out into the Corridor, and pushed the Button for the Elevator. And he looked at the Indicator, and saw that a Car started up Immediately. And he watched the Indicator as it showed that the Car was rising floor by floor.

And there came to him a feeling of Elation. And he said, Behold how the Car cometh up when I push the Button. It is ascending all this way for Me.

And the Car came up and made no stops, for it was the Middle of the Forenoon, when every one was at work save the Elevator Man.

And the Car came straight unto the Top Floor where the man awaited it. And it stopped, and the Elevator Man opened the Door, and there emerged a little Shrimp of a man.

And the man who had been waiting for the Car got in and went down, and his pride went down with the Car.

For he said, Verily I thought that this Car was coming up for my sake alone, and Behold, it no more came up to take Me down, that it came to carry the other man up; and he was not much of a man.

Now I considered this, and I said within myself that it is not well for a man to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; for even the good things and conveniences which are supposed to be the monopoly of the great are largely the things that belong to Humanity in Common. For the rain descendeth upon the just and the unjust, and the sun shineth upon the evil and the good; and a Newsboy can push the Button of an Elevator as effectually as the President of a Bank.

Wherefore be not too proud, for as thou art, so are other men; and thou are not the greatest of them, but only about the Average.

VERSE

The Mother

NOW I lay me down to sleep,
(Lord, hear my prayer!)
I pray the Lord your soul to keep—
(God, are you there?)

You flitted out into the night—
Oh, it was years and years ago;
But still I see the bitter sight,
And cringe beneath the awful blow.

You may be dead, or worse than dead,
Bereft of beauty, spent with lust,
Prowling in alleys where vice seeks bed,
Selling your soul for a moldy crust.

Yet when I lay me down to sleep,,
(Lord, hear my prayer!)
I pray the Lord your soul to keep—
(God, are you there?)

The Rag

LIFE with its thousand, thousand-fold endeavor
Its million, million uglinesses goes,
Its countless wounds to bind and tears unheeded,
—I would avail for Life's unnumbered woes.

"God," then I cried, (mine impotence defeating
My longing wish to serve Him here aright)
"So vast is life, and I so nothing, nothing,— Battered and worn and worsted in the fight—"

"Child, Child of Mine," He answered to my asking
"Be not dismayed that life must limp and lag,
That tears are ever bitterness unmasking,—
For I will use you as men use a rag.
"Hurts that are cruel, wounds all quiet flowing,—
Know you aught better for them than a rag?
Places unclean, and tears in secret going,
Pin-pricks and scratches, and the rubs that nag.

"Not cloth unused, untried by constant wetting,
Nor wrung, nor dried, nor bleached in blazing sun,
But that which loseth stiffness while becoming
Used and more useful, with its service done.

"Not all earth's gold, not earth's most careful housing,
Not even herb roots culled from highest crag,
Can serve for halting, soiled and weeping earth life,
What My hand pleaseth with a simple rag."

. . . . .

Long then I pondered, thought my thought confessing,
"Use me, a rag, but keep me, Lord, I pray,
Cleansed with Thy blood, to rival snowy whiteness,— Fit or to clean or wipe earth's tears away."

In the Aftermath

WHEN War, with flame and scourgings, bowed us down,
Then were we humble, contrite, undefiled;
But when fair Fortune, like an angel, smiled
And flung aside the shadow of her frown,
Then did we feel exalted, while far down
From dizzy heights we gazed, and, earth-beguiled,
Sought world emprise, till, like a foolish child,
We paid life values for a tinsel crown.
Have we not learned from all these bitter years,
The wreck of nations and the flight of kings,
The waste of famine and a sea of tears,
The higher wisdom which life's lesson brings—
That Power, through might external, disappears
Before the judgment bar of Inner Things?

CHARLES R. WAKELEY.

The Patriot

HE who, amid dissent of many minds
Can still possess his soul in quietness,
And reach his final thought despite all stress;
Who lifts his eyes from broken hopes and finds
His visions waiting still; whose patience binds
His deeds into the ends he deems will bless;
Who keeps his faith in God, and none the less
His faith in men; whose rights are all mankind's;
Whose courage meets the dangers of great power
And wields it as a means entrusted him;
Who, rising, fronts the duty of the hour
Backed by its threatened consequences dim;
Lo, who can do these simple, hard, high things,
For him the cry of "Patriot! Patriot" rings.

Salvation by Education

By Joseph Fort Newton

IT is an honor, as well as a joy, to stand even for a brief time in this holy place.* For so I must regard a university, and none more so than this ancient seat of learning built by your fathers, who were also my fathers. Here, in the old dominion, with its heroic history, its life of ordered liberty, its old and sweet customs, its grace and charm of courtesy, stands this city of the mind which is also a home of the soul. About it are gathered the story of great days and the legends of great men, and it has in its keeping the leadership of the commonwealth in the future.

Within these walls and groves gather, year after year, those who are to be the creators and leaders of tomorrow, sitting at the feet of the past the better to mold the future. They come in the greatness and generosity of youth—free, happy, aglow with hope—in quest of truth and the great freedom of the mind which it bestows. Nay, more; they come not simply to learn the story of the world and what man has done and thought and dreamed in it. They come, as a wise teacher has said, "to learn what none may teach, to seek what none may reach, to perpetuate the vision of youth after youth itself has sped."

After the tragedy of recent years, and the terrifying disillusion which followed it, thinking men turn with a new love and yearning toward these cities of refuge and renewal. The world went off its track and out of its orbit for lack of that communal fellowship in the quest of truth and the life of the spirit which is the genius and inspiration of a university. It was a hideous mistake, a stupendous stupidity, the end and issue of following false values; and we must now learn to live together in freedom, justice, and fraternal righteousness.

EDUCATION IS LIGHT

When at last the great guns were hushed, and the sob of grief had become a sigh following the evening sun around the world, an Oxford scholar asked all mankind a question. To England, France, Italy, Sweden, America, China, Japan he put the same question: "What is the leading interest of your country? What do your people really believe in?" The reply was startlingly unanimous, and expressed in one word: "Education." When he varied the question and asked: "What have you learned from the war?" the answer was equally unanimous and emphatic: "We have learned our need of education."

No doubt many would prefer them to have replied: "We have learned our need of religion;" but after all it is much the same thing. Education is light, and God is light. The fact burned into the mind of the world is that the struggle for power, with its mean passions and its monstrous illusions, must give place to the struggle for light, with its wide fellowship and its consecrating enthusiasm. Otherwise, the struggle for power will end in universal revolution, which, in turn, will be only another form of the same struggle for power. Either we must learn or perish, and Wells is not the only man who sees that it is actually a race between education and catastrophe.

George Meredith, in one of his sonnets, compares the world to a peasant staggering home on a dark night toward the light in his cottage window. He is weary and baffled, and he makes wide circles, but every circle brings him nearer to the light. The cry of the world, weary, baffled, and wandering—like the dying cry of Goethe—is for "light, more light." For without light, without vision, the people perish—or, literally, they lose restraint and become a mob and rush down a steep place to ruin. Education is the desire, the struggle to escape from darkness into light; from prejudice, passion, and selfish private-mindedness into "the glory of the lighted mind" and the understanding heart.

LET IN THE LIGHT

Today the world is in twilight—not clear, not dark—pray God it is the morning twilight; the dawn of a day when the rule of force, and even the rule of numbers, must give way to the rule of moral reason and love. But it is yet twilight, and if the mountains are touched with the splendor of the new day, deep shadows still linger in the valleys—shadows of ignorance, of racial rancor, of religious bigotry, and all the slimy things that crawl and breed in the dark. When we devise philosophies, expound theologies, and discover new sciences, let us not forget that two-thirds of our race cannot read what we write, much less follow what we think. The great and final enterprise of humanity is to let in the light, to let in all the light, to let all the light all the way in.

Here lies the glory, and the eternal tragedy, of the teacher, the highest vocation known upon earth and among men—I do not call it an avocation—which even the Son of God did not disdain. Whether the teacher labor in the pulpit, in the college, or in the little school-house by the road, he is a child of the light, a sower of unseen harvests—a reaper, often, of thistles and the wind—a rebel against the stupidity and pettiness of mankind, a persistent antagonist of mental inertia, moral iniquity, and spiritual bondage of every kind. He has joys, victories and satisfactions the sweetest mortals may know here below; but he has also his defeats, his bereavements, his stories of high hopes and grey endings, of clean-minded, dream-lit youth yielding to the low aims of the world.

I.

What is education? In its truest sense it is one with religion, being the faith that the spirit of man only needs to be liberated and enlightened to know and serve the spirit of God. Such a faith breaks through language and escapes. It is both an aspiration and an achievement, a quest and a conquest—not pouring water into a cistern, but opening a spring and releasing a fountain. It is taking youth into partnership in the insight and experience of humanity, joining the generations in a common enterprise.

*This is the baccalaureate address delivered at the University of Virginia, Sunday, June 11, 1922.

It is bringing the wisdom of the past to the service of the present; but also, and much more, the discovery and development of personality, the growth of culture into character, power, ministry. It is life in its fullness, both in freedom and in obligation—health, poise, faith—giving us command of our powers, a share in the human inheritance, a purpose and a goal in life. It unites the three blessings of the beautiful Shakespeare gospel, courage, sanity, and charity—grit, grace, and gumption—and who has these things is an inspiration to his fellows. As Colvin said of Stevenson, "As long as he was there you kept discovering with delight unexpected powers in yourself."

REVERENCE

Let us join together the words of Huxley and Milton, leaving you to find the seam. Education, they agree, is the training of the intellect in the law of nature, and the fashioning of the affections and of the will in an earnest, loving desire to move in harmony with those laws; that a man may be fitted justly, skilfully and magnanimously to perform every office, both private and public. By nature is meant, of course, not only the physical order, but the ways and works of man who is its child and prophet; nature as revealed in the vision of both Huxley and Wordsworth. Goethe was wont to sum it all up in the one word —reverence, to which he gave a threefold meaning—reverence for the swarming forms of life below us, reverence for all that is on a level with ourselves—for all that wears our human shape—reverence for the eternal spirit upon whom we every moment depend. Thus, if we may not define education, we can at least describe its genius and its spirit.

Whence come wars, strife ,and the measureless woes we have witnessed in these later years? From ignorance, and the passions, prejudices and perversions which are the spawn of ignorance. What we need is a better mind, a nobler spirit, more insight, more sympathy, more understanding. Goethe was right when he said that "only through all men can mankind be made," and a true education will show us that the good of mankind as a whole does actually exist; that down below race, nation and sect humanity is one, as beneath the sea the islands are one. No limit can be set to what we may hope of men if once they learn to live with their fellows, and for this we need not only the knowledge that is power, but the knowledge that is love. There is truth enough in the world to redeem it from chaos, if only it is known and obeyed; but the race as a whole lies in darkness. How far the individual can share the enrichment of the better mind of mankind, is the problem and challenge of education. It is a stupendous task, and one to which you are summoned by the chivalry of humanity no less than by the obligations of opportunity. Faith, skill and zeal are needed, and the patience to work and trust the long, slow ways of the struggle for the light.

II.

Three forces will shape the future of our humanity, the democratic principle, the spirit of science and the light and power of an emancipated religion. These three forces must work together, if we are to escape a conservatism without sympathy, a radicalism without sense, and a future without disaster. Democracy is inevitable. Nothing can stop it. Industry, no less than politics, must yield to its sway. But democracy is not enough. It is only the raw truth and fact about life—fluid, plastic, prophetic—waiting to be wrought into shapes of usefulness and beauty. Unless an inevitable democracy can be enlightened by science and evangelized by spiritual faith, the future will be drab and dingy. Massed ignorance does not make wisdom. Truth is not revealed by the counting of noses. Long ago Lowell said that "democracy is an experiment," and the experiment is not yet complete. Without moral idealism, without spiritual leadership, without practical fraternity, democracy will fail.

Fifteen years ago Wells wrote "The Future in America," and, apart from his theories, it is still one of the most valuable books of its kind, for its brilliant observation, its keen insight, its suggestive synthesis, and its radiant sympathy. He saw America whole, saw it sprawling wildly and helplessly over a vast continent—its profusion, its litter, its lack of discipline. He felt its vitality, its power, its youth. He went to Ellis Island and shook his head at the crude material pouring in—Russian Jews, South Italians, Ruthenians—wondering how America could assimilate it and remain America. He saw the golden dome of Boston, and the hinky-dink saloon in Chicago, the hideousness of child labor, the tragedy of color, the rampant haste and disorder, the splendor and the squalor. His words are implacably honest, bitingly clear, finely tactful. He shivered at Chicago and was confused by New York. The black belts of the South made him quiver with sensibility:

REORGANIZATION OF SOCIAL LIFE

"What is going to happen to America in the next thirty years or so? For a time I forgot my questionings: I sincerely believed, 'These people can do anything,' and, now I have it all in perspective. I have to confess that doubt has taken me again. 'These people,' I say, 'might do anything. They are the finest people upon the earth—the most hopeful. But they are vain and hasty; they are thoughtless, harsh and undisciplined. In the end, it may be, they will accomplish nothing.' What is needed is a focussing moral and intellectual, to resolve a confusion of purposes, traditions, habits, into a common ordered intention. The essential question for America is the organization of her social life upon the broad, clean, humane conceptions of modern science."

Nobody now regards democracy as a panacea, as we were apt to do not so long ago. The war, if it did nothing else, shattered our fatalistic optimism and the evasive idealism which prefers shams to realities. Anyway, we can no longer trust to the great god muddle to carry us through, as we have been wont to do in days agone. Energy without direction, success without stability, an all-pervading mediocrity, and the apotheosis of the average—it is a dismal outlook! The formlessness of democracy, its crazy instinct for ugliness, its inability to supply any moral standard at all, fill thoughtful men with dismay akin to despair. Yet if democracy fails, what then? The Greeks had a proverb, If water chokes, what can we drink to stop choking? Even James Bryce, who knew democracy as no one has known it in our day, died with the question unanswered—though he was too wise to yield to "the pessimism of experience."

III

Salvation is by education; the only way to make a better democracy is by putting our best into it. No one can make bread rise from the outside; the yeast must be mixed with the dough, if we want it to leaven the whole lump. By standing apart, by taking a balcony view of democracy, by putting on airs as if it were not good enough for us, we do all the harm we can. Each of us must get down in the midst and do his part, in behalf of that intellectual culture without which manhood is rudimentary, and that spiritual character without which intellect is the slave of greed or passion. Cynicism, pessimism, contempt for the rabble, are streaks of yellow, not tokens of culture. Democracy is the faith that every soul that God sends into the world is good for just so much of His inspiration as giveth him understanding. Unless our education evokes in us such a faith and sends us to its fulfilment in a spirit of service, it fails.

When we ask which of all types of modern men is the most hopeful of the future, the answer is not far to seek. It is the man of science, no doubt because he is in constant and sparkling contact with incredible sources of power, and his forward glance has back of it a vision of the slow ascending struggle of man toward the light. Dealing with human nature in its growth he sets no limits to its powers of goodness and activity, and if he errs it is in believing that with new method we can make new men. He warns us of our dangers, but he does not doubt that we can overcome all obstacles and make the reign of man wider, firmer, and more triumphant than it has ever been. He holds the daring faith that poverty, disease, and disorder—all the welter of ills that afflict us—need not and must not be. They are not inscrutable things to be accepted fatalistically, as decrees of providence; they are due to human ignorance and improvidence. They can be defeated by the advance of knowledge—only we must learn to act with all our fellows, and strive for unity instead of mere power.

VICTORIES OF SCIENCE

No fairy story was ever more fantastic than the plain tale of the victories of science in our day. It is more romantic than any romance, and no one can tell what a day may bring forth. Indeed, if science develops according to promise, we are on the eve of amazing revelations, as if about to tap an inexhaustible reserve, at the bottom of which wonders wait. Its daring of adventure is only equalled by its ingenuity of invention, which has made the world a neighborhood, a whispering gallery, and a hall of mirrors. But more important than the results of its research is its spirit, its faith, its insight, outlook and point of view; its revelation of the reign of law as the organized will of God. Today men see that the will of God is a holy unity, an unbroken rhythm, and that they must learn how to do it—how to release a power which they know is ever present. How fascinating it is to see the eager, aspiring mind of man trying to lay hold of the mighty hand of God, and make the world after a truer pattern!

Let us rejoice in the spirit of science—so austere, so single-hearted in its quest of truth, so disinterested in its service of humanity—as a revelation of the Holy Spirit. It is a new Pentecost, God speaking to us in its humility, its veracity, its love of truth, its willing obedience, no less than in its beneficent ministry to body, mind, and soul. Perhaps by its devotion, by its patience in tracing out the laws of God, science will put us in the way of finding how our lumbering, blundering democracy can be resolved into a "common ordered intention," and not wobble on haphazard and at random. Our hope lies in a scientific and spiritually-minded education, the training of the new generation in the knowledge of the laws of God and in humble, loyal obedience to his will. What will not science do for us when once men see that its laws are the habits of God, its forces his angels, its truth his living presence!

IV

Democracy is fellowship, science is knowledge, religion is love; and these three are friends. But religion must be emancipated from bigotry, ignorance, and fear of the truth—uniting a free mind, a skilful hand, and a heart of fire. Religion as a huddle of sects, divided about lilliputian issues, is not equal to the needs of today. Already it is beating a retreat, fighting a rear-guard action; but religion in its real sense broadens, deepens, and grows. The faith by which men live today is not a set of dogmas simple and definite, and as lifeless as the multiplication table. It is the instinct to explore God, to trace out his will for man and his purpose for the world; the faith that the kingdom of God will be built by the effort of man himself toward his own ideal in obedience to the laws of God. It is the action of the soul, the dynamic of love, the fellowship of light—living in the truth that the spiritual alone is real, enduring, creative, triumphant!

Upon this faith in the enlargement of the soul, enlightened by science and led to finer issues by spiritual reality, we must build the future. The city of God will never be built until men are ready for it. Democracy cannot make them ready. Nor science nor magic. It is as though the world has to be redeemed by man, and the creative faith of today is that there is a spirit moving in man, greater than man himself, equal to the task. It is a new and deepened doctrine of the incarnation, in that it reveals God at work in man, through man, slowly building the beloved community. Rodin modelled a mighty hand of God, holding within it man and woman. Shaw asked the sculptor: "I suppose you mean your own hand after all?" Rodin replied, stating the real faith of our day: "Yes, as the tool!" The city of God will be built by the hand of man, taught by the truth of science, and moved by the spirit of God!

Always we come back to the "little, infinite human heart," the discovery and exploration of which is the great adventure of our time. It is not an accident that poets and novelists, from the days of George Eliot down, have turned more and more to the study of the soul. They have enlarged our knowledge of the human spirit; and what they began is now being carried forward by the new psychology, social as well as individual, which, in alliance with the new biology and an emancipated religion, will change the history of mankind. Unless all tokens fail, we are moving toward a scientific spirituality, and it will be defined in terms of education, making us masters of the secret places of the heart. Life is from within outward, and just as we now see that the universe is all of a piece—whether we study the stars in the sky or the exquisite astronomy of an atom—so we are beginning to see that the inner life is no less a realm of law, obedience to which makes us one with Him "in whose will is our peace." It is the old faith in a new insight, showing us the realities of religion not only as forces of history, but as facts of the cosmic order; in which the words of Jesus shine like suns and stars.

STUDY OF THE SOUL

Already we can read here a line and there a stanza in a new chapter in the history of faith, and we see that it is the eternal faith in new forms, evoking new visions, and leading to new enterprise. It is from the heart of man that the new proceeds; it is the community that conserves the old. Hence the struggle, strain and tragedy of transition, as when a young man, trained in the old habits of thought—in the home and the village church—enters a university and finds himself in an inferno of uncertainty, torn by unsilenceable questions. Wisdom, sympathy and tact are needed, if it is not to become a dreadful alternative between the faith of his heart and the integrity of his mind. Here lies the tragedy of the attack on science in the name of the church, so disastrous to all the higher interests of humanity!

Howbeit, our duty is not to be orthodox, but to be true; not to be liberal, but to be real. God lives, and no precious thing will be lost, if we have the courage to follow where the spirit of truth leads. As one who knows the bitter agony of the struggle through which so many elect youth are passing, let me say with all possible emphasis that there is no conflict between the last found fact of science and the old, deep pieties of the heart. Such a dilemma simply does not exist. God is not divided, and my counsel to young men in their perplexity is after this manner:

COUNSEL TO THE YOUNG

Think of God in the light of the highest truth your mind can know and the purest ideal your heart can dream; but learn to find him everywhere, in your own soul, and in all the shapes which life and love and duty take.

Read the meaning of life as a quest and a conquest, in terms of freedom, fellowship and service; but live it nobly, erect and unafraid, seeking its true values, obeying the law written in the heart by the Lord of all good life.

Make your own creed out of the truth learned by living—make it broad enough to include the purest, freest soul the earth has known, in whose friendship there is power—and be as tolerant of others as you are severe with your own soul.

The impulses by which humanity is moved have been divided into two classes, the creative and the possessive. Hitherto, alas, the possessive impulse has been all dominant, making society a scramble for gain, a jungle of snapping, snarling envy. Only a few here and there have lived the creative life, learning that it is more blessed to give than to receive. By the grace of God and the moral intelligence of mankind, the old order must be reversed, giving the creative impulse the larger part and the freer play, and the possessive impulse the lesser place. Here is the whole secret of the nobler life and the better world of which we dream—in the choice which each one makes in his own heart between materialism and spirituality, between selfishness and service—and it brings us face to face with him who called himself the light of the world. His words still speak: "Go ye and learn what that meaneth."

What can we do for the world while we live? Happy is the man, who, in high or humble lot, lives to serve the best; with the results of his life time will content him. Though he may have learned to spell only here a word and there a line of that mystical, prophetic book, the lexicon of which lies in eternity, he will have least to regret, and nothing to fear, when he comes to the final examination, if he has been true to the highest within himself, and has kept undefiled and undefeated the truths that make us men. The little Drinkwater poem, "A Prayer," puts it vividly for each of us:

"Grant us the will to fashion as we feel,
  Grant us the strength to labor as we know,
Grant us the purpose, ribbed and edged with steel,
  To strike the blow."

Trust the Great Artist

TRUST the Great Artist. He
  Who paints the sky and sea
With shadowed blue, who clothes the land
In garb of green, and in the spring
Sets all earth blossoming—
He guides your destiny.

The magic hand
That colors dawn with flaming rose,
That ere the falling night,
For every soul's delight,
Pours out the streaming gold—
That hand too holds your life.

His grasp, amid the strife,
Would shape you to his will:
Let him his wish fulfill.
What though the testings irk,
Fret not: mar not his work.
Trust the Great Artist, he
Who made the earth and sea.

At Last—A Chinese Church!

By Paul Hutchinson

THE newspapers, even in China, gave comparatively little space to the National Christian council that met in Shanghai, May 2-11. General Wu Pei-fu was engaged at that time in convincing General Chang Tso-lin that there was no widespread demand for a monarchical coup at Peking, and the reporters naturally fixed most of their attention on that argument. But when the history of the first century of the Chinese republic comes to be written, the Shanghai meeting may outweigh the Chihli fighting in importance. For almost two weeks more than a thousand delegates, a majority of whom were Chinese (if you leave out of account the visitors from other lands), wrestled with the problems that confront Christianity in China. And out of that wrestling there came the conviction that there is possible a more victorious type of Christian effort, which can save the entire nation from the disaster that threatens, and in that salvation save the world.

Delegates at Shanghai gathered in much the mood that is supposed to mark men who live atop a volcano. There was the civil disruption, for one reason. But much more than that, there was the fear that at any time the issue between theological, conservative, and radical might be forced on the floor, and the Christian cause be split beyond hope of healing. Guerilla warfare, opened through a daily newspaper on the leaders of the conference at its very beginning by one of the prominent conservative missionaries, might easily have led to general hostilities. But a split was avoided, and a statement of faith acceptable to both sides adopted, largely because the conference, sensing the danger, had wise guidance; because most of the conservatives proved to be in a moderate mood; and, most of all, because the Chinese, who dominated the gathering, wouldn't stand for it.

FUNDAMENTALISM KILLED

The temper of the Chinese was made perfectly clear when the report of the Chinese-composed commission on the "Message of the Church" was made public, and even more when Dr. Timothy T. Lew, of Peking, made the speech that gave him the commanding voice. At the climax of Dr. Lew's masterly depiction of the Chinese church that must be, he declared: "The Chinese church shall stand for, nay, even fight for, unity in diversity. She shall teach her members to agree to differ, but to resolve to love. To allow partisanship to monopolize our thinking at this hour will be an unpardonable sacrilege." Men who might have conveniently forgotten the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians could not dodge that warning. It served notice on any incipient heresy-hunters that they would have no large Chinese following. It killed "fundamentalism" before the conference was three days old.

The delegates at Shanghai found awaiting them a mammoth volume, "The Christian Occupation of China," containing an exhaustive survey completed by the China continuation committee after more than three years of effort. Never has a similar body been in possession of so great a group of facts. They likewise were faced by five reports, printed volumes of from 35 to 125 pages, dealing with The Present State of Christianity in China, The Future Task of the Church, The Message of the Church, The Development of Leadership for the Work of the Church, Coordination and Cooperation in the Work of the Church. These reports made clear the weakness of the old religions.

> The present-day religion of the people has become largely an empty form. Even those who live by religion are for the most part stupid and ignorant of its meaning. The spirit of the old religions in China has already been lost; what is the use of the mere outward shell that remains? (Commission III, 9, 10.)

They rejoiced in the rapid growth of Protestant Christianity.

> The first missionary conference in China was held in 1877. At that time the communicant strength numbered less than 14,000. In 1890, when the second great conference convened, the Protestant church membership had increased threefold (37,287). By 1907, when the third great conference was held, thirty years after the first conference, an increase of thirteen fold was reported. When the National Christian conference meets in May, 1922, the numbered communicant strength of the Protestant church in China will approximate 375,000. This is over four-fold the strength of the church twenty years ago, to say nothing of the great increase in native leadership, large Christian institutions and the influence of the Christian church, all of which are beyond the power of figures and words to describe. (Commission I, 2.)

BEYOND MISSIONARY CONTROL

But they showed a church that had passed from the stage of missionary control, that was feeling toward complete self-government, and clear that its future must include certain elements. They showed a church determined to discard present denominational divisions.

> We Chinese Christians who represent the leading denominations express our regret that we are divided by the denominationalism which comes from the west. . . .
> Yet we recognize fully that denominationalism is based upon differences, the historical significance of which, however real and vital to the missionaries from the west, are not shared by us Chinese. Therefore, denominationalism, instead of being a source of inspiration, has been and is a source of confusion, bewilderment, and inefficiency. . . .
> Therefore, in the name of the Lord, who prayed that all may be one, we appeal to all those who love the same Lord to follow his command and be united into one church, catholic and indivisible, for the salvation of China.
> We believe that there is an essential unity among all the Chinese Christians, and that we are voicing the sentiment of the whole Chinese Christian body in claiming that we have the desire and the possibility to effect a speedy realization of corporate unity, and in calling upon missionaries and representatives of the churches in the west, through self-sacrificial devotion to our Lord, to remove all the obstacles in order that Christ's prayer for unity may be fulfilled in China.
> We confidently hope that the church of China thus united will be able to serve as an impetus to the speedy healing of the broken body of Christ in the west. (Commission III, 2, 3.)

They showed a church with a reverent, but modern, attitude toward the Bible.

> We believe that since the Bible is the word of God, the truth of God fears no test. It can stand any investigation of a reverent heart. We wish to make known that we fear no application of any genuine scientific method to the study of the Holy Scriptures.
> But we wish to make it clear that the study of the Holy Scriptures should not merely be for its literary or intellectual interest, but should mainly and primarily be for the guidance of actual living. We as a church hereby renew the pledge to follow the light of Holy Scripture in our individual, social and national living. . . .
> The Bible is not a textbook or a mere history; it is wholly a religious book. If the Bible is studied with a reverent heart and religious spirit, there will be discovered in it endless treasures, and the longer the search the greater will be the pleasure of the seeker. (Commission III, 5, 24.)

APPRECIATION OF SOCIAL GOSPEL

They showed a church with a full appreciation of the need for the social gospel in its fullest implications.

> The object of Jesus is to organize the whole of society on the foundation of love. The social needs of China today differ from the needs of the time of Christ in Judea. The needs of other countries also differ from those of China, but the reform of society in China is most urgent, and love should be the foundation of the new social structure. This is the glad tidings of Jesus to the Chinese people today. (Commission III, 22.)
> China's response to the social message is unique in history. . . . Any organization that will unselfishly promote social uplift, show men the way to secure larger results for themselves and their fellows in life and happiness, will find a ready response on the part of the Chinese. . . . Whether or not philanthropy in the future, and health work, sanitation, and general reforms, will be considered as springing from Christianity, or merely scientific and materialistic, depends to no small extent upon the social workers of the present hour and the immediate future. (Commission IV, 27.)
> The church, by all means in its power, shall bear witness to, and secure the recognition of, such fundamental Christian principles as:
> 1. The inestimable value of every human life; involving the duty of safeguarding the individual from conditions and hours of labor directly injurious to life, and the recognition of the right of the individual to a certain amount of leisure and to opportunities for development and self-expression.
> 2. The dignity of all labor, whether skilled or unskilled, that ministers to the common good; involving the right of every worker to a fair reward for labor performed.
> 3. The brotherhood of man; involving the conception of cooperation in service, and such mutual relationships in industry as exclude the selfish exploitation of labor by employers and capitalists.
> That the church further emphasize the responsibility of every Christian to apply these principles to whatever relationship he or she may sustain as a producer, consumer, employe, employer or investor. (Commission II, 94.)

DETERMINED ON SELF CONTROL

But, more than all these, they showed a church determined to control its own life. There were plenty of tributes to the generosity and wisdom of the missionary control of the past, but something different was demanded for the future.

> It is the view of the commission that the time has come for the subordination of the activities of all (foreign missionary societies and their boards) to the advice and direction of the Chinese ecclesiastical authorities. The primacy of the Chinese church, and the subordination thereto of the foreigner and his mission organization, will be felt throughout the commission's report. . . .
> It is desirable in certain fields for foreign missionaries to be related to and serve under the direction of constituted ecclesiastical authorities and they should have the same status as corresponding indigenous workers have.
> In general it is desirable that decisions as to appointment, number, qualification, location, and work of missionaries be made by bodies on which there are representatives of the church or which are themselves the properly constituted courts of the church. . . .
> We feel that, so far as the coast provinces of China at least are concerned, the end of the mission enterprise as now organized is near enough to affect vitally all future mission policy. All new work in these regions now contemplated should be projected upon the assumption at an early date of Chinese support and control. (Commission II, 2, 4, 6.)

There is no space for further quotation, and, after transcribing these, one has the fear that they do not begin adequately to give the sense of demand for self-control that marked the Shanghai conference as a whole.

CHINESE DOMINATE

There were more than five hundred foreigners at Shanghai, and, from time to time, many of them got the floor. But it was a Chinese-dominated affair. The two commission reports that were purely Chinese products (Commissions III and IV) were the outstanding documents; men like Timothy Lew, T. C. Chao, Cheng Ching-yi and Lo Ren-yen were the outstanding men. The Chinese not only claimed leadership; he demonstrated it. And it was leadership of a strongly progressive brand.

When the conference adjourned, what had happened? The end of the period of foreign control had been marked. From now on the Chinese will have a full share in the management; before long they will have it all. The chance to saddle fundamentalism on the Chinese church had been lost. The ability of the younger group of Chinese leaders had been demonstrated. A National Christian council, to represent all the churches and missions, had been elected.

Perhaps no more could be hoped from so large a body in so short a time. But the council, it must be admitted, comes into being with extremely dubious powers. If the interpretation of some who voted for it is followed it will be only a body meeting annually to discuss problems, without the ability to conduct extensive and united campaigns on the part of the Christian forces for the solution of those problems.

AGGRESSIVE LEADERSHIP NEEDED

It is hardly possible, however, that this can long remain a satisfactory program for the council. There is great need of the same sort of aggressive leadership that the China continuation committee gave during the nine years of its existence. Under the old body almost every conceivable kind of nation-wide movement was promoted, and to this same sort of leading the new council will have to come. If it does not, it will hardly justify its existence.

To the secretaryship of the new National Christian council, Bishop Logan H. Roots, of the Episcopalian diocese of Hankow, has been elected. It is not known whether Bishop Roots will accept the election, but if he does he will bring to his office a record of years spent within a conservative mission loyally working for Christian union on the broadest of bases.

It is reported that many of the Chinese who were at Shanghai went away believing that, with the adoption of the statement of faith, the "one big union" church of China had come into being. Such, they are now discovering, was not the case. But they can at least have the satisfaction of knowing that they made the Chinese position abundantly clear, and that if the church as a whole in China stands by that position for a few years, the disappearance of western denominationalism is as sure to come as sunrise. Shanghai 1922 has given the west the first clear earnest of the new vigor that is to be infused into Christianity from the Far East.

The Phenomenon of William L. Stidger

By Lynn Harold Hough

THE ways of genius are curious and bewildering and often fascinating and some times irritating. The man with the unusual secrets of personality which cause him to be able to capture the imagination of other men and the powers of expression which cause his words to remain as a haunting memory in their minds is always worthy of study. Six years ago William L. Stidger was known only on the Pacific coast. He had gone to a little church in San Francisco which humanly speaking had no future. He had invented the revolving electric cross now familiar on the churches of so many cities. He had known how to make people feel that they must hear him and even as the moving light of the cross on his church attracted their eyes so his words attracted their minds. The untamed city with the heart of the passionate wilderness under its garments of civilization began to be aware of this masterful energetic voice. The exposition became his personal opportunity. He became the very incarnation of its incarnation of its enthusiasm, its idealism and its love of beauty. With his friend Paul Smith, Mr. Stidger entered into the fight to clean up the town. Perhaps the greatest tribute to his influence was the bitter word of one of his toes which cut with resentment at the attempt to "Stidgerize" San Francisco. With an amazing comradeliness, with a constant capacity to strike hard blows all the while keeping a friendly light in his eye, with a flare for publicity which was uncanny in its understanding of the popular mood, the work of this extraordinary young minister went on.

His first book, if we pass by a little volume of verses on Lincoln, was published in 1918. It was called "Giant Hours with Poet Preachers," and it glowed with enthusiasm for such singers as Edwin Markham, Vachel Lindsay, Joaquin Miller, Alfred Noyes and Robert Service. Mr. Stidger put writers together in his book who would not have enjoyed meeting each other at the dinner table. That did not at all matter to him. They all had something to say to his eager mind and to his responsive heart. He loved them all. And he wrote about them with an abandon of affection.

By this time we were in the war, and off to France went William L. Stidger. On the western front he was as individual and picturesque as ever. He took risks without a thought of hesitation which exhibited the most virile courage. He was ready to be the chum of any man who had a touch of humanity in him. He was ready to fight a bully of a man who said some thing reflecting on the clergy. He was full of good cheer and heartiness, a good man to have near in hard days. It was after a rather vigorous physical encounter that the boys began laughingly to call this athletic young minister "Gyp the Blood." After exciting experiences and a real personal contribution to the lives of the men with whom the Young Men's Christian Association had given him the opportunity to work he returned to America. Here his first act was to storm the great publishing houses in New York. His magnetic attack was not of the sort to be resisted. In a short time Scribner's published a fascinating volume of war experiences entitled, "Soldier Silhouettes on our Front." and the Abingdon Press published a striking volume, "Star Dust from the Dugouts." Both of these books had the inevitable human touch his friends were coming to associate with Mr. Stidger's work. They had a vividness which brought scenes in the war area to your very eyes. They had a shining idealism and yet they brought you in contact with real men and real situations. You saw the jewel blazing in the soldier's heart.

To a mind with so sensitive and responsive a surface such experience were sure to be the beginning and not the end. Off to the Orient went this man of magnetic vitality. He traveled in China, Japan and Korea, and other parts of the far east. He saw missionaries from an angle from which they had hardly been viewed before. He let the east play upon his mind and heart. The subtle sensuous appeal of a million distilled emotions which the west scarcely comprehends spoke to his delicately tuned temperament. The political situation in Korea, the aggressive energy of Japan were facts of fire in his heart. He saw Japan through the eyes of a Californian who had learned to distrust Japan. He saw Korea with the bold chivalry of a man to whom the declaration of independence was food and drink. He had some rather dramatic experiences as a result of all this and when his book, "Flash Lights from the Seven Seas" was published it was like a cavalry charge against Japan. It was not a question of the careful appraisal of the facts. It was the fiery reaction of a young knight in armor who had found a cause. But through it all the readers felt the authentic note of the east, that subtle quality which so few travelers can make actual when they return to western lands.

Mr. Stidger became the pastor of a church in Detroit. Saint Marks was a wonderful white elephant. One wonders to this day at the audacity of the man who undertook to face its problems. Arriving in Detroit on Saturday evening to begin his new pastorate on the next day, Mr.

Stidger through a simple act of human kindness to a hurt child that same evening found himself next day on the front page of the city's dailies. He advertised his church with an individual quality of appeal which won instant results. Soon the big church was packed. Soon everybody in the city was talking about its ministry. All his uncanny gifts for publicity and for appealing to people when they came within range, were brought to bear on the situation and the result has been a really dramatic success. In a city with powerful preachers on every hand he has created a clientele large and loyal of his own. His book, "Standing Room Only," tells the tale so that he who reads may run to the attempt to repeat its victories.

The dramatic book sermons which are used by the minister of Saint Marks form a part of his unusual appeal. He has just published a volume, "There are Sermons in Books" which brings this sort of material within reach of those who must meet the author in his book rather than in his church. It is a volume sure to be productive in a far reaching way. The fashion in which a heart of moral and spiritual meaning is extracted from contemporary books is itself a demonstration of Mr. Stidger's power. It may be a novel like Bojer's "Treacherous Ground." It may be a volume like, "The Glass of Fashion." There is always a sure sense of popular appeal. And there is always moral passion and spiritual aspiration. The love of contemporary singers is still alive in this preacher's heart. "Flames of Faith" will tell you of Angela Morgan and John Drinkwater and Edgar Guest and many another. It is not criticism. It is friendly talk. And out of it all in the author's entirely unconventional way you are brought into the presence of many a bit of writing glowing with a light divine.

Mr. Stidger himself has written much verse. Once and again he attains very fine form indeed. And there is a melody, a delicacy and a charm about some of his verses which his readers will not forget.

It is easy to criticize a man like the minister of Saint Mark's church. He breaks all the rules. And he is never conscious that he breaks them. They simply do not exist for him. The apostles of the disciplined mind moving with patience and caution from fact to fact and at last to generalization will instinctively draw back from a type of mind so different from his own. Mr. Stidger's writing gives us life mirrored in a temperament and not life analyzed by a remorselessly scientific mind. It is significant that a poet of the subtle mental sword play of Edwin Arlington Robinson makes no particular appeal to him. His own mind is wholesome and direct and has little place for the evasive play of the highly articulated and sophisticated writer. All of this gives him a surer popular appeal. He has written pages which have caught the secret of masterful and direct appeal to the people which you find in Arthur Brisbane. If one may speak for a moment in the terms of Henri Bergson whatever Mr. Stidger lacks it is sure that he possesses the élan vital. He is young. He is full of sound feeling. He has a heart of chivalry ready to respond to the deep and mastering summons of the social passion. He has a simple and noble sense of the ministry of religion. He has an instinctive understanding of the typical experiences of the men and women who move about us in the busy streets of the great towns and who think long thoughts in the lonely countryside. He will never be an Erasmus. But he may go far.

Brother Martin

By Arthur B. Rhinow

LUTHER is drowsy. He is working on his war sermon against the Turks, for the enemy of Christendom has reached the walls of Vienna, and Europe trembles. Did not Constantinople fall less than a hundred years ago?

On the old desk, before him, lies the manuscript, every letter bearing testimony to a masterful hand. He calls the Turks Gog and Magog, and appeals to his countrymen to fight the common enemy with the bravery displayed by their forefathers in staying the Romans. He asks them to march under the banner of the emperor to whom God has entrusted the authority of temporal power.

He has written with the fire of a prophet. But now he feels drowsy, and his head nods. He begins a reverie of Worms, and Spires, and Marburg.

The massive head jerks up. Ah, yes, the Turks! He seizes the quill again. But the strain of hard work is asserting itself, and he nods again.

There! Was that Philip Melanchthon calling him? No; the voice was softer, like a gentle purr.

"Martin!"

Luther looks up. It is late in the afternoon, near November. Who is that standing over there near the door? A monk in the garb of the Augustinian order. Luther smiles.

"Brother Martin!" the voice pleads.

"What is it, brother?"

"I have come to advise you. You are making a big mistake."

"Are you with us or against us," asks the voice that is feared by princes.

"I want to advise you for your own good. You are making a big mistake."

"What mistake?" Even the voice seems to bristle.

"Martin, Martin! You are a good man, and a prophet. But you don't know much of the ways that lead to victory. You are as innocent as a dove, but in addition you ought to be as wise as a serpent. You know that is the great injunction."

"Now, look here!" The visitor draws nearer. It is growing darker. The deep eyes of Luther are strangely luminous.

"Here you are preparing a sermon against the Turks," the velvet tones proceeded; "and really they are your friends. So long as the Turks batter against the walls of Christendom, the emperor cannot carry out the decree of Worms and the wishes of the Pope. The Lutheran heresy—he smiled understandingly—has a chance to take deeper root and grow and spread so long as the crescent can keep the cross busy. And here you are urging your countrymen, even the Protestants, to fight with the emperor against the Turk. Pardon me, Martin; but that is foolish of you. A great man like you ought to be more of a general. You could afford to send secret emissaries to encourage Solyman and his generals."

Luther fumbles the ink bottle.

"Look at the king of France," the visitor continues. "He is a shrewd man. His aim is to weaken the power of the emperor, and to that end he befriends the Protestants of Germany. Personally he does not like you and your friends. His heart is Catholic. In his own country he would look with scant favor upon the heresy, as they call it. But he knows that the German Protestants are a thorn in the emperor's side, and he is taking pains to keep the point as sharp as possible. That is diplomacy. Francis has penetration."

Luther is breathing heavily. The air is thick.

"And your cause is greater far than the cause of Francis or France. Your end would justify all means."

Luther is bending over, as though suddenly recognizing his adviser. The visitor's voice softens down to a whisper.

"And you understand, Martin, nobody need to know of the commission excepting one or two trusted men."

With a jerk Luther rises, and flings the ink bottle at the saturnine intruder. A crash wakes him. Bewildered, he hears his Katie chiding, as she points to a black spot on the wall.

The Ku Klux Klan

IN THE Republican primaries in Oregon recently the governor of the state was nearly defeated for renomination by a state senator who based his campaign on the governor's opposition to the Ku Klux Klan. The governor's attitude toward the Klan was applauded by most of the newspapers and approved by ministers and other leaders in community morals, but he pulled through by only a small margin. There were other issues, but they seemed subordinate to that of the klan and the klan pushed the fight.

In Texas the Democratic senatorial primary contest similarly pivots around the klan. Senator Culberson is being opposed by Representative Henry, who stakes his campaign boldly upon the klan issue. Senator Culberson declares it should be destroyed, while Mr. Henry replies, "The Ku Klux Klan must and shall survive in Texas and throughout the country," and declares, "I am a natural born klansman. They didn't have to make me one. I received great benefit when I took fellowship in the Methodist church. I received great benefit when I went through the Masonic degrees. These all made me a better man. But when I read the creed of the klan a new religion came over me."

The congressman goes on to defend the klansmen as men "who believe in constitutional government, in obedience to the laws of the country," and says "the klan believes in Christianity." Though "we do not come to make war upon any religious organization, we do claim the right to exercise our own liberty in the choice of our religion and of our churches. If the citizens of Texas and of this country will cling to the doctrines enunciated there, they will preserve our homes and our country."

Why the Klan?

An organization that numbers thousands does not come into existence without a cause, and it does not continue to grow and stage initiations of hundreds at a time and to enter political contests with such amazing results unless a great number of citizens are convinced of the urgency and soundness of something for which it stands. Whether that cause be real or imaginary, it is real to those whom it enlists. If it is not real in its own right the organization may be dangerous through its very devotion to a cause that does not exist. A contortion of devotion or a conviction that is largely prejudice may do violence to good aims through its very misinterpretation.

The klan seems to be born of a post-war reaction. It is part and parcel of that hyper-Americanism that called itself "100 per cent American" while it denied the very fundamentals of genuine Americanism. It was a sort of short-circuited patriotism that burst into flame through an emotional foreshortening of reason, substituting one's emotional conceptions of what is American for a rational patriotism. In other words, if a man did not agree with you he was not a good American. Thus the hasty epithets of "pro-German," "bolshevik," "red," etc., about everyone who differed with you, especially if the differing one were liberal in opinion, or asked for fairer consideration of your favorite prejudices. War demands a hot patriotism, but peace can thrive only in a patriotism whose light burns to illumine and not to injure.

This so-called "100 per cent Americanism" has violated the most fundamental principles of genuine Americanism in denying liberty of assemblage, freedom of speech, right of organization, and representation to any group of legal citizenship, and in seeking to repress or restrict the free expression of public opinion.

Organizing Our Favorite Prejudices

The Ku Klux Klan seems to be founded upon the favorite prejudices of the average American, and the not small degree of genuine conviction born of them. Back of every one of these prejudices there may be something that gives fear to the provincial-minded. It is really an "anti" movement in which the great majority may be devoted to the flag and to law and order. Our "100 per cent American" is all that. But a half-truth is made dangerous by the half-falsehood it carries on its under-side, and doubly dangerous if the emotional content of the half-truth carries the half-falsehood into the war-like action of a crusader.

Acting under the banner of "Americanism" and "law and order" the real animus of the klan seems to be anti-Catholic, anti-Jew, anti-Negro, anti-alien and anti-radical. The honest klansman tells you that it is not that at all but that it is "pro-American" with a devotion that finds in these groups dangers to Americanism. He declares he has no objection to anyone being a Catholic but has a definite objection to Catholics acting as such in political matters. So, too, he declares he is for justice for the Negro and the alien but that he intends to see that they both keep their place. He runs with the law where the law is not enforced and before it where the law, moral, social or legal, is, to his mind, menaced. Thus the "boot-legger" is visited with the terrors of a night-ride, the loose character of either sex warned to decamp with perhaps a warning applied that sticks to the skin, the Japanese in California carted out of the community with all his belongings, the Negro cabin terrorized by an apparition of white-clad ghosts, and a great host prepared for the ballot box against Romanist, radical, or enemy of the klan, and perhaps for the officer of the law who winked at duty in matters of well established community morals.

The Menace of the Klan

I have recently been in both Oregon and the south and have talked with many leaders in religious and social affairs about the klan. It was originally a revival of the old post-war Ku

Klux of the sixties in the South, but its numbers in the north perhaps out-number those in the south. At the reunion of the old confederate veterans in Richmond the other day reference to the old Ku Klux was greeted with an uproar of rebel yells.

I found some excellent citizens defending its revival and among them a number of ministers in communities where they are organized. They all said, "I have seen what it does." Further inquiry revealed that the klan had cleared out whisky-runners and other immoral characters and it seemed to me apparent that my parson friends had not looked deeper into its purpose and method than to that which incidentally helped on their good work. I felt also that they shared to a considerable degree the prejudices against aliens, Catholics and Negroes. So, too, it seemed to me that in about the ratio that those prejudices were absent the klan was condemned notwithstanding its action on behalf of morals. Men in wider fields of religious action than the local parish were of one mind in strong condemnation of it. It is safe to say that men of wider knowledge, larger sympathies, and more rational patriotism are unanimously in opposition to it as a menace both in its aims and in its methods.

The great menace of the klan lies in its method. Honest, courageous citizens of large mind will not hesitate to take their stand on moral and civic issues in the open, and they will act by and through the law as such. In no organized society can even well-intentioned men afford to take the enforcing of the law into their own hands. In a frontier where law is not organized or in a community where lawlessness has taken possession it may be pardonable for the best elements to take vigilante action, but never in a nation-wide area nor in the average community.

Secrecy, combined with the use of force, inevitably degenerates into lawlessness itself. The old Ku Klux thus degenerated until the hand of all law abiding folk was against it and law itself drove it into oblivion. In the Missouri Ozarks you may see the bald tops on mountains made historic by the meetings of the "bald-knobbers" in days when there was no law and every man did that which was right in his own eyes. There the men of peace organized to rid the community of thieves, moonshiners, and murderers. Then you will also see the trees where later "bald-knobbers" were hanged for the crimes they committed through the secrecy of the vigilantes carried beyond all original purpose. Law abiding men can help the law in lawful ways. All other ways are only a menace.

British Table Talk

London, June 13, 1922.

IT IS a startling and reassuring fact that it is never difficult to rouse the public mind upon an issue of justice, even though only one life is concerned. At the present moment everybody here is talking of the two decisions of the home secretary last week, the one which allowed the boy Jacoby to be hanged, the other which saved True from that fate. It would be an ill day if such matters were passed by as trivial because only a life or two were concerned. On these particular cases opinion is widely divided; some think, and I hold with them, that both should have been reprieved. Others think that both should have been hung. There is a common agreement that it was wrong to treat them differently. The charge, made freely, that True owed something to his aristocratic friends is certainly unjust so far as the law itself is concerned. But it would be a disaster, if ever there arose a suspicion that a panel of medical specialists could be called in to correct the judgment of the highest courts of law; or if it could be said that such a boy as Jacoby, had he been at a public school, would have been reprieved. It has been one of our boasts that justice is administered sternly and with an equal hand. The public mind therefore is quite right in fixing attention upon such cases as these, in which more than the fate of two poor degenerates is involved.

A Conference of Evangelical Churchmen

It is common knowledge that there have been of late sharp contentions within the evangelical school in the Anglican church. There are many of the younger members who claim to be entirely loyal to the traditions of their party and yet they no longer accept the rigid view of biblical infallibility. On the other hand there are the old guard of these churches, prepared to contend for the faith as they have understood it and that means for them the traditional method of interpreting the Bible. The younger school have a strong position. With them, one of the wisest of churchmen said to me, rests the future of the Anglican church. They have drawn near in fellowship with some of the high churchmen. They have all the strength of their evangelical experience and it cannot be said too definitely that the English believer in all schools is at heart an evangelical; he may be "catholic" too, but he is at the root of his being evangelical. The younger evangelicals have a great future before them. It is to be hoped that the older members of their party will not break with them. The center where the trouble is most dangerous is that great society, the Church Missionary Society. It would be a disaster if there is not found some modus vivendi, in which both schools of thought may work together in that all-important work. Upon the conference now sitting in Birmingham much will depend. It is the right way for brethren, who differ from one another, to meet together in an atmosphere of prayer and fellowship. It is a much wiser way than to carry on a duel in the press, or on the platform. The best service that others can do for the Church Missionary Society is to pray that out of this conference there may come a fresh realization of underlying unity.

The Christian Endeavor Movement

The annual convention was held with every sign of enthusiasm and hope in Oldham. That is one of the most prosperous of Lancashire towns; and while it is good for conventions to meet in health resorts, sometimes it is a welcome change to visit the busy manufacturing towns, upon which so much of the well-being of a country depends. It might be a useful experience to hold a conference for the "deepening of spiritual life" in Whitechapel, one of the poorest districts in East London, rather than in Keswick, which lies in the heart of old Lake district. I had the pleasure of speaking at two meetings in Oldham, held at the same hour, both good, and one very largely attended. At a "league of nations" meeting, Lord Parmoor spoke with his great authority. Dr. Peake gave devotional readings before the morning session. His presence roused some protests. One minister wrote to say that Dr. Peake's teaching was "saturated with infidelity." Boldly and wisely the committee refused to yield to such protests. It is not difficult to understand that Dr. Peake seems to some readers mistaken in his method of biblical interpretation. But it is almost unthinkable that anyone should charge a great believer with "infidelity." Dr. Peake is an eminent teacher in his class-room, but he would be quite as much at home in dealing with penitent souls in a mission service.

"The Altar Steps"

Mr. Compton Mackenzie, whose work has for me an unfailing interest, has set out to describe the rise and progress of the life which is designated from the beginning for the priesthood. In the first volume of what is to be a series, he gives a peculiar interesting account of a Catholic school within the Church of England, as it was in the generation immediately before this in the days which those of us who are nigh upon fifty remember vividly. His hero is carried in the story from one typical scene to another. There is at least one character in the book, drawn from life, Father Dolling. This great saint—socialist, sacramentarian, salvationist, as he described himself—is described with singular sympathy and convincing power. Dolling had a unique place in Portsmouth, but he was compelled to leave his beloved people because he would not give up "the altar of the dead," erected by the gifts of his poor parishioners. Afterwards he went to Poplar, but Poplar in East London, was harder to move. Its grey monotony made its people slower to respond than the Portsmouth folk who had it in them to be more desperate sinners, and at the same time to be equally vigorous in their repentance and faith when once the call broke through to them. Those who are not concerned with things ecclesiastically will probably skip some pages but students who wish to know what was happening in the Church of England in the last two decades of the 19th century will find a faithful picture, and much also of charm in "The Altar Steps."

And So Forth

The newly designated president of the Chinese republic has long been a friend of our London Missionary Society. There seems, however, little likelihood of his holding office long. Only a head with power to put down the provincial armies can hope to restore order to China. . . . The annual conference of British Missionary societies is held this week at Swanwick. They will have many matters of public interest to consider, particularly the problem of mission and other schools in China. . . . A great discovery has been made of early works by Jane Austen. No one should miss this book "Love and Friendship"; it will lighten the most melancholy spirit. . . . Dr. T. R. Glover has strongly attacked the attitude of the free churchmen, who signed the joint letter of which I wrote last week. He indicts Dr. Shakespeare, Dr. J. D. Jones, and the other free church leaders, as yielding to an obsolete scholarship, and as putting themselves outside all that is most hopeful in living Christian thought.

CORRESPONDENCE

Important if True

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In your issue of June 15 is a reply to Bishop McConnell in which the writer, in his zeal for immersion, begs the question by claiming to know what was in the mind of Jesus in his interview with Nicodemus. There is nothing in that interview that has anything to do with baptism or the Baptists. Jesus declares a new birth necessary to the seeing of the kingdom of God. The facetious Nicodemus wants to know how an old man can be reborn and asks if he shall reenter the womb for that purpose. Jesus replies that both the womb and the Spirit are necessary. Of the first Nicodemus was already born and now only the second, that of the Spirit was necessary.

Jesus was better posted on physiology than some of the ministers of the twentieth century. Men belongs to the mammalia and all human birth is water birth—"that which is born of the flesh is flesh." The Spirit birth should follow. There is no need to reenter the womb to be reborn of water.

It is too bad that we are continually reading into Scripture things that cannot be found there, in order to bolster up our dogmas.

"My Preacher"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The June number of The Christian Century has a fine tribute to Dr. Jowett, in the article "The Lion in His Den," by Dr. Lynn Harold Hough. The "Lion's" closing comment is, "So Dr. Jowett has become one of my preachers. And now, I go back to him day after day. There is something very personal in that phrase, "one of my preachers." When one says this of a preacher he means that such a preacher is nearer than a hero to whom he pays the tribute of admiration, he is a companion, a helper, a guide. "My preacher" is about the highest compliment that can be paid to a minister. "My preacher's" message sinks a little deeper into my heart than the words of another, his voice is a little more compelling, his gospel is a little more satisfying. He speaks to my needs, and so I have for him a feeling of proprietorship.

Of the goodly company of the great preachers of today, to me, the prince of preachers is Dr. Joseph Fort Newton. I heard him preach seven years ago in Cedar Rapids, Iowa. It was on Easter Sunday, and it was an Easter hour. Never shall I forget the look of calm joy on the upturned faces of the people in the congregation. I was a stranger in that company of worshippers, yet the preacher seemed to be talking to me alone, chiding me for my misgivings and lifting me above the fears of mortality.

The "Lion" says "Dale has always seemed to me like a great cathedral. Jowett seemed like the marvelous embroidered communion cloth upon its altar." The figures are exquisitely appropriate. I have wondered what simile fits Dr. Newton. He is a composite preacher. In him blend the mystic and artist, the poet and the prophet-statesman. But in all of his messages there is a characteristic note, an undertone of profound reverence that makes one feel a worship in the temple of the universe. Dr. Newton's words are like the music of an evening bell calling worshippers to prayer. The tones of the bell are often sad, but always sweet and clear, and the pathos of its music is a hint of a yet unsung anthem rather than the echoes of a lost chord. Dr. Newton is my preacher.

Defends Dr. Robinson's Thesis

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: No more intensely human document has fallen under my eye for some time than the editorial "The Disintegration of the Mind" in your June 15th number. It illustrates as aptly as anything could the appropriateness of Dr. Robinson's purpose. Until folk are not stimulated to unfair criticism when a favorite prejudice is approached, we need to be warned that the world might be fairer, the social adaptation to the present unprecedented conditions might be more perfect, if people could manage to forget prejudice and curb feeling by the application of intelligence.

I recognize that the last sentence will sound intemperate to the writer of the editorial whose brain child may be said to be now under chastisement, even as Dr. Robinson's child was spanked by him. It is aggravating to me to see injustice still lurking in the place where of all places one ought to find fair treatment, the mind of a man who is connected with a religious enterprise.

Dr. Robinson's book was written to show "that we have available knowledge and ingenuity and material resources to make a far fairer world than that in which we find ourselves" and "to exhibit with entire frankness the tremendous difficulties that stand in the way of. . . a beneficent change of mind, and to point out as clearly as may be some of the measures to be taken in order to overcome them." He considers that we must create "an unprecedented attitude of mind to cope with unprecedented conditions and to utilize unprecedented knowledge." And the attitude he hopes for is that we may "rid ourselves of our fond prejudices and open our minds."

Mankind's tendency to fly to the defense of a favorite idea or belief is considered as the most difficult obstacle for intelligence to surmount, and if ever a case was proved, it is proved by the Doctor in his book, and unconsciously nailed down by the editorial writer in his editorial.

I have read that Dean Ellery of Union College has said "Religion will live if it is true, and it won't live and does not deserve to live if it is false. What would be thought of the scientist who deems it necessary to protect from all criticism the theory he has conceived or a principle he has discovered." We "self conscious young intellectuals" would be vastly less apt to stray away from conventional religion if there were more of Dean Ellery's tolerance of inquiry and less constant proof of the truth of Doctor Robinson's statement that "It has been the habit of defenders of the sturdy old virtues from time immemorial to be careless of others' reputations."

Other Races Than Ours

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Kindly permit me briefly to state my opinion concerning evolution and prehistoric man: (1) Evolution does not preclude the possibility of miracles such as the virgin birth of Christ, his resurrection and the special supernatural origin of the head of our race. (2) Genesis gives only the history of the origin of our race. For all we know other races of men, perhaps without a supernatural destiny, may have existed and become extinct before Adam and Eve were created. Mendel, who first discovered the law of evolution in the plant kingdom, never had a doubt concerning any supernatural fact recorded in the Bible.

Weighed and Found Wanting*

"THE moving finger writes; and having writ
Moves on; nor all thy piety, nor wit,
Shall lure it back to cancel half a line,
Nor all thy tears wash out one word of it."
(Omar Khayyam).

Nebuchadrezzar went to grass! Living like an animal, he was stricken with hypochondriasis, a form of insanity in which a man imagines himself some kind of animal, a dog, wolf, horse. In the fifth century there were some grass-eating monks, undoubtedly crazy. The king's father had gone to the dogs and the son should have profited by his ignoble example. Belshazzar had a poor heredity and his environment was worse. The court life was soft and lustful; the vast power made him heady and, at last, the crisis came with a crash. I knew a man who, when his creditors pressed in upon him, went to his home and drowned himself in drink; although his resources were ample, if intelligently handled, he came out of his debauch only to find that all his possessions were swept away. Such is the situation in this picture. The enemy is at the gate. A proud, powerful, conquering king is pounding at the walls. It would seem to be an hour for Verdun-like resistance. Belshazzar calls his generals to a great feast. It is the gayest, maddest, swiftest night that the king and his assistants can plan. It is fast enough! Wine sparkles in golden bowls, intoxicating music beguiles the senses, voluptuous girls dance with sensuous grace. There is unrestrained laughter. But suddenly the faces of warriors and princes blanch, the cups fall from nerveless hands, knees smite in abject fear, the laughter dies away into groans—for a hand is writing on the palace wall strange words, but they portend nothing but ill. When Daniel at last makes the meaning clear the words spell death and ruin. "Numbered, Weighed, Divided." Your days are numbered, death waits for you, you can feel the chill of his breath even now, you can hear the swish of his scythe. You are weighed in the balance and the scales tip the wrong way, you are too light for your position, you cannot hold down your job, you must go. Your kingdom is divided, lost, taken by another because you are too weak to defend it and hold it. It is the end; it is the hour of death. In that night king Belshazzar died.

> "Crownless and scepterless Belshazzar lay,
> A robe of purple round a form of clay."

What profit in this dramatic story for us? Have we responsibilities which we may be too weak to carry? Is there an enemy at our gate and are we making light of his presence? This is precisely the case. Americans ought, of all peoples, to be wise against propagandas, but many good people, good but weak, are about to give way to the enemy. The eighteenth amendment has been written into our constitution. It came not suddenly nor by hysteria nor because the boys were in Europe. Why malign the boys? When they came back to Ohio, they gave a powerful impetus to the temperance vote. No, we were sick and tired of saloons and all that they stood for; we were done with the drink nuisance with all of the ills carried in its train. Business was sick of drunken workmen, wives were done with drunken husbands, churches were through with a traffic that handicapped their efforts; drunkards themselves wanted to be free from temptation. Thus the eighteenth amendment was written in. But, today, our whole temperance structure is threatened. The subtle propaganda, the clever joke, the home-brew law-breaker, the hip-pocket idiot, the organized, money-loving boot-leggers, the silly women, fast youths and soft girls, the lazy church-members, the indifferent citizens—all are helping to undo the years of temperance fighting has won. I tell you we are in a dangerous position. Bootlegging produces money like rubbing Aladdin's lamp. I know a man who told me he was offered $50,000 to use his influence for four months to favor bootlegging. I am told of another man who was offered ten times that amount. I am told of a home in which the mother, at a party, literally forced a glass of wine upon a sixteen year-old girl, a guest in her home. England is watching America, dare we fail here? Must we keep silent? Shall we lose what we have gained? Are we caught, like Belshazzar, in the pleasure-drift, so that we cannot escape? Must we go on with the dance, must joy be unconfined? Where is our manhood, our fighting quality, our self-control, our higher ideal? Must we, also, go to grass?

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Well-Known London Church Dissolves

Park Street Baptist church of London for many years made famous by the ministry of Dr. F. B. Meyer, has recently had to dissolve. The meeting house was built upon leased land and recently the lease expired, whereupon the ground rent was increased by the owner from $325 per annum to $4,750, plus a premium of $2,980. The church could not pay this rent nor did it feel able to erect a new building on a new location. This church, which at one time had 800 members, has been a generous contributor to the various missionary and philanthropic projects of the denomination. Since its organization 67 years ago it has furnished six presidents of the Baptist Union of Great Britain. The property under the terms of the lease will now revert to the owners of the site, who are the government commissioners of woods and forests. Whether there has entered into this action any sectarian animosity on the part of governmental agencies does not appear in the reports. It is said that there are scores of other nonconformist chapels in England that are located on leased land, which might be closed by a similar process.

Find It Necessary to Poison the Bibles

The pious book-worms of Gilbert Islands are said to have a special fondness for Bibles, and often attack the books with most destructive effects. The American Bible Society now has a mixture of perfume, pepper and corrosive sublimate which is used in the glue on the Bible bindings. This tends to curb somewhat the depredations of the worms.

Secretaries Return from Western Trip

A team of social service secretaries, Tippy, Batten, Holt and Taylor, has just completed a series of nine industrial conciliation conferences in the far west. Hearty cooperation was given by the local church federations, the labor and trades councils and by a small group of employers in each city. It is rather striking that the labor leaders, most of whom are not church members, responded more cordially than did the employers that are churchmen. Thirty-four of these conferences have been held in as many American industrial cities.

Independent North Side Church Will Build

For a number of years Rev. Preston Bradley has preached in a theater in the Wilson avenue district of Chicago to a large congregation. He was formerly a Presbyterian but recently affiliated with the Western Unitarian association. The church is independent and liberal. It claims a membership of 1500 people and often has congregations of three thousand. Property has been purchased on the north side, and a church will be erected in the near future.

Agitate for Simplification of Comity

At a recent session of the Executive Council of the Christian Missionary Society, a number of the members of this organization expressed the opinion that the working out of comity in the Chicago field was unnecessarily cumbersome. It was reported that this was also the opinion of city mission workers not Disciples. No action was taken on the part of the Disciples group to withdraw either from the Cooperative Council or from the Comity Commission of the Chicago Church Federation, the opinion seeming to prevail that whatever solution of the vexed problem of comity in Chicago is found should arise out of the joint council and action of the various communions involved. The

Sunday School Leadership Adopts Educational Standards

THE Bryan incident was a very minor feature of the International Sunday School convention held at Kansas City, June 20-27. The address of the Commoner was put on the last day of the convention, and had no influence on convention action. The convention-goers were very much less conscious of any issue over Bryanism than was the general public which reads the secular press. It was not the mood of the convention to discuss theology, but rather to attack seriously the problems of reorganizing the Sunday school to make it efficient in religious education.

Dr. W. O. Thompson, president of Ohio State University, was also president of the International Sunday School association the past four years. He has put his vast educational experience to work in the remaking of the organization that reaches so many million people in North America, and his quiet constructive work reveals itself in the convention at Kansas City. He has been given another quadrennium of service, an honor never before given to anyone in this office. Mr. Hugh S. McGill was called to be the secretary of the International Sunday School association to succeed Mr. Marion Lawrance, who has resigned. Mr. McGill has been a public school superintendent, a state senator in the Illinois legislature, and in recent years field secretary of the National Education association. He might have been made secretary of the latter organization, it is said, if he had not chosen to enter the field of religious education. These two great educators will in the next quadrennium have quite a free hand in shaping Sunday school policy. Mr. Marion Lawrance, who has served the Sunday schools of North America most faithfully for a third of a century, was made consulting secretary. He was most generous in his introduction of his successor, and expressed himself in optimistic terms with regard to the future of the movement.

The outstanding achievement of the convention was the healing of what had at one time threatened to become a schism in the ranks of Sunday school workers. The International Sunday School association has in latter years been a self-perpetuating body. It never has been responsible to the great church organizations of North America, save in a moral way. As the field workers, editors, publishers and missionaries of the various denominational organizations increased, they found fellowship in the Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations. Thus in the local field there was the distraction of appeals and slogans coming from two centers. The merger of the two organizations was accomplished at Kansas City.

Henceforth the religious denominations will elect one-half of the members of the executive committee of the new organization which is called the International Sunday School Council of Religious Education. Twenty members will be elected by the international convention, and the remainder by state and provincial conventions interdenominational. The new constitution names thirty-one denominations which are entitled to representation on the executive committee. These are all evangelical denominations. Of the thirty-one all but four have expressed their willingness to cooperate. Only the Southern Baptist denomination has definitely refused to accept official representation.

A large committee on educational policy, headed by Prof. Walter S. Athearn of Boston, and on which some of the most advanced leaders in religious education in the country are to be found, made a report on educational policy in the sessions of the convention. For the first time a Sunday school convention listened to the kind of thing one hears at sessions of the Religious Education association. One heard a great deal about functional psychology and the project method in pedagogy. It is proposed to set the child in the midst and make his interests primary instead of finding chief interest in the curriculum. Prof. Charters, teacher of educational research of the Carnegie Institute of Technology, set forth the ideals of the new educational movement and demanded that the Sunday school come right up to day school standards in education.

Dr. Charles S. Medbury, Disciples pastor, of Des Moines, Ia., warned of modernizing tendencies and Dr. Sampey, Southern Baptist member of the lesson committee, made a heated speech accusing his colleagues on the lesson commit-

Seeks Fellowship with Divided Brethren

The Disciples of Christ have for several years been listed by the United States census department as two bodies. A considerable group in the south that are opposed to instrumental music in the churches, and to missionary societies, insisted on the separate listing. This past spring Rev. John E. Dunn of the Conservative church in Waxahachie, Tex., and Rev. J. Wm. Stephens of the progressive church arranged a joint evangelistic enterprise, and the two churches worked together happily in it. At the close of the meetings, twenty-five members from each church sat down together and discussed their differences. No union has resulted, but the news of these conferences has spread all over Texas, and the popular reaction is very favorable indeed. The conservative churches are most numerous in Texas and Tennessee.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS ADOPT EDUCATIONAL STANDARDS

tee of "log-rolling" and other misdemeanors which were described in characteristic Kentucky phraseology. But the convention reserved its applause for speakers like Margaret Slattery, who denounced theological controversy in a time when the world is dying for the lack of unified Christian leadership.

Prof. H. Augustine Smith was the music leader of the convention. For once the Sunday school convention was singing "O Love that will not let me go" in place of "The Glory Song." Nothing but the best church music was used, and the effect both on the enthusiasm and the piety of the convention was the most marked in a decade. The Rainbow Chorus of Kansas City children was a striking feature. Ten thousand people filed in to see Mr. Smith's pageant at an admission price of fifty cents. The spirit of Christianity was presented as calling into service the various groups of the Christian church and sending them out to the various tasks of the world.

The officers of the new organization, the International Sunday School Council of Religious Education, for the coming year will be Dr. W. O. Thompson, president; Wm. Hamilton, of Canada, vice president; Herbert L. Hill of New York recording secretary, and J. L. Kraft, treasurer. Hugh S. McGill is the new executive secretary. Twenty members of the executive committee were chosen by the convention.

The question of the next place of meeting for the convention is always interesting, and this year the contest was particularly spirited. Among the cities making a claim were Los Angeles, Detroit and Birmingham. The last named city was chosen, and the 1926 convention will go there. The month of April will be convention month that year in order to avoid the excessive heat which characterized the Kansas City weather.

No friend of progress in religious education went home discouraged. The very things that experts have been advocating for years are now in process of being realized just so rapidly as so great an organization may be changed.

Give Godspeed to Departing Missionaries

A special service in honor of departing missionaries was held in Boston in Park Street church on June 18. The missionaries going out under the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions were the geusts of honor. Groups of young people from all of the Boston Congregational churches were in attendance. An American flag was presented to each of the out-going missionaries. The charge to the people was given by Secretary D. Brewer Eddy and the charge to the out-going missionaries by Rev. A. Z. Conrad.

Canadian Disciples Form National Organization

The Disciples of Ontario have been organized for many years, but the scattered churches of the great northwest were often without ecclesiastical fellowship on account of the vast differences. The Ontario Cooperation of Disciples of Christ was the former organization under which the missionary work of the churches was carried on. At a recent meeting at Popular Hill, Ontario, the All-Canadian Continuation Committee of the Churches of Christ in Canada was formed. Through lack of fellowship there has been a decrease of churches in the great northwest at the very time that a forty-five per cent gain in population was being made.

Convalescent Home for Missionaries

A very practical kind of Christianity has been in operation in Los Angeles the past year. Disciples in southern California have rented a house in Los Angeles where ten missionaries and members of missionary families have been housed while convalescing from disease. The medical care of these people has been donated by a Christian physician, a member of Hollywood Disciples church. The ten are now all cured and have gone on their way rejoicing. Seeing the significance of this work, Mrs. Royal J. Dye, a well-known returned missionary, is now advocating that this home may be made a permanent institution. This is now being seriously considered by the Christian people of the west.

Congregationalist Figures Are Encouraging

A steady and solid growth characterizes the work of the Congregationalists. The official figures for the past year are now with the printers, and a few proof sheets have been given out. The net gain in membership last year was 19,046, which is said to be the largest since the landing of the Pilgrims. The membership now stands at 838,270. The net increase in money for home expenses and for benevolences was $858,600. The Congregationalists are now considering some possible consolidation in their missionary and benevolent boards.

Dr. Jones Will Not Leave Detroit

On May 21 Dr. Edgar DeWitt Jones resigned at Central Christian Church of Detroit. He had gone to the city aware of the need of larger equipment for his work in that church and it seemed impossible to secure the equipment. The church was not willing to lose so valuable a leader who in a short time has come to be known all over Detroit so arrangements have been made to carry out an aggressive program during the coming year. In the light of these new plans, Dr. Jones was persuaded to withdraw his resignation. The Detroit News says: "The city of Detroit has none too many such public servants. The entire community benefits by the decision reached by Dr. Jones and his church."

Will Run for Congress

Mrs. Luella St. Clair-Moss was known for many years in Disciples circles as president of Christian college, an institution for young ladies, located at Columbia, Mo. She resigned here a few years ago and has since served in a number of public positions, being on a national board of education and a member of the Missouri Educational Commission. She is now a candidate for Congress in her district.

Bethany Assembly Will Bring Preachers Together

Disciples ministers love discussion, and one of the events of the year in the middle west is the ministers' retreat at Bethany Assembly in Indiana. This year, Rev. H. H. Peters, state secretary of Illinois, will give a course of lectures on preaching. Prof. Alva W. Taylor will give a course of addresses on "Christian Solutions for Social Problems." Dr. W. E. Garrison will lecture on the history and teachings of the Disciples of Christ. Rev. E. B. Barnes of Cleveland will speak on "The World's Greatest Reformers." Rev. J. D. Garrison of Indianapolis will lecture on "The Death of the Prophets." The addresses are followed by discussion.

Swedenborgians Gather at Urbana for National Meeting

The Church of the New Jerusalem held its national convention at Urbana, O., beginning June 13. In previous years the Swedenborgians have gathered in large cities, but this year the lure was a visit to the college which was founded in 1850 by the denomination. This college was coeducational from the start. During the past year a successful drive for an endowment fund of three hundred thousand dollars has been carried through, Senator Thomas Coleman Dupont contributing half of the money. At the close of the convention a pageant was given setting forth "The Torch; a Pageant of Light."

Eight hundred people and twenty-six horses appeared in the cast. This denomination is not large in this country, but makes its appeal to people who can appreciate the mystical phases of religion. Most of the larger cities have several Swedenborgian churches

To Mark Grave of Man Who Married Lincoln's Parents

Thomas Lincoln and Nancy Hanks were married June 12, 1806, by Rev. Jesse Head in Washington County, Ky. This fact would have been of great comfort to President Lincoln if he had known it. Unfortunately he did not know and but little has been known of this hardy pioneer preacher. His grave and that of his wife, Jane Ramsey, has been discovered in a corner of the cemetery in the old town of Harrodsburg, Ky. Dr. William E. Barton, author of "The Soul of Abraham Lincoln," through whose effort this discovery has been made, proposes that the grave be now marked with a modest stone before the memory forever passes. No elaborate monument is desired, but it is thought that a good many people would gladly give $1.00 toward such a memorial. Miss Mary A. Stephenson of Harrodsburg, Ky., is treasurer of the fund and will acknowledge subscriptions if an addressed postal card or self-addressed envelope is enclosed.

Southern Baptists Putting Money Into Theological Seminaries

Already $35,000,000 has been paid in on the $75,000,000 fund of the southern Baptists. This denomination is leading all others in the promptness with which the pledges are being paid. One of the big investments of the near future on the part of southern Baptists will be the founding of theological seminaries in many of the countries of Europe. The opening of many catholic countries to Baptist work makes possible great enlargements just as soon as a native ministry can be created.

Southern Presbyterians Lack Ministers

The Presbyterian church in the U. S. has 750 churches without ministers. The past year 51 ministers were ordained while the loss by death and otherwise was 49. It will be seen from these figures that progress in recruiting a ministry is very slow. No minister can be ordained in this denomination who has not had four years college work and three years in the seminary. Dr. Henry H. Sweets of Louisville is in correspondence with 12,000 young people trying to influence them in behalf of a religious vocation. It is hoped by this means to greatly increase the ministerial force of the denomination.

Southern Methodists Look With Favor on Presbyterian Plan

The recent general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, South, took action with regard to the simplification of its boards. The plan which it favors has striking similarities to that which was recently adopted by the Presbyterians at Des Moines. The commission which has the matter in charge has been instructed to bring in a report as nearly as possible in line with the following general plan: 1. The formation of a General Board of Foreign Missions, under which shall be related all the work of the Church outside of the United States of America (excepting the work of the Woman's Board). 2. The formation of a General Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, under which shall be related all the Home Mission Work of the Board of Missions as it is now constituted (except the work of the Woman's Board), all the work of the General Board of Church Extension as it is now constituted, all of the work of the General Board of Temperance and Social Servce as it is now constituted, Laymen's activities, Hospitals, etc. 3. The formation of a General Board of Education, under which shall be related all the work of a General Board of Education as it is now constituted, all the work of the General Epworth League Board as it is now constituted, all the work of the General Sunday School Board as it is now constituted. 4. The formation of a General Board of Finance or Superannuate Endowment. 5. The formation of a Womans' General Board of Missions, under which shall be related all the work of the Woman's Missionary Society, both Home and Foreign.

Dr. Inman Returns From Mexico

WHEN Samuel G. Inman, secretary of the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America, makes a trip into any part of the many far-stretching lands with which his committee deals, the church in Anglo-Saxon America gives especial respect and consideration to the report of what he saw and heard. Dr. Inman has just returned from a visit to Mexico where he came into closest contact with missionary, political and social conditions in all parts of the country. He writes of many specific and concrete matters and closes his detailed report as follows:

"It seems to me that I have never found in Mexico such an earnest desire for friendship with the United States and such a universal recognition of what Mexico can learn from the United States as I found on this trip. Everywhere there was an endeavor to show this friendship. The minister of foreign affairs, after a long interview, invited me to take luncheon with him in his home. He afterward arranged an interview with President Obregon and sent the official car to call for me at the Union Theological Seminary. I was supposed to have ten minutes with President Obregon, but was with him for nearly an hour. He did not hesitate to answer any questions that I asked and his manner was so open that I felt free to ask anything I desired to know. He is on the job every minute. His eyes twinkle, his mind scintillates and often he jumps right into the middle of one of your sentences anticipating your question and responds. He said that Mexico was far behind in her development and that she could not afford to go along the regular path of development, counting only on herself, but that she must take the best from the United States and other nations and move swiftly toward the top. He explained his sympathetic attitude toward all the social movements. He told me of his fight in reducing the army and its budget and multiplying the budget for education. The fact that he has reduced the army from over a hundred thousand to about fifty thousand soldiers and its budget exactly 50 per cent and at the same time has increased the budget for education about 50 per cent is significant. He has been able to bring about law and order. The propaganda which one finds today about revolutions in Mexico is mostly in the minds of those who desire such revolutions, both Mexican politicians and foreign investors. If Mexico could have the recognition of the United States government now she could strengthen her situation, both interior and exterior so that in a few years the affairs of ten years' fighting would be forgotten and only the good of the revolution predominate.

"While in the City of Mexico the missionary forces took me to see a large plot of ground which they desire to secure for the center of our union institutions. It can be purchased at the present time for a comparatively small amount. The plot consists of seventy-five acres of land a few blocks from Chepultapec Palace and only about twenty minutes from the heart of the city. It provides ample room for the proposed union university, union hospital and buildings for the Union Theological Seminary and missionary residences. In a little while this land will be worth many times its value today as the city is building very rapidly toward its location. We ought to find a hundred thousand dollars among interested friends to buy this property. We can take our time in putting up the buildings, the three union institutions mentioned, but it is imperative to get hold of this property now if we are to take the opportunity to build a great Protestant center in the heart of one of the leading cities of Latin America. We have done much for the Orient and for the near east and for restoring churches and libraries in Europe. We have done nothing toward erecting a real educational institution beyond the primary grades in Mexico. Certainly the time is ripe for the Christian forces of the United States to demonstrate our friendship to Mexico by the erection of a real Christian college in that land."

perance and social welfare was permitted to address the meeting of these great Methodist leaders. He was outspoken in his denunciation of article 280 of the Methodist Episcopal Book of Discipline, which prohibits attendance on dances, theatres, circuses and other amusements. The position of Dr. Wilson was stated in these words. "It keeps tens of thousands of young people out of church. And it does not keep them out of the dance halls. The evils it warns against are all tendencies that Methodism stands four-square against. The article should be a broad declaration of the conscience of the church and not a specific listing of certain prejudices."

University of Oklahoma Teaches Religious Education

Dr. Maurice J. Neuberg is director of the department of religious education at the University of Oklahoma. While a state university cannot teach religion owing to the American principle of the separation of church and state, it is possible for the state to teach education to those who are to carry on educational work in the churches while the churches themselves teach the religious principles which they wish to inculcate. There has been set up at the University of Oklahoma a complete organization for religious education.

Boy Scout Movement Disourages Sunday Hikes

The National Council of the Boy Scouts of America met recently, and at this meeting they considered the question of Sunday hikes on the part of their troops. Since a part of the Scout law is reverence to religion, it was decided that the Council would discourage any plan of outing which takes away from a boy his opportunity of attending church and Sunday school. This would not necessarily mean the abolition of week-end camping parties, but only that the people in charge should provide on Sunday some sort of religious opportunity for the boys. The tendency in this movement is to establish ever closer relations with church organizations.

Declares Against Denominationally Owned Daily Paper

Rev. J. Brabner Smith, who represents the Methodist church in the newspaper world, furnishing press stories for the secular press, spoke at the Church Publicity Convention in Milwaukee recently on the stategy of the church owning a daily paper. On this point he makes the following interesting observation. "The ownership and control of newspapers by denominations has been debated with considerable zeal by church zealots who desire to use the press for propaganda. There is something to gain in a church having at its command a paper or papers to spread its peculiar doctrines and to stress its mission. But the small gain is not worth the great loss which inevitably comes by such church control. Recent experiences in ownership and control by the Catholic and Christian Science churches, even with exceptionally able and experienced writers, editors and papers of rare journalistic ability, are positive proof that church control of newspapers is neither wise nor profitable, and is certainly not an advantage to the churches who own the papers. There is an increasing number of Methodists who are publishers, editors and writers, and in all the offices of great and small newspapers Methodists are busy at work, not as Methodists, but as faithful servants of society. This is the real test of the Christian, whether he serves society and not solely his church."

Seattle Developes a Substitute for the Passion Play

Pageantry is catching on in various cities of the land. The great pageant called "The Wayfarer" was first presented at the Methodist exposition, at Columbus. It has been made an annual event in Seattle, and the Chamber of Commerce, ever on the alert to develop features for the advertising of their city see in this pageant a permanent institution in Seattle life. Thirty thousand people often attend the spectacle at once. Prominent among the actors is Rev. Cleveland Kleihauer, pastor of University Christian church. He recites a whole chapter of the book of Revelation with a voice that reaches the vast throngs that gather for the spectacle.. It is said by those who have seen both that "The Wayfarer" is superior to the Passion Play of Oberammergau.

Drake Loses Prominent Leader as President

Drake University of Des Moines, the Disciples institution with the largest student body is losing its president. Dr. Arthur Holmes has offered his resignation to the board of trustees and it has been accepted. He came to Drake several years ago from the state agricultural school of Pennsylvania. His plans for the future are not announced. Dr. F. O. Norton has resigned as dean of the college of liberal arts, though continuing a member of the faculty. He is taking a two years leave of absence to carry on a piece of research work for an eastern institution on "The Landmarks of Early Christianity." President Holmes has dated his resignation to take effect in June, 1923, one year hence.

Disciples Have Set Up Committees for Winona Lake Convention

The committees that prepared for the Winona Lake convention of the Disciples of Christ last year have been reappointed for this year. Rev. C. W. Cauble, state secretary of Indiana heads the general committee once more and on his committee are Mrs. O. H. Griest and Rev. John D. Hull. The chairmen of the various sub-committees are as follows: Entertainment and assignment, Rev. John D. Hull; Reception, Rev. Chas. Stewart; Registration, Elmer Ward Cole; Ushers, Rev. J. Boyd Jones; Communion, Rev. Chas. R. Oakley.

Oberlin An Interdenominational School

Though Oberlin was founded by the most convinced Congregationalists, and for many years was the home of the most evangelical leaders of that denomination, in common with nearly all denominational schools it tends to grow more and more interdenominational in its constituency. Only one fifth of the student body this year was Congregational. An equal proportion was Methodist. The remainder of the student body was distributed among the various religious communions in varying percentages, the Roman Catholics having a group of students. The Congregational church at Oberlin has become a union church.

Secular Papers Take Up Fundamentalist Controversy

So long as the Fundamentalists were busy expounding the "second coming," they were allowed to carry on in their little corner of the world largely unnoticed. The recent attacks on modern science have aroused a different spirit in the laity, however. Many newspapers are carrying articles on the controversy over evolution nowadays. In a recent issue of the Public Ledger of Philadelphia W. W. Keen, M. D., Sc. D., LL. D., contributes

THE CRISIS OF THE CHURCHES

By LEIGHTON PARKS, D.D.

Rector of Saint Bartholomew's Church, New York

Dr. Parks derives a powerful text from which to plead the cause of church unity from the present crisis of world civilization —a condition, in the author's own words, "so dreadful that not a few serious-minded men are asking themselves if Western civilization is about to fail." The author sees Christian unity as the imperative need of the hour, and it is to point a way to that end that he has written this book.

an article on "I Believe in Evolution and in God." In this article he says: "The attitude of the Church, and especially of the clergy, toward science and toward the origin of man is of incalculable importance. Darwin's 'Origin of Species' was published in 1859, the year when I graduated at Brown University. The recrudescence of the warfare over evolution, which for many years had subsided and almost disappeared, except sporadically, is a strange phenomenon. The illogical and futile attacks upon science by some of the miscalled fundamentalists, and an illogical and even absurd attempt to prove that the Bible contains and anticipated the discoveries of modern science, are doing immense harm to religion. There is serious danger if present tendencies triumph that intelligent people—these who eventually mold the thought of the world—will be alienated from the Church and finally driven out of it. It is not without deplorable significance that Lord Bryce, in his 'Modern Democracies' (Vol. II, page 226) states that in Argentina and Brazil, 'Men of the educated class have practically dropped Christianity.'"

Roman Catholics Hope to Win Russians in America

A million Russian Christians in this country are largely unshepherded. In Detroit, where large numbers of Russians are to be found, there are not over fifty Russians attending the orthodox church, Rev. Constantin Auroroff reports. He is a newly appointed leader for Roman Catholic work in Detroit operating under the direction of Archbishop Bonzano and Bishop Gallagher of Detroit. The leaders of the Orthodox church in America and Russia resist this attempt at the romanization of their constituency. They are in cordial relations with the Protestant Episcopal church, and there seems more probability of their cooperating with this church than any other. The Roman Catholic church leaders assert that with the death of the czar the Russian church lost its head, and that it is now on the road to disintegration. The Orthodox church leaders on the contrary assert that the war has released great spiritual energies in that church.

Theological Schools of Harvard Reorganized

While Harvard has been long a center for professional study outside the realm of religion, but few men have gone there from year to year to study theology. Though long since the Harvard Divinity school has ceased to be officially Unitarian, it has long been associated with the Unitarian viewpoint. Under the new reorganization of theological study at the university, the beautiful academic building of Andover Seminary will house all the theological work of the university. A Congregationalist becomes dean of the new school, Rev. Willard Learoyd Sperry, pastor of Central Congregational church of Boston. Professor Fenn, who has been dean, will continue as Bussey Professor of Theology. The Congregationalists will present orthodox theology on the foundation of the Abbot professorship, a foundation of Andover. Under the new leadership it is believed that Harvard will develop as a center of religious instruction. This university was originally founded for the education of Christian ministers, but since the development of the controversies over unitarian and trinitarian ideas in theology, the university has well-nigh lost sight of this original function.

Disciples Church Will Build in New Suburb

The Disciples church organized in a neglected part of Oak Park two years ago has come rapidly to strength and power. During the past three months plans have been maturing for a new building and it is now announced that this building will be erected at an early date. A loan from the church erection department of the United Christian Missionary Society of fifteen thousand dollars will help greatly in the development of the young church. Rev. Ralph Nelson has been in charge of the work of this church, which is a ward of the Chicago Christian Missonary Society.

Dr. McAfee Arouses Protest on the Congo

The missionaries of the Congo country have a publicaton called the Congo Mission News. In the April number of this periodical Rev. Alfred R. Stonelake of the Baptist Congo Mission takes to task Dr. Joseph Ernest McAfee for a recent article in The Christian Century, in which the latter states there is still much sectarian rivalry on the foreign field. He says in this connection: "We do not believe that spiritual bankruptcy exists in Congo missions, and certainly not as a result of denominationalism. Indeed, just as it could be argued that a denominational society has the advantage of a permanent and constant constituency, to give stability to its work and confidence to its workers, so it may also be contended that the division of the fields is the surest way to secure the complete occupation thereof. And Congo experience points to the conclusion that contiguous denominational societies can work together in harmony every bit as well as other adjacent undenominational societies. Perhaps the greatest difficulty occurs when a denominational and an undenominational society are side by side."

Prophet Movement in Africa Subsides

The Congo country was stirred with excitement through the activity of a native leader called Kibangu last winter. Claiming prophetic inspiration, he was leading his followers back into many pagan practices and his influence upon the natives was regarded by government authorities as dangerous. He was arrested, and after trial put in prison. There has been much resentment of this by the natives, and Roman Catholic missionaries have used the incident against Protestantism since Kibangu was a Protestant. Meanwhile later reports indicate that the excitement has abated.

Breaks New Ground in the Field of Religious Discussion.

NEW CHURCHES FOR OLD

By John Haynes Holmes

Facing the alarming facts of declining church attendance and loss of ecclesiastical influence, the author of this important book is not satisfied to appeal to people to stand by existing churches, but calls for a wholly new statement of religion which shall work itself out into a new form of church organization. A revolutionary, but sincerely constructive work.

A RELIABLE, authoritative weekly review of important news is as essential a part of the working equipment of the business executive or professional man as his desk, telephone, or staff of assistants.

In order to make it possible for business and professional men who are occasional readers of The Outlook to become better acquainted with the character of the journal and to see it regularly each week for a trial period at but slight expense, we make the following special offer:

> We will send The Outlook each week for the next three months (13 numbers) for the small sum of $1 to any one who is not now a subscriber. The regular yearly subscription price is $5, and this offer is made to non-subscribers in order to show them what they are missing by not having The Outlook each week.

A World-Famous Editorial Survey

First in position and importance in each issue of The Outlook is the editorial survey of the outstanding events of that week, discussed without partisanship or prejudice and with first-hand knowledge and conviction.

This terse weekly editorial summary and interpretation of the world's news is world-famous. In Japan, for instance, according to one of the leading Japanese publicists, The Outlook is the most popular of all American periodicals. At home it is the most-quoted periodical on the floor of Congress.

Each number contains hours of reading, all of which is bracing, refreshing, and brain-expanding. Distinguished contributors write for every issue. The fascinating running story of the world's progress is prepared for you by eminent journalists, statesmen, diplomatists, scientists, men of letters, artists, educators and business men.

Why You Will Need The Outlook During Your Summer Vacationing

Wherever your summer jaunts may take you, The Outlook will reach you each week. Due to a remarkably efficient change-of-address department, we can guarantee immediate action on all change-of-address orders received by us. Other periodicals often require from two to six weeks to get action on such orders. But no matter how often, or how quickly, you change your summer whereabouts, The Outlook will be there each week to keep you clearly, reliably, and authoritatively informed as to what is happening in the world. Many of our readers will get along without newspapers this summer—but not without The Outlook.

"The Most-Quoted Weekly Journal in America"

You have noticed, of course, that the leading newspapers of the country are almost constantly quoting from The Outlook, which is noted for getting hold of articles of such sharp and timely interest and importance that their publication is actually a matter of news. But why rely upon the fragmentary reports in the newspapers, when you can have the entire, unabridged contents of each week's issue of The Outlook before you for the next 13 weeks for the small sum of only $1?

By starting your trial subscription at once, you will be sure to get all the distinguished articles that are scheduled for the summer.

Two Constructive Books on Religion

RECENTLY FROM THE PRESS

The Creative Christ:

By Edward S. Drown,
Professor in the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass.

That Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and today and forever means that he is the Man of the ages. And, if so, then he is the Man for every age. There is in him that which can appeal to and satisfy the thoughts and hopes and aspirations of every period of human experience. That Jesus Christ is always the same does not, therefore, mean that he can always be apprehended in the same way, or that his value and meaning for human life can always be understood and expressed in the same terms. His greatness eludes any complete human understanding. The best that any age can do is to make him real for that age, and then to hand on to new ages the ever recurring task of understanding him anew, as human life changes and as new problems call for solutions.

There are two false attitudes toward the thought of the past. One such is to regard that thought as a finality beyond which we cannot go. But that is to be untrue to the lesson which the past itself has to teach, the lesson taught us by men who were thinkers for their own time, and who dared to follow thought into untrodden fields. And the other false attitude is to disregard the past, and to try to do our own thinking independently of what has been thought before. But that again is to lose the lesson that history has to teach, it is to fail to benefit by the experience of mankind. If we are to understand the present, we must know the past, know it as a living thing, and from its life we shall learn the lessons for our life today. We shall be true to the Christian thought of the past if we try to make Christ real for ourselves.

Such is the argument of this book. And further, the author says, our problem is the social problem, the ethical problem, and he asks and aids in answering such questions as these: How shall society be built on the foundation of righteousness, justice, and love? How shall the individual, every individual, find his own freedom in a right and just relation to his fellows, a relation that shall express and maintain the rights and freedom of all? How shall the State, the Nation, be so constituted as to maintain the rights and duties, political and industrial, of all its members?

Creative Christianity:

By Professor George Cross,
Of Rochester Theological Seminary.

The author terms this "A study of the genius of the Christian faith." "To everyone who seeks to hold this faith intelligently," he says, "and to communicate it to the minds and consciences of others this task of ours must present itself as permanently imperative, and the present juncture in human affairs makes the time particularly opportune. For the work of reconstituting the essential order of human life, now pressing so hard on the human power of initiative on a vast scale among many peoples, is bound to produce a profound effect on the religious life of men everywhere."

Periodically, he holds, the organizing genius of the Christian faith must manifest itself in the reshaping of the forms of conduct, of the political affairs, of the popular philosophy and of the spirit of reverence current among any people. That which seemed at one time indispensable to the religious life has to be set aside in the interest of that very life and other forms more truly representative of that people's later faith and more adequate to the fulfillment of its newer aims must take their place.

"Creative Christianity" is a contribution toward reshaping the inherited forms in which our Protestantism has expressed its inner life for us so that the coming generation nurtured under the changed spiritual tendencies current today may have a form of Christianity better fitted to its needs.

Ohio's Capital all Stirred Up Over Religion

IN Columbus, O., a group of ministers of kindred minds have held social and intellectual fellowship together in a club called the "Theological Seventeen." In most cities there are similar clubs. The Columbus group, however, decided that the papers and discussions which made their periodic gatherings so instructive and enjoyable ought to be taken out to the general public. They therefore held an institute in which they took turns in treating the more vital aspects of religious truth frankly and constructively, and all from the modern point of view. Probably no city in the land has seen this year such a theological hub-bub as that which followed. The newspapers reported the utterances, the people discussed them in their homes and clubs, and the pulpits took up the discussion with much heat. A prominent fundamentalist was imported by certain conservatives to make reply. He concluded by issuing a defiant challenge to the "Theological Seventeen" to debate the question of evolution with him. An interesting aspect of the discussion was the fact that there was scarcely a pulpit outside those held by the "seventeen" that came to the support of the modernist view. Practically the entire pulpit of the city stood solidly for the traditional view of things. The "seventeen" were pilloried as men who "tore the sacred scriptures to shreds." The five Methodist ministers who belong to the club were made the special target of attack. A whole day was spent by their fellow Methodist ministers in hearing the five state their position, and in making answer to them. The day closed with no action at all. When on a following Monday the five were out of town attending a conference on social service, the Methodist preachers' meeting passed a resolution reaffirming the virgin birth and offering all sorts of good advice to the absent ministers, in the list of which is the suggestion that they leave the Methodist ministry. On the whole, this chapter in the religious history of Columbus will prove to be as wholesome and fruitful as it has been interesting. We believe in discussion. The times demand it. There is a keen appetite just now for a better understanding of religion. The next ten years will see those truths which have become the commonplace of all modern scholars carried down into the ranks of popular thinking. But we could have suggested a better strategy for the Columbus liberals. We would have left the "Theological Seventeen" out of it. Such discussions should be disentangled as far as possible from every irrelevant social emotion. In this case the modern interpretation was symbolized by a group which, however unjustly—and of course it was altogether unjustly—found itself conceived as a sort of aristocratic and high-brow champion. The unconscious resentment which accompanied this conception undoubtedly played its part in solidifying the outsiders on the conservative side. It is bad strategy for an esoteric or exclusive circle of any sort to make itself the public champion of a spiritual movement. What it gains in esprit du corps it loses in spontaneous reinforcement from those unexpected quarters of public sympathy and intelligence which usually turn the tide.

Berry of Birmingham to Follow Dr. Jowett

IT now seems certain that Rev. Sidney Berry, of Birmingham, will follow Dr. Jowett in the pastorate of Westminster Chapel, London, as he followed him in his present ministry at Carr's Lane. No two men could be more unlike in personality and mental method, as well as in their point of approach in preaching. One turns to the only book published by Mr. Berry, "The Crucible of Experience," soon to appear in this country, to see what manner of preacher he is. There is no weaving of words into colored lace-work such as is characteristic of Dr. Jowett, no striking wealth of illustration as in Dr. Watkinson, nor any of the radiant mysticism of Dr. Horton. The secret of his preaching is that he is in vital touch with life as men live it today, dealing with the problems of the ordinary man who often finds it hard to trust the love and power of God. His faith is not a complete and final explanation of life, but the courage to face reality when there is no explanation—a song in the night. Like Dr. Norwood, of the City Temple, he is an example of the new preaching developed by the war, direct, not ornate, frank in facing up to the real issues of life and faith and death. He speaks always from experience, not from mere theory, and men hear in his words the ring of reality which means more than all rhetoric. If he accepts the pastorate of Westminster Chapel, we predict for him a fruitful and inspiring ministry.

Shall We Ulsterize the United States?

THE repudiation of the Ku Klux Klan by twenty-five Grand Masters of Freemasonry in the United States is very significant, in that it puts an end to the attempt of the klan to identify itself with a great fraternal order. Freemasonry is a beautiful and benign influence in our national life, humane, rich in philanthropy, founded on spiritual faith and moral principle, and in no-wise to be confused with owlish orders that work in the dark in defiance of law. It is an order of picked men, obligated to chastity and charity, and sworn to make righteousness and good-will prevail. The Ku Klux Klan, if it has its way, will Ulsterize America, making our cities scenes of tragedies such as terrify Belfast. It behooves right-thinking men of all races and religions to bestir themselves, lest rancor, running rife, end in a saturnalia of blood-red intolerance. Those who fan such passions are playing with fire, forgetting that Lilliputians may kindle a conflagration which even a Gulliver cannot extinguish. Though boasting of its "Americanism," a more un-American organization than the Ku Klux Klan has never been concocted.

The Thing Europe Needs to Know

MR. P. W. Wilson, New York correspondent of the London Daily News, has been telling England some plain home truths about the sentiment and opinion of America, and why it did not have part in the Genoa and Hague conferences. With uncompromising candor he put the matter after this manner: "The thing that needs saying to Europe as the opinion of the United States is that Europe is not the whole world. She is no longer most of the world, but only one-sixth of it. Apparently Europe is unaware that the other five-sixths of the world have, with the exception of Japan, reduced their armies to the size of police reserves, and we are told that Japan is preparing greatly to reduce her army. Outside of Europe and Japan there are no armaments left. What is happening is simply that the rest of the world is leaving Europe behind." He advises England to leave European entanglements alone, and take her course alongside the United States. If Europe wishes to "Mexicanize itself into bankruptcy," the brilliant journalist can see no reason why Britain should go down with it. All of which is good counsel as a temporary expedient; but, in the long result, the whole world must hold together or fly to pieces, and one-sixth may set fire to the rest.

The Objective Study of Church Life

SPIRITUAL forces are undoubtedly the major element in the development of a church, but they are difficult to weigh and measure. Other elements that enter into church life can be weighed and measured. Yet there is a strange lack of accurate knowledge with regard to church life. The study of the ministry is not carried on systematically by very many denominations. How many denominational officers could tell, for instance, the number of A. B. men, and the number of B. D. men in their ministry? The influence of training of ministers in the development of churches is yet a subject to be looked into accurately. What happens through a course of years to churches that adopt a social program? Does the service program detract from evangelistic success or is the opposite the fact? Without doubt an interesting study could be made of the outstanding missionary churches. Would the facts bear out the statement that these churches which carry the burden of the world's redemption on their shoulders are also more faithful in the work of the local field? Does any church secretary know what happens to a church through a long course of years which pursues a strict sectarian program? The common impression is that such churches suceed better than those which stress the liberal attitude in things religious. But is this so? Even in such ordinary matters as a fair count of church members many communions have no reliable figures. Dean W. E. Garrison has called attention to the fact that in a list of the ten largest Disciples churches, four of them report their membership as 4000, 3000 and two 2000. He remarks dryly that it is a strange coincidence that four out of the ten should have their membership reported in even numbers. The scientific study of the churches is yet to come. When it does come, it will put to flight a multitude of unchallenged ideas about church administration. Disciples who contend that "open membership" churches fail, will venture to look at the failure (!) of the Methodists, and Episcopalians who contend that without the eucharist at the hands of a priest one's spiritual life dies will perhaps take a peep at the missionary activities of the Congregationalists.

Cilicia Refugees in Syria

WE recently spoke of the problem of the refugees from Cilicia who have found their way into Syria. Their situation is difficult, but they are making their way and will in most cases be able to live and re-establish their families. Now a new phase of the question arises in the fact that several thousand orphans who have thus far been kept in the Near East Relief orphanages in Asia Minor must be brought out of the territory under Turkish control because of the handicaps under which work on such a large scale would be carried on in Anatolia. The Syrian orphanages are already crowded to capacity, and the orphans who came with the Cilician refugees have had to be cared for. To absorb a new group amounting to nearly ten thousand, without greatly increased facilities for handling them, is unthinkable. And those facilities can only be secured by the continued and increased gifts of America's Christian people. The very fact that the adults are winning out over the greatest odds, and ask a negligible amount of help, is proof of the physical and spiritual fibre of the Armenians. The orphans deserve to be helped until they are old enough to support themselves, and that help must be continuous. Summer must not be allowed to interfere with the flow of money, for hunger is never mindful of season. We may be inclined to tire of the constant appeal, but a moment of reflection cannot but prove our obligation to push to complete fruition the work to which we have set our hands, which is as valuable to our own souls as it is to the bodies and minds of the orphan children whose lives we are saving.

The Pros and Cons of Censorship

CENSORSHIP is feared by the moving picture interests. It is well known that if the churches once unite in a demand for censorship, it will surely come. However, there is not yet a unanimous verdict on the part of church folk. A recent voluminous report on the movies by the social service commission of the Federal Council of Churches leaves the whole question of censorship open. The evils that are protested by the churches are now well understood by the producers. The remedy is not so plain. Censorship, like all forms of government regulation of industry, lends itself easily to graft and favoritism. It is possible to accomplish the regulation of the movies by other means. In any local community the churches could do a good deal of regulating on their own account if they had a joint committee on movies. If the theaters showing objectionable film were clearly marked, and if the coming of helpful pictures were announced in advance, the church constituency could throw its support unitedly against bad pictures and in favor of the good. The box office receipts are the votes that determine the quality of movies. The suggestion that certain shows be given for children, and that children be barred out at other times has much to commend it. Many a film that is a legitimate delineation of adult problems is a baneful influence on the minds of children. Even if federal censorship does not come, there should be a federal licensing of producers and distributors with a penalty for the distribution of the obscene. This would make it possible to hale into court men whose productions are particularly obnoxious. We have long since barred out evil books, and the same regulation for moving pictures is in keeping with American principles. The local laws should make it possible for authorities to close places where the pictures violate the canons of morality and good taste. Meanwhile the discussion must go on in friendly spirit, for it cannot be denied that the moving picture rightly used is one of the great adjuncts of education.

Liquor and the American Ships

RECENT efforts of Adolphus Busch, the brewer, to make our prohibition laws seem ridiculous, have only served to draw public attention to a problem that the American government must work out. Were prohibition only a kind of police regulation, it is conceivable that different laws would prevail on the high seas from those which prevail on land. But prohibition is in the constitution of the United States. To permit violations of fundamental law anywhere in the world under the American flag is lawlessness. It is undoubtedly true that some will choose a foreign ship with liquor rather than an American ship without it, for that is the kind of a patriot the average rich drunkard is. But that this demand of a small group should be made the determining principle in American policy is, of course, absurd. The Anti-Saloon League counters with a suggestion which is worthy of consideration. Instead of permitting liquor on American ships, why not forbid it on all ships that enter our harbors? Such a regulation enforced in the three mile limit on all shores would solve the problem in a way that would maintain the sanctity of the fundamental law of our country. It is well known that the smuggling of liquor is now one of the profitable businesses that has sprung up following the war. Five thousand miles of British frontier on land and sea makes the problem a difficult one, since so much of the shipping of the world travels under the British flag. The smuggling business that has its base in certain islands of the West Indies can be stamped out by proper regulation. Meanwhile the zeal of Mr. Busch in behalf of the American laws may be gauged by his suggestion that our laws be modified to permit the manufacture of beer. He is likely to be going back to his castle in Germany soon, for there is no business in his line in America and there will not be.

International Demonstration Against War

CHURCH and labor groups will unite on July 29-30 with veteran's associations and uplift clubs in denouncing the evils of war and in lifting up the new slogan, "No More War." Two years ago three cities in Europe had such demonstrations. Last year, two hundred cities participated, and this year it is believed that the observance of the anniversary will enlist millions of people throughout the civilized world. In America the demonstration is being managed by the National Council for the Reduction of Armaments. It is planned to send to President Harding a monster petition in which Christian people will ask him to continue his efforts in behalf of world peace. One of the publicity features of the campaign is the placarding of the whole country. Posters are now being printed by the million, with the three words of the slogan in startling black type. The ministers of the nation are being asked to preach on the slogan on the last Sunday in July. In times of peace we must prepare for peace. This movement is international and it is hard to see how any right-thinking citizen can find fault with it. Unless we are imperialistic in our thinking, we shall meet more than half way the advances of men across the water who long for the blessings of peace. The National Council for the Reduction of Armaments has some very concrete and sensible suggestions to make. The nations should ratify the treaties that were made at the recent conference. America should make drastic reduction of its army and navy to prove its good faith. Our nation should share in the work of the International Court at the Hague. Governments should manufacture all munitions. This would end the machinations of munition makers. These and other equally intelligent ideas should be given to the people of the world for consideration.

The Ethics of Advertising

APPRECIATION of the significance of the recent convention of the advertising fraternity has already been expressed in The Christian Century. We, with increasing thousands of thoughtful Americans, watch this annually recurring event with the keenest interest. The tendencies are so wholesome, and the sense of their responsibility, on the part of the members of this high profession, is so gratifying that good hopes of the future are well justified.

It is peculiarly important that the members of this profession become their own critics and voluntarily establish ever higher standards of ethics for it, unlike other useful professions is exempt from the ordinary processes of criticism. Its rapidly increasing power must prove a grave menace, both to its members and to society at large, unless the fraternity shall itself keep sensitive and shall perpetually be about the holy business of cleaning its own house. The press—all others fall under its million-eyed scrutiny. But who sees anywhere in the press a calm and judicial appraisal of the virtues and vices of the advertising fraternity, or a thorough-going critique of the philosophy upon which it operates? The publisher dare not countenance a bold essay into this field. The editor is too subservient to the publisher to give free vent to the thoughts which may be stirring within him. Only a few periodicals, and they of a purely technical character or for other reasons limited in circulation, are published or can be published today, except by the grace of the advertising fraternity.

The occasional radical journal boldly assails the brigand department store which dictates the editorial and news policy of the metropolitan dailies, or is said to do so. Unscrupulous publishers who are willing to go partners with the vendor of patent medicines in poisoning their readers, are held up to reprobation by editors whose publishers have attained a state of civilization capable of discarding that barbarism. But no widely circulated, popular periodical could survive, or thinks of attempting to survive, without the aid of the advertiser. And as the business becomes more highly organized, more nearly trustified, if one may so speak, this subserviency is not alone to a method of doing business, a mode of society, but to a particular guild or profession, whose massive organization more and more conclusively dominates the vending of news and of current comment. As already remarked, no other profession or business enterprise in the whole range of our civilization is so nearly exempt from criticism through the ordinary media of public discussion. Even the book publisher would doubtless think twice before he would permit a volume to pass from his presses which should undertake to overhaul the fundamentals of the advertiser's profession, and seriously raise the question whether we do well to buy our reading matter by the round-about process of paying the merchant for our soap and breakfast foods and chewing gum. The numerous books in this field are all committed to the guild and its program. The periodical prints are all loyal to its fundamental principles, however mildly critical they may be of certain incidental usages. The country editor dwells upon the wisdom of the heavily advertising merchant, and scorns the poor bumpkin who pretends to keep store without calling him and his wide pages in as a partner and an ally in the vending of his wares. Naturally. No country newspaper can survive apart from this alliance.

To raise any of these fundamental questions subjects one to the peril of being classified with this poor bumpkin. Can any person be so benighted as not to see the advertiser as the very savior of society, the prophet of popular education, and the inspirer of advancing civilization in all of its outreaches! But simply because so few are disposed to these searching questions, it is the more important that the advertiser should himself give his attention to them. He may be sure that they are not being overlooked by the discriminating but unvocal layman. Perhaps this silent citizen is not as yet numerous enough nor sufficiently bold, to raise his voice through the few media which the advertiser's program has left open to him, but he is at least wondering whether all this furious and fulsome exploitation of anything and everything prepared to pay the price is really a civilizing process or the contrary.

Has the advertiser threshed out the question already referred to, and confirmed himself in a seasoned conviction? Is it an altogether worthy service to society that every citizen should be compelled to pay heavily for chewing gum and automobile tires and various brands of soap each time he buys a magazine or a newspaper at the corner of the street? Or, since that is truer to the facts, turn the proposition around, and ask whether it is altogether good economics and morals, that every time a citizen buys a rubber tire or an automobile or a stick of chewing gum or a cake of soap, he should be forced to pay for the cheap story magazine which the addle-pated may choose further to addle their wits upon? Might it not be better economics and better morals if we should all be given the privilege of paying for what we get and want to get, and not be forced by the riotous canons of our advertising policies to pay with each purchase for a lot of things which we do not want, and have no possible use for? Surely every one who has pondered this matter at all, and has thumbed through the amazing display of advertising pages which weigh down every popular periodical, has had such questions raised again and again in his own mind. Of course the most casual reader of these popular prints understands full well that the five, or ten, or fifteen cents, which he pays for the bulky tome at the news-stand, not to speak of the two or three cents which are alone expended for the vast expanses of his daily paper, are not paying for what he is getting. If he knows anything about the business, or has even a vestige of imagination, he is conscious that usually his few cents do not so much as pay for the white paper which he carries home. The enormous expense of printing and distributing the text, and of remunerating the highly talented authors who supply the copy, must manifesty be met otherwise than through his purchase money.

Usually he is sufficiently a philosopher to have carried his queries to the point where, conscious that the publishers, and the authors, and the editors, and the news-dealers, are not in their several businesses purely for their health or driven by the missionary passion, he realizes that he himself, and his fellow-consumers of widely advertised commodities, are finally paying the bill of expense. And this is one of his practical queries: Would it not be more honest, and in every way better social economy, to pay for our reading matter what reading matter costs, and pay for our soap and chewing gum what they cost?

Of course one must be prepared for the come-back: You simpleton, do you suppose there would be much of any reading done on that basis? The reading public would at once be cut to one-tenth of its present host. The advertiser is a great benefactor of society. He encourages reading, and general education, by cozening simple-minded and stingy folks into paying for their reading matter while they buy, or assume that they are only buying, their soap and groceries. Is not this the way of all education? If people were compelled or expected to pay for what they get, they would seek and get precious little. Is not the advertiser practicing an exceedingly wholesome deception upon the sluggard public, compelling them to pay for culture, will they nil they, when they pay for their automobiles and tooth-paste?

Perhaps a few laymen may still be bold enough to demur against the kind of culture which must come of this process. May it not be that this is one of the things which is the matter with our culture? Is it so certain that this is an altogether worthy service to society, this wholesale humbug under which we are absorbing culture through subsidizing print? But pass on to another question.

The highest-minded professional advertiser must be keenly conscious of the frightful temptations which his science puts in the way of his fraternity, to make and unmake values by the sheer cunning of his arts. The accepted formula for successful merchandizing is, Have something fit to sell and tell people about it. Emerson was so far disposed to disregard the importance of the latter half of the formula that he is often held up to the scorn of the advertising fraternity and their clients. They scout the suggestion that the public will make paths through anybody's wilderness to reach the inventor of anybody's mouse-trap, however ingenious or efficient it may be. Such an isolated manufacturer will perish and his invention with him. On the other hand, may not the query be justified, whether the advertiser is not often so impressed with the importance of the latter half of the formula that he quite overlooks the former half? A brilliant member of the fraternity is credited with the statement that his art can infallibly guarantee a return of a hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the manufacturer of anything, who will put one hundred thousand dollars into advertising; after that the article must make its way on its merits. This latter concession contains some slight reassurance. But is it not disconcerting to realize that the public, up at least to the comfortable margin indicated, is at the mercy of any and every propagandist or bunco-steerer who has or can borrow his hundred thousand dollars? So comfortable, indeed, is the margin, as to lead to the apprehension that the easy risk has been assumed by a large number of the exploiters of commodities with which the markets are flooded.

In short, has the advertising fraternity devised a means by which it can be rescued from the frightful perils of the power it has assumed? Quite regardless of its merit, it has the power to "sell" any old or new thing, up to a certain limit entirely profitable to the exploiter, of whatever conscience? Regardless of the probity of high-minded leaders of the profession, is it wholesome that this power should be lodged anywhere? Let us not ask whether this power is abused, or how flagrantly it is abused; is it well that any irresponsible agent or agency should have such power? Above, we were compelled to shake our heads over the program of seducing the public into gaining its culture through subsidizing print; is a pedagogy which conducts its school under such standards the kind to which our democracy should be sent? Now we propound, are democratic ideals likely to be wholesomely conserved under a system which confessedly gives merit a chance to assert itself only after any exploiter has recovered his risk and has acquired a fifty per cent profit?

Once more. Advertising has multiplied the wants of the multitudes, and widened their aspirations. It is forcing upon them, by all the seductions of the artist and the phrase-maker, articles which their dull wits would never drive them to "make paths through the wilderness" in search of. Admitting the value of this service, and that the motive back of it is laudable, does the advertiser sincerely justify the present expense of this educational process? We will accept his glowing phrases, setting forth the virtues of a mouthful of inexhaustible chewing gum, following each meal. All humanity needs chewing gum, and he is going down to an untimely grave who neglects the purchase of this essential commodity in sufficient quantity to insure a supply immediately and constantly at hand against his unfailing and inappeasable diurnal need. But is society properly burdened with an expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars for the sole purpose of communicating the fact to the public that one manufacturer, who has three kinds of flavors already on the market, has now rendered humanity the boon of placing there a fourth, which turns out to be a plain and unmistakeable immitation of a form and flavor which a rival manufacturer has found takes the popular fancy? This event is heralded on flaming bill-boards, on cards in the street cars, in the periodical prints, with a zeal and at an expense which would lead the visitor from Mars to suppose that our society ranks it as immeasurably more significant than such inconsequential incidents as the signing of Magna Carta, or of the Declaration of American Independence.

This is not an isolated case. This is the constant and largest resource of the advertising fraternity, this lending of the sublimation of their art to the magnifying of the insignificant, and the imposition upon the public of the enormous burden incident to ridiculous and wicked cut-throat competition. Does not the advertiser, brainy, alert, resourceful, marvelously talented and skilful, as he is universally conceded to be—does he not sometimes entertain doubts of the value of his so prodigious labors? Is he not compelled by his own science to feel himself pretty cheap at times? What are the motives which drive on the artist and the phrase-maker and the expounder of the truth of modern advertising from the pulpits of the city in which he holds his annual convention, as he labors to "put across" such a prodigy as a new wrapper for a stick of chewing gum, or a new tube for the same old tooth-paste? Perhaps he is only taking the public where he finds them. But surely some other motive than that of imperishable service to humanity holds him steady to this purpose and crowns his acknowledgedly brilliant success.

These few paragraphs bristle with interrogation points. Questions are all we intend to raise. After raising them we feel a new satisfaction in the reports from the recurring annual conventions of the advertisers, to the effect that the fraternity is eagerly striving to put itself upon an exalted ethical platform. All good citizens will wish them Godspeed in a task whose successful issue is so manifest a social desideratum.

Lincoln

HE walked among us and we passed him by
And thought him but a country lawyer, crude
As our red prairies are, and more than rude,
Who reveled in his jokes and deviltry.
We could not know the heart within that breast
Until the blood flowed freely from the wound
A madman made; then was it that we found
That God had loaned us for a time His Best.
And now the nations, since their kings are gone,
Have taken him across the wide-flung sea
To rule their hearts as well as ours; to be
The goal of their desires, with breaking dawn.

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

The Sources of Joy

A Parable of Safed the Sage

GO to, all ye who say that this world is a desert of woe; for behold, I declare unto you that the Red Card came down from the house of the daughter of Keturah on the very day when the Organ and the Monkey came to town. And this was not the first Red Card, but the one that the Board of Health put up afterward; for the Measles of the Daughter of the Daughter of Keturah descended to her little brother. And on the days when he was Well Broken Out, he considered himself a Person of Distinction.

Now, as we sat at Dinner, I spake unto Keturah, saying, The Merchants of our Village, are giving a Little Street Fair and Carnival tonight ,and they have done some Decorating, and I think I will show my Appreciation of their Enterprise, and walk down there after a while.

And Keturah said, I would not trust thee there alone. I also have determined to walk down there.

And I said, That is all to the good. We will go together.

And she said, The Grandchildren are counting upon it, and their parents have promised to take them.

And at the corner, we met them, and we went with them.

And there were festooned Japanese Lanterns, with Electrick Bulbs in them, but otherwise they were the same as when I was a boy and we used Candles; and there were Flags and Streamers and Lights. And the Avenue was closed to Traffick, and two Policemen stood keeping out the Automobiles, so we forsook the Sidewalk, and walked in the Street, or any old place we chose.

And on the corner was a man of Macedonia, Popping Pop Corn over a Gasoline Torch, and we stopped and patronized him. And then we met a man who sold Horns, and we patronized him. And then we met a man who sold Red Balloons and we patronized him.

And the only trouble is that no little boy or girl hath hands enough to bankrupt a grandfather; for when thou hast a Red Balloon and an Horn and a Feather Tickler and a Bag of Pop Corn, the eye may not be satisfied with seeing, but the hands are fully occupied with holding.

And after that there were the Clowns, and the Outdoor Moving Pictures, and the stunts of the Firemen, and the Organ and the Monkey. And that is the most funny of all.

And Keturah said, I could verily testify that this is the same old Italian I heard when I was a girl, and the very same Monkey.

And I answered and said, If that be true, I will be willing to assert that there have been no repairs to the Organ.

And when the children grew weary and sleepy, then did we go home, and not till then. And it pleased me to discover anew that the joys of one generation differ not greatly from those of another. And I said unto Keturah:

Myself when young did eagerly frequent Places arranged for childish merriment; And now I take a little hand and go Into the very doors where then I went. A bag of Pop Corn underneath the bough, A feather tickler and an horn to blow, A monkey and a slap-stick and a clown. Oh, life is full of joys both then and now.

Zionist Designs on Palestine

By Herbert L. Willett

AT the present time the people of the Holy Land are greatly exercised over the efforts being made to stimulate Jewish immigration thither, and to secure special political rights for Jews resident there. The British government, to which has fallen the entente mandate for Palestine, has created Sir Isaac Samuels its High Commissioner, and measures already taken have alarmed the non-Jewish elements in Palestine, where the Zionists already claim to have secured a program that will make the country the homeland of the Jews, and ultimately a Jewish state. It is insisted by such people that Palestine was originally in Jewish possession, and so continued for many centuries, until other races expelled them, since which time they have been powerless, and should be restored to their native land.

What are the facts? The two most serious shocks that disturbed the life of ancient Israel were the fall of Samaria which brought the end of northern Israel's history in 721 B. C., and the destruction of Jerusalem and the beginning of the exile of an important section of the people of Judah in Babylonia in 586 B. C. Of course neither of these events removed a very large proportion of the population either of the north or of the south. Some of the more resourceful of the people, those who were most likely to promote new efforts for national revival, or those who were most likely to promote new efforts for national revival, or those who were most promising as citizens of the lands in the Mesopotamian valley, were removed. The remainder, which included the vast majority, was not disturbed. Those who refer to the "ten lost tribes" as though they were taken somewhere else and lost, forget that the most serious dislocation of this unhappy people was not of population, but of racial integrity and institutional life. They "lost out" by intermigration and neglect. For more than half a century from the fall of Jerusalem the territory of Judah was occupied by the depressed though numerous remnant of the kingdom of Judah, while the region to the north did not recover its importance until shortly before the Christian era.

FAITH OF THE PROPHETS

All through this time the prophets preached the need of faith in Israel's future. Hardly one of the notable moral leaders of the nation who were witnesses of these sad experiences, or lived in the dark days that followed them, failed to bear insistent witness to the confidence that the people would be permitted to return to their land and rebuild their institutions. Pages could be filled with prophetic words of this sort. They are found in Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, the Second Isaiah, and the oracles of later days. The later voices were as insistent as the earlier ones, for at best the return of the exiles in 538 B. C. was partial and unsatisfactory. During at least a century more the leaders kept urging the prosperous and satisfied Jews in the lands of the east to come back to the country of their fathers and assume their part in its rehabilitation. The glowing hopes of the past had been realized in only the most meager manner. The fragments of the nation, both in Palestine and beyond the great river, needed assurance that there was really a future for Israel.

In part, such hopes and promises were fulfilled in the return of some of the Jews when Cyrus conquered Babylon in 538 and issued his famous decree of liberation. In part, they were fulfilled in the long years of the slow and painful revival of Judah that followed. In part, they were based on conditions of obedience and consecration which were not realized, and therefore were never fulfilled, and never will be. New Testament writers, like the apostle Paul, say that the royal hopes for a Davidic line of rulers in Palestine were futile, and that the vivid expectations of the earlier generations would have to be transferred from the political to the spiritual plane. This did not mean that these promises were to be allegorized and rendered ineffectual. It meant, as Jeremiah affirmed, that God was not shut up to one instrument for the accomplishment of his will, but could select another people who would achieve his designs by faith and evangelism. This was what Paul made the thesis of his epistle to the Romans, wherein he made clear the eternal purpose of God to reach all men through the message of the gospel. To the Jew that was first committed. But upon his failure to accept that first responsibility, it was made the joy and privilege of the non-Jews to undertake it. None the less, Paul loved his nation so much that he was not without confident hope that in spite of their former indifference to their high vocation, they would yet come to prize the divine gift which at first they despised.

NO SCRIPTURE FOR RETURN

But in all this there was no assurance that they should ever go back to their ancient land. The prophets had hoped that such a consummation might be enjoyed. In part it was actually realized. In part it could not be accomplished. And beyond the fulfillments which the returning Jews obtained, and the attainments of faith to which Jew and Gentile alike may aspire, there is nowhere in scripture the slightest indication that the Jewish people are to return to their ancient land. Those long lists of prophetic texts on which millenarian interpreters love to dwell, have not the remotest reference to such a reassembling of Israel in Palestine in the present or any future time. They dealt wholly with the political fortunes of the ancient nation.

So much for the biblical aspects of the matter. What about the more material facts of Israel's reoccupation of the Holy Land? The situation is not difficult to understand. The Hebrew people were in possession of Palestine from about 1250 B. C. until the fall of the northern and southern kingdoms in 721 and 586 respectively. Before them there was a long Amorite and Canaanite history. With the revival of Judah after the exile the Jewish population gradually increased until the later and more tragic fall of Jerusalem in 70 A. D. Since that event which closed the volume of Jewish national life, apparently forever, various other races have been in possession. As the Hebrews dispossessed the Canaanites, and were in turn succeeded by a portion of their national group, so in like manner came the Arabs, who with as good title have held the land for twelve centuries. Today they are as much the possessors of Palestine as are the French of France or the Italians of Italy. Under all the forms of government, Arab, Saracen, Christian and Turkish, which have prevailed in Palestine for the last twelve centuries, as long a period as Hebrew history covered, the Arabs have been in possession.

There has always, however, been a small group of Jews in the land. Today they number, among the 650,000 population, about one-tenth. They are of four sorts. There is the company of Jewish pensioners, including the Sephardic Jews that originally came from Spain in the days of the persecutions under Ferdinand and Isabella, and those of the Askinazim group from Russia and Germany. They receive regular stipends from Jewish funds, but are not of a sort to contribute in any helpful manner to the life of the land. Secondly, there are the industrial Jews, who make up the membership of some dozen communities planted by wealthy Jewish patrons in various parts of the land, and exhibiting a most commendable spirit of thrift. In the third place there is the commercial Jew, who has taken advantage of the tourist traffic which will always be a considerable part of the business of Palestine. Money is to be made there, and no one knows better than the Jew how to profit by catering to the needs of the public. Lastly there is the Jew of the Zionist type, whose emotions are stimulated by the memories of the land, and the dream that it may again become the home of his race.

FACTS AGAINST ZIONISM

It is only fair to believe that there will always be Jews in Palestine. The land is dear to them as a race. But it is no dearer to them than it is to Christians and Mohammedans, to both of whom it is truly the Holy Land. And when one faces the simple facts he is instantly aware that the Jewish are not going to return to Palestine. To come to this conclusion it is only necessary to look at conditions as they exist. There are some twelve or fourteen millions of Jews in the world. The total population of Palestine today is a little more than six hundred and fifty thousand. Under improved agricultural conditions, such as it is fair to believe are likely to prevail with better government, the land would sustain a population of a million. If adequate dams and other irrigation projects could be constructed, another three hundred thousand might be added to the population, but hardly more. Palestine is a very small country. Its area is only about a quarter that of the state of Illinois, and about the same as the state of Connecticut, or the principality of Wales. Even of this the Hebrews never occupied more than the central mountainous district, a stretch of territory some seventy or eighty miles in length by about twenty to thirty in breadth. The lowlands were for the most part in the hands of other people, like the Phœnicians in the north and the Philistines on the southwest. The richest section of Palestine, that portion on the east of the Jordan, was never counted as a Hebrew possession, but belonged to Moab and Ammon.

Moreover, the description of the country as "flowing with milk and honey" must be understood as the regard in which it was held by the desert tribes, among whom the Hebrews tarried in the wilderness. It was not the measure of its fertility as judged by standards prevailing in agricultural regions. Portions of the land are fertile, and very beautiful in the spring. But on the other hand, large parts return only grudging harvests to the most careful cultivation. Close study of the Old Testament shows that the land never supported a large population at any time within the historical period. The notations of numbers in the Hebrew records, particularly the size of armies and the numbers slain in battles are picturesque rather than authentic, while the patriotic exaggerations of Josephus have long been discounted. War and devastation have greatly reduced the capacity of the land to support its population. But even in its most prosperous times this could never have compared in proportionate numbers to the teeming multitudes of Egypt, Babylonia or Central Europe. When it is further remembered that of the total population about sixty per cent are Mohammedans and about thirty per cent Christians, it is at once evident that a considerable problem confronts those who propose to replace ninety per cent of the present inhabitants mostly Arabic or Syrian by race, with a new element represented by ten per cent of the population.

NO WISH TO RETURN

Furthermore, the Jews as a race have neither the wish nor intention to emigrate to Palestine. A small and very sincere portion of them would be glad to do so. They are the scholars, the poets, the dreamers of the nation, whose affection for the land and the traditions of their race has issued in the creation and spread of Zionism. In the aggregate they number many thousands, and include some of the choicest spirits in Judaism. But in proportion to the total number of Jews they are a negligible fraction. For the Jew is a commercial spirit. He is and has been since the days of Babylonian exile the world's typical middle-man. He flourishes only where he can take his place between producer and consumer. Palestine offers only the most meager opportunities for such a vocation, even were its extent many times what it is.

There seems to be no reason why many Jews may not go to the Holy Land to make it their home. Small groups enlisted with one or another of the allied armies with the express stipulation that they should be sent to Palestine to assist in its emancipation from the Turkish yoke. Others organized for hospital and other relief work there. Many of these have remained in the land. They ought to carry out their fine project of organizing in Jerusalem a Jewish university, where the ancient Hebrew language shall be taught, and be the medium of instruction. Their colonies ought to increase there in the land which their fathers once possessed. There is no reason why they should not secure complete political privileges under the new regime which the entente nations have established under English direction. But there is not the least reason for a Jewish state being organized in Palestine. The great mass of the Jewish people, both orthodox and liberal, are opposed to such a plan.

Mr. Henry Morgenthau, perhaps the most representative Jew in America, and lately the ambassador of the United States at Constantinople, says: "Zionism is the most stupendous fallacy in Jewish history—politically unjust, as it is based on the annulment of the national rights of another people; spiritually sterile; economically unsound; socially provocative of the very menaces from which the Jews are trying to liberate themselves." Perhaps this sentiment is as well expressed as anywhere in the resolutions of the Conference of American Rabbis, held in Chicago in July, 1918. The pertinent portion of these resolutions has the following statement: "We are opposed to the idea that Palestine should be considered the homeland of the Jews. Jews in America are part of the American nation. The idea of the Jew is not the establishment of a Jewish state, not the reassertion of Jewish nationality, which has long been outgrown. The mission of the Jew is to witness to God all over the world."

FUTURE OF THE JEW

In a word, then, it may be asserted with emphasis that there are no predictions of restoration of Israel to Palestine which were not fulfilled in the home-coming of the various groups of exiles, or were rendered incapable of fulfillment by national misadventure. The occupation of Palestine by Jews would require the expulsion of its rightful possessors, the Arabic peoples, who have today the same rights in the land that Israel once had, rights that it is one of the great purposes of the enlightened program of internationalism to guarantee to every people by the privileges of self-determination. The Jewish race could not occupy Palestine. No stretch of imagination could picture that "least of all lands" accommodating the millions of that people, scattered throughout the world. Palestine is wholly unfitted by location, character and extent to be the home of the modern Jew, and the vast majority of the race are entirely uninterested in any project that looks to such an end.

The future of the Jewish race is not to be determined in any light or doctrinaire manner. Its place in history has been remarkable. Its persistence has been phenomenal, though to be sure its modification through admixture with other peoples and changes in environment has broken it up into many groups, markedly different and often wholly antagonistic. The moral and religious problems of modern Judaism are perhaps of all most perplexing and acute, for Christianity has too often stood for an arrogant and persecuting force, and is therefore repellent to a vast majority of that race. At the same time the power of the synagogue declines yearly. The Jew has gone into all the world, and there he will remain, either to be absorbed at last like other scattered races which have ceased to be nations, or to play some other as yet undisclosed role in the future. But in spite of the bald materialism and commercialism which seem to dominate so broad a zone of Jewish life, all Christians are under obligation to sustain an attitude of sympathy and good will toward this unique people, partly as an atonement of immeasurable wrongs in the past, and partly in the hope that gradually through the years they may realize that the crowning glory of their race, the greatest gift they ever made to the world, was the man of Nazareth, the lover of Israel, and the Savior of the world.

The Psychology of the Secretary

By John R. Scotford

THE evangelical churches have inherited an ancient antipathy to overhead ecclestical organization. Certain of our forefathers were attracted to this land because the soil had never been desecrated by the toe of a bishop. We have believed and practiced the equality of both churches and ministers. But present necessities require overhead organization in at least three aspects of our common work. We must have religious promoters to organize and finance our missionary and benevolent work. We must have administrators to direct these enterprises in a statesmanlike fashion. We must have experts to study the problems of the church in the fields of education, evangelism, and social service that policies and programs may be intelligently formed.

In the episcopally organized churches such tasks have commonly been laid upon the bishops. The Roman church has oftentimes made of her bishops true ecclesiastical statesmen. They wear gorgeous robes, sit on thrones, and go at the common tasks of the church with energy and authority. The bishops of the Anglican church are gentlemen rather than generals, but they have made a respectable contribution to the thought and life of the world. Formerly Methodist bishops were little more than ornamental examples of piety, but they are now being hitched up to the task of church administration. From the point of view of church organization, the virtue of a bishop is that he represents the entire life of a church within a given area. He is the responsible leader of the church.

By getting rid of the title of bishop our less highly organized churches have not gotten rid of the work of the bishop. Rather have they let out the work of bishops to an unimposing group of men upon whom they have conferred the rather silly title of "secretary." Let us consider for a moment the apostolic succession of the secretary.

SOCIETIES AND THE CHURCHES

A hundred years ago, more or less, the churches came to feel the necessity of doing certain work in common, such as sending missionaries to foreign parts and establishing churches in the new settlements of the frontier. Having a horror of ecclesiastical organization, the churches did not undertake this work directly, but delegated it to certain self-constituted and self-perpetuating societies organized for that purpose. Originally the missionaries were the only employes of these societies, but soon they found it necessary to pay someone to write letters, keep books, and remit money. Naturally the person so employed was called a secretary, and the title has persisted ever since. As there was always need for more money than naturally found its way into the treasury, it was not long before the secretary was sent forth to find the money. Until quite recently the major charge of missionary secretaries was to bring in the money. The financial success of the societies rested squarely on their shoulders.

Through the years the organization of these societies has been modified in the direction of a larger degree of control by the churches. Originally they were run by benevolent gentlemen pretty much to suit their own pleasure. But this utter independence on the part of the societies led to abuses. Sometimes a society would run amuck theologically and misrepresent the churches. More often financial mismanagement would plunge a society into debt—and the churches would have to pay the bill. Slowly have we learned the lesson that independent churches may be a blessing, but that independent societies are a nuisance and a menace. In one way or another the churches have assumed a pretty complete control of the benevolent organizations which they finance.

As a result, the financial methods of the secretary have changed. No longer does he go among the churches taking collections. Most of our denominations have one budget for benevolences covering the work of all the societies. This is commonly apportioned by the national body to the state bodies and by them to the individual churches. The entire machinery of the denomination is used to raise this money. Though the secretaries keep in the background, the ultimate responsibility is largely theirs. In proportion as the missionary enterprise is presented in a large and statesmanlike fashion will the churches respond to the appeal in a generous manner. The task of the secretary today is not to play up picturesque bits of work in order to attract reluctant dollars, but to convince the churches that his organization is rendering real service towards the realization of the kingdom of God among men. It is vision and statesmanship which our secretaries need for their task.

SECRETARIAL LIMITATIONS

But the traditions of the secretarial office are not such as to develop these qualities. Rarely is the secretary taken seriously. The pastors do not ponder long over his letters, nor do the people wait upon his words. Usually he does not get as close to the large minded layman as does the pastor. The secretary easily surrounds himself with an unreal atmosphere. He works in a secluded office. He does not rub up against life in the raw. Too often he loses the point of view of the man who does the actual work of evangelization. He is dealing continually with professional representatives of the real people most involved.

In this environment of spiritual isolation and institutional activity there easily develops an occupational disease which we will call the secretarial mind. The thoughts of the secretary come to revolve about three ideas—the society, the denomination, and money—until his judgment on these matters tends to become constitutionally twisted.

The average secretary is tempted to see his society large and the church small. He thinks of himself as a "faithful servant of the society" rather than as a statesman of the church. Many times has this led to a silly secretarial rivalry. Our secretaries have not all discovered that the society is only a legal fiction for the church, and in consequence they take a partial view of the church and its work. Protestantism has produced able Sunday school leaders, effective debt raisers, industrial superintendents of church extension, sagacious foreign mission administrators, but we have not developed many real leaders of the whole church. The agencies through which the churches work have stood in the way of an effective church consciousness.

DENOMINATIONALISM

Denominationalism creates a more serious kink in the secretarial mind. The secretary lives in and for the denomination. He comes near to being a high priest of the present sectarian order. He exaggerates the peculiar contribution which his denomination makes to our common faith and life, and he minimizes or entirely disregards the contributions of other churches. The Methodist gets to imagining that there is no true spiritual fervor save in his own fold, the Congregationalist deludes himself into thinking that he has a monopoly of democracy and education, while the Presbyterian suspects that there is no sound doctrine where the authority of presbytery is not recognized. They offer their devotion to a denominational fairy land which exists nowhere in heaven or earth save in their own unnatural consciousnesses. As a matter of fact, denominational virtues and vices are so thoroughly scrambled that no secretary can ever find a local congregation which really represents the idea in his own head. Further, years of labor on behalf of certain churches and institutions gives to them a certain sanctity in the eyes of the secretary. It is pretty hard to convince him that a church which he has nursed through the years is really dead. A theological student was once sent as a summer supply to a church in the southwest. He found it a totally unnecessary organization to the community, and hopelessly dead. He reported to the secretary that he would not be a party to the perpetuation of an ecclesiastical superfluity. The secretary sent him to another town, with the comment that while he knew the church in the first community was hopeless, he hated to admit it because it happened to have been the pioneer church of the community. This man was honest above the run of secretaries. If the secretarial mind could shift its center of interest from the denomination to the kingdom of God, church unity would take a long step forward.

The most subtle and dangerous obsession of the secretarial mind has to do with money. Dollars are the most definite, tangible, and fascinating things with which the secretary has to do. He must see that the missionaries' scanty salaries are paid, and he can only do this by somehow getting the money. Never was there known to be enough money to carry on the work properly. The more conscientious the secretary is in his devotion to the missionary enterprise, the more earnest will he be in the pursuit of funds. Further, the secretary's personal fortunes depend upon his financial record. The man who does not keep his organization out of debt and show a decent increase in receipts is in danger of losing his job, and it is pathetically difficult for a man once a secretary to be anything else. These conditions tempt him to make money getting the supreme goal of his labors, with the result that he becomes more concerned about the treasury than about the kingdom. Financial pressure oftentimes leads secretaries to do strange things and still keep a good conscience. For years it has been the custom to capitalize the picturesque and appealing phrase of the work so as to get the dollars. Just at present the missionary work in Alaska seems to be the favorite money getting appeal. But financial pressure also leads secretaries to drop work, not because the need no longer exists, but because it is not popular with the people who have the money. Some denominational schemes of social service have suffered a mysterious disappearance.

THE LURE OF MONEY

The lure of money seems to have a strange effect upon secretarial theology. The secretarial mind is willing to keep quiet about its own views and to give a silent assent to strange doctrines when such an exhibition of "tact" will bring in the needful sinews of war. There are a good many secretaries who never express a conviction of their own until they have first discovered what the other person's convictions are. But somewhere diplomacy shades off into deceit. If the Disciples did not need the immersionist dollars of America, their secretaries would probably not be so disturbed about fellowshipping unimmersed Christians in China. It was the dire need of money and not any overwhelming desire for a creed which led Baptist secretaries to tolerate the proposal to construct a statement of Baptist belief. In their yielding to the money argument the secretaries are undoubtedly sincere. That side of their conscience which has to do with supporting the work speaks so loud as to drown out the other side of their conscience which would urge a more transparent sincerity and a more whole hearted devotion to the principles of the kingdom. But secretaries need to remember that not only sinners, but doctors of divinity can sell their souls for gold.

The protection and development of the secretary's office is one of the problems of Protestantism. These men ought to be put in a position where they can render constructive and statesmanly service to the kingdom of God.

Dialogues of the Soul

By Arthur B. Rhinow

In the Forest

I—There it is. We must descend the hill and enter the forest.

MYSELF—It looks so wild. I cannot see a path.

I—None see the path until they have entered.

MYSELF—So dense and dark.

I—Plunge in and you will see the light.

MYSELF—But not as bright as out here. How beautiful the sunshine on the hills.

I—In the shaded light you will behold what you cannot see in the glare.

MYSELF—Must we penetrate very far?

I—Through brush and bramble to the goal.

MYSELF—Where we lie down to rest?

I—Where we eat of the tree of life.

The Wonder

MYSELF—You are so still.

I—I feel the hush of the church.

MYSELF—It is the architecture; the Gothic windows. The arches point upward, you know.

I—It is more than that.

MYSELF—Perhaps it is the ritual with its great traditions. And the organ. How some of the new songs jar.

I—No; there is something else.

MYSELF—Is it the quiet? The stained glass softening the light? Shall I tell the boys down stairs to be quiet?

I—Yes, do. I need the quiet. But that is not what makes me so still.

MYSELF—What then?

I—The Wonder.

MYSELF—The Wonder? This is not Lourdes.

I—I know.

MYSELF—Or do you mean the miracles of Jesus?

I—Those were just wonders. I feel the Wonder.

MYSELF—Tell me.

I—I cannot tell. It is so wonderful. Time and eternity blend, and He and I are one. But I cannot tell.

MYSELF—Few feel as you do.

I—They miss the church who do not feel the Wonder.

MYSELF—I wish you would explain.

I—Were it a Wonder if I could explain?

Now

I—Some day—

MYSELF—Why not now?

I—Now?

MYSELF—You will never have a better hour than this.

I—The future may be brighter.

MYSELF—With corresponding shadows.

I—This hour is narrow.

MYSELF—Break the barriers and grow strong.

I—I am weak.

MYSELF—We never pray unless we realize our weakness.

I—And then?

Myself—Then we draw power from omnipotence.

I—You speak well.

Myself—No better hour than this. Others will be different, but not better.

I—The future seems so romantic.

Myself—Because you make it so. But this hour. It is all yours. Surrender to its beauty. Pause and ponder.

I—I shall. I am. I yield. O God.

Myself—What is it?

I—The hour is expanding. I feel the wholeness of it. It is—

Myself—Tell me.

I—The hour is touching eternity.

From the Study Window

I—Do you hear the voice?

Myself—I hear many voices. The evening is warm, and the avenue is a-swarm with people.

I—No; not many voices.

Myself—I know what you mean. On the next corner two orators are haranguing the people.

I—I heard them before; but now the voice is calling me.

Myself—You surely do not mean the pedlar under our window.

I—No; the voice does not speak of buying and selling.

Myself—Not the favorite record of the phonograph man?

I—No instrument. It is like a great soul calling to my soul.

Myself—Where are you going?

I—To follow the voice.

Myself—Where to?

I—In among the people. I hear the call.

Myself—I understand. You mean the ensemble of many voices.

I—No; the soul is calling to my soul.

Alone

Myself—Castles in Spain?

I—Just planning a house.

Myself—A mansion high, above the common?

I—An oriental house, closed to the street and open to a garden, where you and I can be alone and play.

Myself—Closed to the world?

I—Yes. No curious rabble; no dissonant noises.

Myself—How high the walls?

I—High enough to be alone with ourselves and our own.

Myself—But the aeroplanes.

I—The aeroplanes? The aeroplanes! I shall overroof the garden.

Myself—And shut out the light?

I—I shall use frosted glass.

Myself—And shut out the sky.

I—Alas! Can we not be alone?

Myself—Less alone with every advance of science.

I—Not alone?

Myself—It is harder than ever to flee the world.

I—Is there no island, no height, no forest solitude?

Myself—Less every day. Even our dreams are invaded by the spirit of the times.

I—What then?

Myself—Win the world. Bear the good man's burden.

I—And my home?

Myself—Make it occidental.

I—With windows—

Myself—Open upon life.

The Lion in His Den

By Lynn Harold Hough

THE Lion was holding a book in his hand. Bending over beside him I read the title: "Letters of Principal James Denney to W. Robertson Nicoll 1893-1917." My friend was gazing at the portrait of Dr. Denney opposite to the title page of the book. It revealed a strong, severe face, the face of a student and scholar. But it did not tell the secret of the vital tang of the author's style nor did it hint the presence of a low burning humor or the play of dark gleaming wit.

"It was easy to misunderstand Denney. And it was easy to underestimate him," began the Lion. "Think of a theologian who was able to say that if the historical plays of Shakespeare were lost he could repeat them from memory. Think of a stern Scottish professor replying to a friend who had suggested that you must be under twenty to get a real taste of Byron, by saying 'Yes, but Byron has something for us even in the sixties' and then humorously refusing to state what it was. Men were likely to get a sense from afar of Dr. Denney's extremely conservative theological position and then never come to appreciate the ripeness of his scholarship or the keenness and elasticity of his mind."

My friend looked across the room to where several volumes of Principal Denney's stood on one of the shelves.

"I began with Studies in Theology," he said. "And oddly enough it was the standing ground they gave for a man who wanted to accept the general position of modern critical scholarship which first gripped me. Then the clear and cogent way in which the author made a way for the understanding of how men who had never heard of Christ met in their own fashion an opportunity for moral and spiritual decision greatly helped me as to a matter which had caused me some burnings of heart. The publication of "The Death of Christ" found me in a receptive mood. Some particularly searching experiences of struggle and defeat had made me ready for the almost terrible moral realism which gives tone to this New Testament study. Frankly I accepted Dr. Denney's interpretation the more readily because the Christ who speaks from the cross had come to have in my own life just the sort of place which the author was so sure critical study would reveal as belonging to him in the New Testament and in his own consciousness. I dipped into his other books and read carefully his posthumous volume of lectures. His daring criticism always roused and stimulated me. His literary style with all its pungent energy held my mind at sharp attention. And his central message as to the meaning of the cross has always spoken deeply to me."

"A good many men have found Denney the author of hard sayings," I interjected.

"I do not mean at all that he seems to me a complete and well rounded Christian thinker," replied the Lion. "Occasionally one finds a metallic quality in his thinking which hardly suggests that he is in contact with reality. He never speaks of the mystical side of Christianity in words which satisfy me. And I am afraid he was so much taken up with the thought of the inadequacies of some men's presentation of the social aspects of Christianity that the great tidal movement of our time in Christian things was never viewed by him with understanding sympathy. He had one great and mastering word to say and he said it with memorable power. And while I must go to many other men for many other things I think I must say quite simply that I think his fundamental word was a true word."

I was by this time holding the volume of letters in my hand. "What about these?" I asked.

TELLING CRITICISM

"I have read them with constant relish," replied my friend. "There are pages of good talk about books and Dr. Denney writes more freely or at least with an easier frankness of expression in his letters than would be possible in a more formal statement. All sorts of books on the New Testament and in respect of the interpretation of Christianity pass before our notice. There is many a glimpse into the study of a busy scholar and in spite of the reticence there is many a quick revelation of a very noble and responsive heart. It is good writing and there are very telling bits of criticism and very discriminating bits of comment. Take this: (the book was now again in the hands of the Lion) 'Most people will agree with what you say about theological colleges making believers uncomfortable, but I am not sure that burning is the cure. I fancy it must be establishing a more intimate connection between them and the life and work of the church.' Or at a deeper level take this: 'It needs the whole of the New Testament to show what Christ is, and the man only deceives himself when he goes behind Christianity, and exhibits the historical Jesus as a figure which could never have created Christianity at all.' Or in an entirely different vein take this: 'The only man of whom Wesley reminds me is B. Franklin. They have the same relentless practicality and effectiveness in their minds and something of the same kind of limitation.' To me one of the most interesting things in the whole volume of letters was this: 'I had (Kirsopp) Lake staying with me, and much as I dislike his opinions I took to the man very much. He said my review in the British Weekly was the only serious review his book had.' It is wonderfully interesting to think of Dr. Denney and Professor Lake talking together in this intimate and friendly way. Altogether I like the letters so well that I shall read them again. And that means more than adjectives. Sometimes you throw an author an adjective in order to get rid of him. If you go back to his book for a second reading it means that it really has something for you."

America and Japan

By Lucia Ames Mead

As Japanese-American relations are constantly changing, it behooves the voter to keep in touch with the latest aspects. The first new fact is the psychological effect of the Washington conference, which has marvelously lessened the growing tension between Japanese and Americans. Mr. Frederick Moore, the American advisor to Japan, recently said that when, after two years of intense anxiety regarding the increasing friction, he heard the memorable words of Secretary Hughes demanding a naval holiday, he felt as if the walls of a prison house were falling down around him. He felt only those like himself who intimately knew the orient could realize the full significance of this.

A year ago, an intelligent Japanese would have had every reason to regard America as a menace. He might have asked how a so-called Christian country which had hitherto been content with a smaller navy than Great Britain's could now insist on having one as large, unless it meant aggression. Great Britain and Japan can not feed themselves and must protect the merchant marine that supplies their necessities. We, on the other hand, can supply all our own needs. Great Britain has with her possessions twice the coastline to protect that we have with ours, including Alaska. A Japanese might have pointed out that we are the only nation protected by a great ocean. Our northern border is the safest in the world. Ever since battleships were taken from the lakes and all the menacing forts torn down, we have arbitrated every dispute with the nation that had the greatest navy on earth. The Japanese know that no nation on this hemisphere ever attacked us or ever would. Why then were we changing our life-long policy if it were not to menace Japan?

THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE

Thank God for the Washington conference and a fifteen-year breathing space to get the nations into rational relations and to outlaw war. Official word has now come that Japan has made a complete withdrawal of Japanese troops and gendarmes from Shantung. The Tsingtao garrison will itself be removed from the port simultaneously with the transfer of the administration of the leased territories to the Chinese authorities. The report here that Japan is building six new cruisers is denied. Our war department reports Japan as living up to all engagements.

An improvement has been made as regards justice to the Japanese in California. Just before the presidential election I saw in my Los Angeles hotel where Mr. Randolph Hearst was staying, a large cartoon representing a big, brown arm crushing a poor, little prostrate American farmer. As I happened to know that there were much over 3,000,000 whites in the state and only about 80,000 Japanese, half of them women and children, I did not think there was any menace to the white farmer; though men who want to work six hours a day are naturally opposed to men who choose to work twelve hours in the day at the same occupation. The Hearst papers were dragooning the voters into voting for the anti-alien law, and succeeded, despite the vigorous protest published by Dr. David Starr Jordan and a long list of eminent citizens. I recall in one of the Hearst Sunday papers the hideous monster with horns and fangs which represented Japan.

UNFAIR DISCRIMINATION

The interesting event now is that, last month, the supreme court of the state pronounced this anti-alien land law unconstitutional and now permits parents who were ineligible as citizens to be guardians of their American-born children's land. The same court has also declared the $10 poll tax for all aliens unconstitutional. That the courts are gradually rectifying injustices verifies Lord Bryce's advice to Baron Makino, "Trust America, for in the end, she will do the right thing."

But not everything is yet right. There does not seem to have been any notice taken by the federal government of the lawless action of representatives of the American Legion who "met and expelled two or three Japanese families on their arrival in Texas to occupy farms that had been duly and legally purchased." Though, when twenty-eight Japanese laborers were taken from the fields in Turlock, California, and forcibly placed on trains by white laborers, state officers did act and the dozen men involved were arrested and tried. Approximate apologies were made by state officials to the Japanese government.

Were it not for the Hearst papers which are said to be read by 15,000,000 citizens, a new spirit of good-will might now be developed. Says the committee on relations with the orient, of the Federal Council of Churches: "The Hearst and other papers do not fail to utilize every possible incident that can by any means be twisted or exaggerated or even absolutely invented to foster the belief that war between America and Japan is certain." The Herald of Asia of April 20, 1922, says: "When the fabrications issued by the Hearst press as news reach the enormity of prevarication attained by the story recently published by the New York American, the time seems to have come when the Japanese authorities ought to do something more than deplore the existence of malicious Mr. Hearst. The article referred to tells the story in the head. It reads: 'Japan Holds Korea in Slavery with Rifle and Bayonet. Ninety-eight women slain in wholesale executions.' The author, Mr. Robert I. Ward, who is described as an American business man recently returned from a three-years' stay in the far east, gives revolting details of this massacre which is supposed to have occurred thirteen months ago and accompanies his narrative with pictures showing execution scenes. To readers in the orient the 'fake' is plain as the figures, both victims and soldiers, are dressed in Chinese garbs, but to persons in America having no knowledge of Japan and China they are likely to be convincing. Mr. Ward goes on to tell how he saw a Korean buried alive by Japanese soldiers and how the Koreans are gradually being exterminated. The Japanese Advertiser which devotes a long editorial to condemn and expose the canard, points out that the 'extermination is proceeding so gradually that from 1910 to 1918 the Korean population increased from over 13,000,000 to over 16,000,000. The outnumbering in Seoul is done by Koreans whose ratio to that of Japanese residents is three to one."

A Boston man recently touring through the southern cotton belt of our country reports that each local paper carried a Hearst column with the Hearst doctrine. The following excerpts are samples:

"The Washington authorities are content that Japan has turned all her man-power and machinery to building so-called merchant ships. Those ships arranged for transporting flying dynamite-carrying machines across the ocean may worry our government later. If this country ever goes into war with Japan some 'Miss Nancy' gentlemen at Washington will have a bad moment. . . . A few millions for preparation now might save billions for war later.

"Nice invention, that league of nations. Lucky for the United States that a collection of sentimentalists failed to drag us into it. All Europe laughs at it now. . . . Agreements between nations, now as before the war, mean as little as between pirates or burglars. They are broken when it suits either side. The best 'alliance' or 'league' for this purpose is the Atlantic on one side, the Pacific on the other, justice with our dealings with Mexico . . . and adequate preparation here at home."

AMERICAN ASSURANCE

The ominous growth of imperialistic methods of control of weaker people, evidenced in recent demands made in connection with American loans to Liberia and to Bolivia, and in our present coercive attitude to Haiti, Nicaragua and other Caribbean countries is coincident with popular suspicion of Japan. The great majority of citizens are sublimely ignorant of what high finance has tried to effect through American marines in the Caribbean. Even an able congressman told the writer that he had not read a word on the Haitian question and did not know what she referred to when she appealed to him to use his influence for the abrogation of the treaty imposed by force on an unwilling people. He was wholly absorbed in federal banking. Most people are wholly absorbed in domestic matters and are naively sure that the "republic of Washington and Lincoln" with "liberty and justice for all," can be safely trusted to do right by weaker peoples.

So long as many Americans look upon other nations as so many pirates or burglars, we jeopardize our influence. "To see oursel's as ithers see us" would be worth a college education. The Japan society of Boston, composed both of Americans and Japanese, is about to make an easy interchange of letters between Americans and Japanese who write English. These letters may be accompanied by photographs and useful clippings. It is hoped thus to bring about that personal touch between the friendly folk of the occident and the orient which shall lead to mutual benefit. Making treaties must be followed by making friends.

Putting an End to Strikes

ONE of the most sensational notes sounded at the recent national convention of the American Federation of Labor was the statement made by a prominent official of the construction trades that the American people are tired of strikes. It was sensational in that it came from a labor leader who frankly urged that it be acted upon as a recognized fact in labor tactics and that a better way to promote labor's cause be found. The public will heartily echo the desire that a better way be found. Strikes are expensive to labor both in the waste of time and wage and in the exasperation of the public which so often prejudices the case without reference to its merits. They are wasteful of investment, and drive well intentioned employers into the camp of the reactionary all too often. And the public usually loses more than both parties to the war.

There is an average of something over two thousand strikes per year registered by the department of labor. Estimates of the losses entailed are never quite satisfactory. The fact that strikes have to be counted upon necessitates the inclusion of some principle of insurance against them in the profit and loss accounting. Labor is not able to charge up its loss so easily, though it catches up some of its slack by means of casual outside employment during a strike period. Strike payments, in the long run, come out of wages, so there is no gain for labor unless one group in a trade strike for longer periods than others, and even then the extra wage loss far overbalances the strike fund gains.

Of the two thousand strikes per year labor and capital win approximately one-third each, the other third are draws. And the public loses them all. Of course statistics like these do not tell the whole story, as one side may win a big strike and be much the gainer, but in a series of several years it is safe to take the averages at their face value. There is no doubt that strikes have brought to labor a net gain in terms of reduced hours, increased wages and bettered working conditions. Lost strikes may, like Washington's retreats, win a campaign.

The Herrin Massacre

No more deplorable incident has happened in strike annals than that of the recent massacre at Herrin, Ill. I use the word "massacre" deliberately that the onus of such a crime may be expressed. It was massacre by capital's hired gunmen at Ludlow, Colo., and it was massacre by strikers at Herrin, Ill. It was no part of the general strike tactics nor was it deliberately planned by the local union, but it was one of those unspeakable atrocities that inevitably emerge when there is a state of war.

We have no word of extenuation for the men who did the killing. All law abiding citizens hope they will each and severally be given their deserts. But candor should compel all law abiding citizens to attach the appropriate degree of guilt to those who acted so as to make mob action possible and even probable. A man may have a perfect legal right to carry fire, whether in his pipe or his house chimney, but if he exercises that right when there is a ton of exposed dynamite in his vicinity he is both a fool and a menace to society. There is evidence of such culpability on the operators' side at Herrin.

The story runs thus: The unions consented to work on "stripping" the earth off the coal with the express agreement that no coal would be lifted during the strike. The operator agreed. As soon, however, as the coal was stripped and ready for lifting he broke his agreement by hiring a bunch of non-union laborers through one of those infamous agencies which sends strike-breakers and gun men into any area of strife for a price. One of the men testifies that he and his fellows were hired to do railroad work, then herded into the mine by the gunmen and told to dig coal. The man who manipulated this program was killed, but let us hope the full truth will be ascertained by a state tribunal and then given as full publicity by the press as the massacre itself has received.

In some places the companies own the sheriff and use him to put the veil of legality over their criminal doings in importing such feudal retainers. In Herrin the sheriff seems to have been owned politically by the miners and to have refused to do his duty. He would have done his duty by them in the highest degree by preventing the massacre and by disarming every man, imported or other, who had a firearm. A model proclamation for all law officers was issued by Chief of Police O'Neill of Bayonne, N. J., in a recent labor war there. He said: "Mindful of the bloodshed and property damage brought about by the last strike in the Hook section of Bayonne, and convinced that the greater part of same could have been averted had all the persons concerned acted as intelligent persons instead of savages, I now take the opportunity to serve notice on the officials of the Tidewater Oil Co. that any attempt to bring armed strikebreakers into Bayonne by water or land from New York or any other source will result in the summary arrest of such individuals and a strict accountability from those responsible therefor."

The Coronado Case

Readers of labor news have heard much recently of the Coronado decision by Chief Justice Taft. It is likened to the famous Taft-Vale case in England and hailed as an instrument for the utter ruin of unionism unless remedial legislation is enacted by congress. It establishes the suability of an unincorporated labor organization, though in this case it finds the unions not culpable for the damage done. The British parliament passed remedial legislation but it took five years to get it done. Perhaps it will take longer here, because labor has not direct representation in legislative halls in the United States as it has in England. But if the decision carries with it the possibility of harassing labor organizations out of existence or making it impossible to conduct strikes it will be remedied for the simple reason that both are inalienable rights in fundamental law to say nothing of fundamental Americanism or democracy.

Labor is very apprehensive over the consequences of a decision which holds in principle that an unincorporated union is suable. The decision in this particular instance absolved the international union from responsibility because it did not authorize the strike, and with an expression of regret the chief justice found it impossible to assess damages against the district organization which did authorize the strike because he could rule only under the Sherman law which is limited to interstate commerce, and there was no evidence that the strike had interfered with interstate commerce. The thing that gives apprehension is the ruling that a union can be held corporately guilty of the acts of its individual members in a strike it has authorized. Will it be found possible to do the amazing thing of holding any association responsible for any and every act of any member without having to establish the direct guilt of the organization as such? It scarcely seems possible, and if that is what the ruling means there are more dangers in its application than in the evils which it aims to cure. If this interpretation stands, remediable legislation will be promptly forth-coming for the ruling will unquestionably prove to be an instrument of injustice.

The immediate effects of the ruling are likely to be a series of harassing lawsuits, adverse decisions by judges hostile to labor, such tying up of funds as resulted from the decisions of the lower courts in this case, (some $800,000 was tied up for several years), and at least a clearing of the issues either by a specific act (such as the Clayton act, which declared labor not a commodity), exempting labor unions from suability or by some legislation making the unions accountable under the law for violation of contract and for any damages flowing from direct orders issued by the executives. Labor should be willing to accept such legislation. It is just and right and will be to labor's advantage in the long run. But to hold a union equally responsible with a corporation and under the same law as a corporation is manifestly unjust for it puts the savings and dues of a nonprofit bearing association on the same basis as the capital and profits of a profit making corporation.

How Shall We Put An End To Strikes?

Indeed, labor itself will doubtless take the initial step in that direction by withdrawing from local hands the power to call a strike and putting it into the hands of a committee more detached from local irritations. This will diminish the number of small battles and bring a judicial mind to bear upon each situation. Public opinion will do something also. It will increasingly insist that a better way than the strike be found. There is a marked tendency just now to demand some such compulsory arbitration court as that operating in Kansas. More important is the influence of that enlarging group of enlightened employers who are advocating and actually setting up conference relations with their men. There is no court equal to that of conference between the parties concerned when such conference is actuated with a genuine desire on the part of both sides to cooperate by getting each other's point of view.

Beneath all expedients there must be the unqualified presupposition of giving justice to labor. All strikes are presumably called to gain rights which have been denied. Because of that presumption and because it has been so universally confirmed in industrial history the right to strike is held inalienable. Of course not all strikes are justifiable. The most justifiable of weapons will be abused in the most unjustifiable manner. But from the twelve and fourteen hour day to that of nine and eight hours labor has been compelled to fight for every hour's gain. The same has been true of wages in large measure, and of working conditions in even larger measure. It is yet true of the arbitrary boss system, the method of hire and fire at will and of the primary right to have an organization. It is of little use to talk of ending strikes until certain fundamental rights are recognized. Just as rebellion is a right that holds against all governments because some governments are unjust, so the right to strike holds against all industrial arrangements so long as some employers conduct their business on the principle of autocracy.

Violence, however, is never justified in these enlightened days. The right to strike does not mean the right to use violence. Such criminal disasters as that of the Herrin massacre do more to prejudice labor's just cause than a score of reactionary employers' associations with their tons of printed propaganda. These associations usually accomplish little more than to line up the employer crowd with a temper that reacts to plague them. But a murderous act like that of Ludlow or Herrin inflames millions into unreasoning prejudice.

Violence is sensational and is under the ban of civilization. It brings its own answer. But such conscienceless action as that ascribed to the operator at Herrin must come under the same ban of ignominy before full justice is done. The same sort of thing was done at Coronado and Justice Taft lays the lash of condemnation upon it. The manager violated his contract, broke his word, brought in nonunion men in direct violation of both, manipulated legal matters in an immoral manner, irritated his former workingmen by erecting fences, stringing cables, posting gunmen and in general so conducting himself as to influence the community, defy the welfare of his neighbors and incite just such riotous action as he reaped.

We do not know the truth until we know the whole truth, and the whole truth is rarely revealed in labor troubles where there are overt acts. Overt acts of violence make good headlines and the "strategy of cunning" hides easily behind a manipulation of legality. Remove all just cause of strikes and there will be fewer of them. Make the human cause paramount to that of property and there will be an easy road to peace in industry.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

A New Den of Lions *

I SUPPOSE the average person hears or reads this story and thinks it very interesting, but I am wondering how many feel any modern setting for a Daniel of today? Here was a young man who had come up to a great city. He brought his religion with him and he did not keep it in his trunk. He kept faith alive, by flinging his windows open and praying with his face toward the holy shrine of his fathers. Tempted by the rich foods and soft indulgences of the palace, he and his intimate friends had the rare courage to exercise control. In Babylon, he did not do as the Babylonians. Such inner worth brought him to power and made him the envy of the native authorities. At last, driven to desperation by the white life, the masterly self-determination, the strong mind and attractive personality of Daniel, they plot for his undoing. They go back along the path of his life and look for some mistake, some fault. When Mr. Folk was running for Governor of Missouri, we are told that his opponents went back along the trail of his career, back to college, back to boyhood, but never a thing could they find to blast his triumphal march. Not long ago ago I heard a man who aspired to high political office. He had made a pile of money, now he wanted preferment politically. He secured the endorsement of the party managers. He spent money like water. Everyone predicted his election. Then something happened. Somebody unearthed a scandal. He denied it, but he denied it weakly. All the fight was gone out of him; all his ambition faded. He withdrew from the race. His dream was ended. Blessed is the man who hath no skeleton in his closet. How to get Daniel, that was the question. His religion was unpopular; he prayed to a foreign deity. This was the trap. A decree was signed by the king forbidding prayer to be made save to himself. (Remember that even the Roman emperors regarded themselves as gods.) What to do? Would the man neglect his God now? Would he pray in secret? Would he be like Tom Brown and say his prayers in bed, which would do just as well? No, he opened his windows as before and, three times a day, with a clear voice, prayed to Jehovah his God. Magnificent Daniel, inspiration for distraught Jews under a Grecian tyrant, spur to our lagging faith today. No compromiser, was this Jewish prince. Lions were cowards compared to him.. They threw him into the den of lions. But he wavered not. God took care of him.

We want to see Daniel today. It is all very well to know that there was a brave young man some hundreds of years ago, but what of today? And are there lions today? Yes, there are the lions of the old sins. We may have overcome certain habits for years, but the lions still growl, and only a will like Daniel's and the power that comes through the Daniel-like prayer can subdue the beasts. Again there are lions of envious people. They snarl at us. They seek to destroy us. They watch to devour us. No man ever came to a place of leadership and prominence but envious men sought to belittle him, to impugn his motives, to question his sincerity, to circulate lies about him, to endeavor to create enemies for him. It is part of the price of success, of mastery. Washington had his opponents, Lincoln suffered from envious men. Ask many a preacher what he thinks of any other preacher and he will probably answer: "Oh, he is a very bright fellow, a good talker, but"—and that "but" is murderous. That "but" is intended to stab and to kill.. "O, yes, brother Blank is a brilliant preacher, but he does not believe in the deity of Christ," or, "Yes, I know him very well, he is a most engaging personality, but he is always trying to get into the lime-light." Those "buts" are as deadly as revolvers; they are used to kill reputations. Daniel had his envious associates; they used an underhanded scheme to get rid of him, but God delivered him. Take courage. There are the lions of new temptations. I believe that we have the best young people today who ever lived since the world began. They may know more and they surely conquer more. They are surrounded by most attractive and subtle temptations, the freedom of today gives endless opportunity, but in spite of all, they have high ideals and they struggle to live up to them. It does no good to underestimate the enemy and we may as well admit that these lions of new temptations are all about us, seeking whom they may devour. Most often these lions appear in the form of evil associates who are fascinating. Daniel had the secret of the Lord: his windows were open toward Jerusalem. Earnest prayer, reinforcing your healthy will, can hold the lions at bay.

JOHN R. EWERS.

British Table Talk

London, June 20, 1922.

M. POINCARE is with us; we are permitted to see photographs of him and to learn of the luncheons given in his honor; we have read of his gracious words at the tomb of the unknown warriors but we are still anxious to know whether the spokesmen of France and of England have reached any working agreement. Feeling here is divided, but for the most part it goes with the prime minister in his manifest desire to lead Europe back from war to peace and to establish an order of things in which commerce may once more have freedom to move. I have never met anyone with anything but admiration and gratitude for France; we understand her desire for safety first; but sometimes her tactics seem to English folk bad business; and the pursuit of her policy looks as though it would leave Europe still an armed camp. And as we need to be reminded in our old world conceit, Europe is only a part of the world! . . . Ex-President Taft has had a warm welcome here; he is going the round of luncheons and dinners and receptions, and the spirit of his speeches has been all to the good; he has already a warm place in the hearts of all who knew him before and he will make new friends. . . . Tomorrow the prince returns and London will have a joy day; the prince is without doubt a great favorite; when the planning of his journey is recalled, though we said little of it at the time, we knew that it was a plucky thing to do; and the prince did the brave thing as brave things should be done, without parade and with a blithe cheerfulness and this is precisely the bearing which wins the heart of our people. They will show their welcome to the returning prince in no half hearted way. And then, let us hope the country will give him a holiday.

Birmingham or London?

It will be known by the time this letter is read, whether or not the Rev. Sidney M. Berry is to succeed Dr. Jowett at Westminster Chapel. He has received the invitation, and if he should leave Birmingham for London, he will be received with trust and affection by his new church, and by all of us within the London radius. Mr. Berry has won his way to leadership by the possession and use of gifts which are solid and enduring; and no one has any doubt of his fitness for any place there is in Congregationalism. He has succeeded Dr. Jowett before, and as he is reported to have said in jest, he does not want the experience again: once is enough! To step into the pulpit of Westminster will be a great test of a preacher's courage and faith, but a man who has filled worthily a pulpit revered for the names of John Angell James, Robert William Dale, and Jowett, need not shrink; and in any event a man like Sidney Berry will think not of personal reputation but of the service of the kingdom. Americans will not have forgotten that his father was invited to succeed Henry Ward Beecher; and here is another case out of many which give the lie to the idea that the sons of great men are always dwarfed by their fathers. It is assumed that Dr. Jowett will still be able to preach in the morning for a certain number of Sundays. The effect of an occasional ministry on this preacher will be watched with interest and hope; it will be a great thing if Dr. Jowett can still exercise his gracious ministry among us, even as a half-timer.

The Editor of The Pilot

Some of us have an affectionate memory for a weekly journal, The Pilot, published in the early years of the century. It was edited by Mr. D. C. Lathbury, whose death was reported last week. He was a great journalist in everything save the power of making a journal pay. The Pilot was a wonderful paper; it had an influence far beyond the measure of its circulation; its literary style was admirable; its wisdom upon things political and ecclesiastical fresh and bold; and yet it did not pay, and after being subsidised for a time it passed away; and Lathbury was left in his later years without an editorial chair. He edited a book dealing with the religious life of Gladstone; he contributed many reviews and articles, but the peculiar gift which he had it in him to exercise was denied him after The Pilot ceased. The plain fact must be faced; the independent man, who will not fit into a party in church or state, has an uncomfortable time. Lathbury hated the Boer war and therefore lost his editorship of one paper; he was a strong high churchman, yet he favored disestablishment, and was a liberal of the Gladstonian order throughout; he did not fit easily into our scheme of things. Yet what a tragedy it is when one of the few great publicists has no editorial chair! At the present moment there are two great publicists in the same case. It is a fine thing to write occasional articles; but I want to know that I can find the counsel of Mr. Spender or Mr. A. G. Gardiner in some definite place; I don't want to chase them from one paper to another.

Opium and Education

It was to China more than to any other field the conference of missionary societies turned last week. The opium question was raised by Mr. Basil Mathews, who reported upon the action taken by the league of nations. The opium commission, appointed by that body has appealed to the missionary societies for their help.

"Here" he said, "is the biggest international organization in the world, the league of nations, turning to us for help in fighting the great moral campaign to free the world from the octopus of the world drug traffic, a campaign which can never be carried through victoriously apart from the driving force of a spiritual dynamic." The British conference approved of the resolution to urge the International Missionary Council to accept the invitation.

Professor Roxby of Liverpool, who had just returned from six months in China in association with an education commission at which the Chinese, the British and the Americans were represented, reported in an address of an hour and a quarter's length (which held his audience of experts in a close grip of attention throughout) the fundamental principles and the definite proposals of the commission.

The report thoroughly investigated the whole educational system in China, both governmental and missionary. The missionary contribution, he said, if it was to render to China the service which no other institution could render, must be "more efficient, more Chinese, and more Christian."

Professor Roxby said that nowadays no single denomination could efficiently run an educational center of university rank and that there must be cooperation of which the West China University of Chengtu supported by two British, two American, and one Canadian society was the ideal of the future. He said that the commissioners recommended that instead of the present sixteen colleges aspiring to university rank there should be five or six that were really efficient regional centers.

"It is," he concluded, "our sober judgment that there has developed in the last few years and is still in the process of development, a new opportunity for the Christian schools of China, an opportunity he reiterated of being more efficient, more Christian, more Chinese, to render China a service that no other institution can render."

Recent Books

Professor Hogg, of Madras, has published his Cunningham lectures on "Redemption From the World." His earlier work, "Christ's Message of the Kingdom," did much to shape the thought of those who read it, especially of those who read it in youth. Whether we agreed with it or not, it left the problem of the "Kingdom of God" and as that is set forth in the Gospel, changed in its character. Now the author returns to the same theme, giving himself more room than his earlier volume offered to expand his thought. It is particularly with the miracles that he deals; in the breadth of his thought, redemption, in the daring faith that he teaches in the powers of the kingdom available, readers will find much to quicken their thoughts and rekindle their hopes. I see that more than 22,000 copies of his early book have been sold. I wonder whether this fact raises sad memories in one publishing firm which declined it; but the best have their bad shots. . . .

Mr. H. G. Wells has once more done some thinking and furious thinking too in "The Secret Places of the Heart." There are clear traces that he is following with all his old eagerness and his intellectual sincerity the latest science of the mind. Mr. Wells stands by himself in the utter candour of his mind; but the last book does not carry him, I think very far beyond his last mark. I have heard young men read papers on Wells at various stages in his literary career; they must need fairly long supplements if they read those papers now; and the last chapter is not written yet. Mr. Wells shows incidentally clear evidence that he has been studying closely the American scene.

The Death of
Sir Henry Wilson

When death comes to one of our great countrymen, we cease to talk of the peculiar political views for which he stood, and we think only of his loyalty to duty and to the light which was in him. When the cruel assassins killed Sir Henry Wilson, we ceased to think of him as the soldier or the politician, pledged to policies which many of us hated; we thought only of the man who had given his best to his country, and with honesty of purpose and clearness of judgment had spent and been spent in its service. If the assassins thought to weaken the policy for which this strong man stood, they were as dull and foolish as they were wicked. Every cause for which he fought will have an increase now; and Ireland may find below the present deep, a still lower deep. Is it always to be the same story in Ireland? There must be many who cry out, "How long!" At the very moment when it seemed as if the advocates of the Treaty were gaining ground, this thing happens. In the 80's the death of Sir Lord Frederick Cavendish; in the 90's the folly of Parnell; in the war the stupidity of almost all who handled Irish concerns; and now in this year the crime of June 22nd! If we are wise we shall not yield to the counsels of panic; but we may not be wise, and then, good-bye to the hope of an Ireland at peace! And all that this means, it needs no voice from this side to expound.

Wise Words from "Woodbine Willie"
The Rev. G. W. Studdert Kennedy

"If a man goes wrong today everybody in England knows, every boy and every girl reads it. It is in all the papers and in pictures. We go into the streets and have it flung at our heads every moment. We imagine it does not do us harm, but we know very little of ourselves. The everlasting suggestion of broken marriages and broken homes is bound to do us harm. We may resist it with our will, but it sinks in all the time. If we could clear it all away, if we could destroy that insidious and damnable suggestion of the impossibility of the moral life that is made to us continuously, we would discover that our area of possibility is infinitely larger. There will be a conflict, but it will be a healthy conflict, and we shall be victorious if we turn our minds and attention upon those things that are pure and good and holy and true. We can erect for ourselves a battery of self defence against those continual attacks from without. We have to learn to bring the outcasts and the down trodden into such a powerful atmosphere of real love and real glory that it will go down to the depths of their soul, and wipe out by the blood of Jesus the record that is against it. I believe it can be done, but we have to set ourselves against this eternal counter suggestion of the impossibility of a moral life. That is what Christ came to fight."

The Book of Christian Discipline

From the Friends' bookshop there is issued a beautiful book, "Christian Life, Faith, and Thought," being the first part of the book of Christian discipline. It is in reality a collection of testimonials given by Friends from the beginning. Happy is the society which has so noble and so moving a body of witnesses to the light. Among them are John Woolman and John G. Whittier. It is interesting to note how the society which has never encouraged psalmody or hymn-singing finds some of the clearest expressions of its inmost faith in the poetry of Whittier. There are still some truths which go best to music. This is indeed a book to be loved by all who are followers after divine charity. May I add the prayer with which the book closes? It is from John Wilhelm Rowntree. "Thou, O Christ, convince us by thy spirit, thrill us with thy divine passion; drown our selfishness in thy invading love; lay on us the burden of the world's suffering; drive us forth with the apostolic fervor of the early church! So only can our message be delivered. 'Speak to the children of Israel that they go forward.' "

A Quaker on Compromise

In his Swarthmore lecture upon "Religion and Public Life" Mr. Carl Heath dealt with compromise in a suggestive manner:

"What is the content of this word compromise that gives it an ill sound in religious or in moral conduct? The streams of life produce an endless series of complicated knots in conduct in which at most we see truth relative to mixed conditions. It is not political compromise that is the enemy of religion but the method by which compromise is reached; the method that is falsely called democratic, of reaching an agreed end by immoral surrender of principle and by voting down and coercing one another. A nobler way of transcending differences has been achieved in the Quaker method of reaching a decision, without vote or counting of heads, by a spirit of cooperative search for the best. This Christian method needs to be applied to all the problems of corporate life."

This will sound to many readers a most impossible suggestion. But, speaking as one who has seen it work, I can testify to the value of the Quaker method. No vote is ever taken at the annual meeting of the Friends and in other assemblies of which I have personal experience. There is a patient, sincere, charitable discussion; there is a readiness to wait for the guidance of the spirit; there is the open mind; and in the midst there is the spirit of love and truth. It works.

A Testimony

"God has no human body now upon the earth but our own, yet he calls the bodies of men his own.

> "Christ's spirit taketh breath again
> Within the lives of holy men.
> Each changing age beholds afresh
> Its word of God in human flesh."

"Do we indeed come to his aid as we see him starving or unemployed? Are we not driven with shame to confess that again and again we pass him by? Should we not strive to find God as Jesus found him in every man, whether we call him British, Russian, Chinese, German, Frenchman, Orangeman or Sinn Feiner, communist, or capitalist; above all to find God in those with whom we live and work?

"If men fail to do God's will, how can his will on earth be done? 'I would fain,' said one of old, 'be to the Eternal Goodness what his own hand is to a man.' Are we prepared to be the hands and feet of God? If so, we must hold nothing back, but, whether in our homes, in industry or in international relations, we must follow in whatever paths he may lead us." So reads an Epistle of the London Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends, 1922.

CORRESPONDENCE

Presbyterian Social Literature

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In your issue of June 8th in the editorial on "Presbyterian Consolidation and Disciples Unification" appears the following sentence:

"It is a sorry fact that since the official voices of Rev. Charles Stelzle and Joseph Ernest McAfee have been silenced, the Presbyterians now have more to say in their official literature about the humane treatment of horses and cats and dogs than about the workers in great cities."

This would indeed be a sorry fact if it were a fact at all, but it is not a fact. The Presbyterians have had an increasing amount of literature on the subject of workers in great cities. Among the recent publications of this board alone and not counting the various articles in our denominational papers have been the following, many of which have had a wide circulation: "The Christian Spirit in Industrial Relations," by John McDowell; "Who Is Our Neighbor," by William P. Shriver; "The New Home Mission of the Church," by W. P. Shriver; "Cleveland Goes on an Adventure," by Francis R. Bellamy; "The Church in Greater San Francisco," by Robert St. Donaldson; "The Neighborhood House," by W. Clyde Smith, and many others.

Here's Our Hand!

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: It is evidently wise not only to ask as to "The future of the Congregationalists" but, to extend the question to all the various denominations why not scrap them all, throw them into the melting pot, run out what gospel ore there is, and from henceforth have "one faith, one Lord, one baptism." Then let science and religion go hand in hand—to show a God of wisdom, love and power. Then may we all be ready to take part in "the coming symphony" so well expressed by Arthur B. Patten on page 783. We stand at "the parting of the way." Which course shall we take?

To Our Subscribers

It requires two weeks to make a change of address. It is necessary that our wrappers be addressed a full week ahead, and time is required to handle accurately the large volume of requests for change that come to us at this season of the year. You therefore run a risk of missing a copy both at the beginning and at the end of your vacation. Unless your vacation period is more than six weeks, we advise that you leave a few one-cent stamps with your postmaster or postman, and ask to have your Christian Century forwarded to you.

We desire that our readers shall not miss a single issue, and while we will gladly make any change of address requested, we are sure the risk of irregularity is greatly reduced by the plan we are here suggesting.

No publisher has yet found a satisfactory system of carrying with precision requests for a second change of address in connection with a present change. In your own interest, therefore, please do not request more than one change at a time.

Ambassadors of God

By S. PARKES CADMAN

In this book, a striking volume, Dr. Cadman, well-known Brooklyn preacher, maintains that the outstanding truths for preachers to proclaim are few, simple and experimental. He bids them find these truths in the Scriptures and shows how their greater peers in the Christian church through all the centuries have taken this Scripture material, and shaped it, each to the needs of his own generation.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

To Distinguish Two Presbyterian Bodies

In the census reports we find Presbyterians in the U. S. A. and also Presbyterians in the U. S. That is a little perplexing to the man who may imagine that the U. S. A. and the U. S. are the same place. U. S. A. Presbyterians have often been called northern Presbyterians, but that was always misleading for there has never been a time when there were not Presbyterians in the southland who did not maintain their allegiance to the northern church. When the Cumberland Presbyterians united with the U. S. A. church, hundreds of southern churches united with the U. S. A. organization. Church extension activities in the south in communities where there are no U. S. congregations have also added many U. S. A. congregations to the list. The Continent, the leading Presbyterian journal published in the north, announces an editorial policy of speaking henceforth of the National Presbyterian church and the Southern Presbyterian church. Whether this nomenclature will ever become official is uncertain, but it would certainly simplify things for those not Presbyterians who would like to speak intelligently of their religious neighbors.

Southern Methodists Change Missionary Editor

The Missionary Voice is the organ of the missionary interests of the Methodist Episcopal church, South. For the past eight years this journal has been edited by Rev. Robert B. Eleazar. By a recent action of the Board of Missions at Hot Springs, Dr. A. J. Weeks has been elected to succeed him. He was formerly one of the leading preachers of Texas, and more recently editor of the Texas Christian Advocate. Under the editorship of Mr. Eleazar the Methodists of the southland have grown accustomed to the message of a Christianized industry and of international peace.

Delinquent Boys Volunteer for Christian Baptism

The state school for boys at St. Charles, Ill., contains many of the unfortunate lads of Chicago who for many reasons have been taken from the custody of their parents. In this school a significant Christian work has been carried on for years by Miss Helma Sutherland under the general auspices of the Chicago Church Federation. Miss Sutherland has donated her services. On Children's Day this year a number of Chicago ministers were present including Rev. Thomas K. Gale and Rev. J. T. Brabner Smith. When the invitation was given to the boys of the school to come forward and receive Christian baptism, 125 boys responded. The response was quite beyond the expectation of the Christian workers.

How Christian Edifices Are Erected

The erection of houses of worship becomes more and more an enterprise in which denominational machinery is involved. The Roman Catholics often build a church entire. Most of the protestant denominations give loans and grants. The report of twenty-two denominations for 70 years shows 62,841 buildings erected. The amount of aid given by different communions varies widely. The Baptist church, North, the Presbyterian church, South, the Reformed Church in America and the Christian Reformed church keep their loans down below one thousand dollars. The average loan of the United Brethren is $1,348; of the United Evangelical church, $1,500; of the Evangelical synod, $2,000; of the Protestant Episcopal church, $2,148; of the Congregational Church Building Society, $2,400; of the Disciples, $7,000; of the Evangelicals, $2,000; of the United Lutheran church, $5,000 to $10,000; of the Lutherans of Missouri, Ohio and other states, and also of the Methodist church, South, $5,000; of the Presbyterian church, North, $8,000; of the Reformed Church in America, $10,000, and the Unitarians, $4,000.

Presbyterians Will Found Boys' School

The Presbyterian church has at Stony Brook, Long Island, a property valued at $300,000 which is held free of debt, and which by charter of the state of New York may never be mortgaged. On this property a school for boys will be opened this coming autumn in which the newer ideals of Christian education will be wrought out. The enrolment the first year will be forty boys, which will be increased as time goes on. A thousand inquiries have been made by Presbyterian parents concerning the new school. Among these are nine foreign missionaries in various parts of the world who wish to place their children under Christian influences.

Famous English Preacher Goes Back Home

Rev. Frederick W. Norwood of the City Temple, London, has been preaching at Broadway Tabernacle in London in exchange with Dr. Jefferson. His ministry there has drawn great throngs of people. Oberlin College recently conferred upon him the degree of doctor of divinity. Dr. Norwood has been in this country as the voice of international peace but his preaching has sounded the deep notes of religion. In a recent address he said: "These three things—birth, marriage and death—are deeper than the church, are of infinitely greater influence than the church; keep men close to the divine, keep men human and sober, more than any ecclesiastical system can hope to do. The kind of church the world wants and in a sense is waiting and searching for is the church that grows out of life. We are weary of the interpretations of life which are compressed and sometimes distorted to fit the dogmas and institutions of the church."

Dr. Ainslie's Sabbatical Year in the Interest of Fellowship

During the past year Dr. Peter Ainslie's church in Baltimore released him from pastoral obligations to permit him to spend a sort of sabbatical period in the wider ministry of unity and internationalism. From November to June he has been on a tour that extended from the middle Atlantic states and New England to California and return, speaking almost constantly in universities, various denominational colleges, high schools, churches and clubs in the interest of international friendship and Christian unity. There has never been a time in the history of the world when there was such an opportunity for evangelism in these causes, nor has there been a greater obligation upon the church to espouse such evangelism. Sectarianism is strong, but there is rising a tide of thought not only in the educational institutions but in churches and other circles that promises to better international relations and better interdenominational relations. He has gathered thousands of names of persons where he has spoken, to whom literature has been sent bearing on these problems. He was impressed with the open mind and the ready response in the attempt to get away from where we are to where we ought to be. Invitations accumulated beyond the possibility of acceptance. He writes that he is very happy to have had such a year of evangelism. He leaves in a few weeks for the meeting of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches at Copenhagen, Denmark, and a meeting of the executive committee of the Universal Conference of the Church of Christ on Life and Work at Stockholm, Sweden.

Fundamentalists Still Threatening

At the close of the Northern Baptist Convention in which the Fundamentalist leaders met with defeat, they gathered at Moody Institute in Chicago to consider the strategy. Dr. Frank M. Goodchild of New York said: "We have effected a compact organization to carry on our work of uprooting rationalism from our schools, and we purpose to continue that work until it is accomplished." Dr. Curtis Lee Laws made a happy bon mot for the group when he declared, "We lost a battle, but we have not lost the war." This militaristic simile was received with enthusiasm. Dr. Laws presents the issue as the Fundamentalists see it in these words: "Fundamentalism is a protest against that rationalistic interpretation of Christianity which seeks to discredit supernaturalism. This rationalism, when full grown, scorns the miracles of the Old Testament, sets aside the virgin birth of our Lord as a thing unbelievable, laughs at the credulity of those who accept many of the New Testament miracles, reduces the resurrection of our Lord to the fact that death did not end his existence, and sweeps away the promises of his second coming as the idle dream of men under the influence of Jewish apocalypticism." Dr. J. C. Massee of Boston made a threat against the treasury of the Baptist enterprises. He said: "The organization forces in control of the machinery of the denomination committed the crime of aligning themselves with the rationalists. That fact alone will cost the denomination hundreds of thousands of dollars. They did this under the mistaken notion that the fundamentalists' protest against the present school situation and some of the tendencies in the Board of Promotion was an attack on the denomination."

This Church Takes Stewardship Seriously

The stewardship campaign in the churches is getting hold of people at last. From different parts of the country come some very remarkable stories of Christian giving. The Presbyterian church at Norfolk, Neb., has a membership of 125. The wealth of the membership is estimated as $200,000. With these resources they gave recently $30,000 to a building fund. One woman with $9,000 gave $4,000. A traveling man pledged twenty per cent of his income. A young girl with an income of $1,200 gave $200, while another with an income of $1,000 gave $400.

International Assemblage of Students

Under the auspices of the World's Student Christian Federation for European Student Relief there was held in Czecho-Slovakia in April a great conference at Turnov. Eighty-three men and women from thirty nationalities came into the town with their student caps. They were mixed up indiscriminately and most of them found themselves quartered with former enemies of the world war. Students had come from most of the nations that are commonly considered as the focus of international misunderstanding. The group recommended that all students aided should work for their money. The vote was practically unanimous for continuing the aid of Russian students as formerly, and the relief of students in other countries as there might be need. The principle of the organization was reaffirmed to provide relief "without reference to religion, race, nationality, language or political party of the recipient."

Bryan Warns of Dangers of Darwinism

At the concluding session of the International Sunday School Convention at Kansas City, William Jennings Bryan delivered his well-known lecture on Darwinism. He warned the Christian people present against the dangers of the Darwinian hypothesis. He said: "Darwin has done more than any other person in modern times to undermine faith and to encourage materialism. His hypothesis takes man's eyes away from the throne of God and gives him a family tree that connects him with the jungle. He launched a guess upon the world with nothing to support it and it has lived for sixty years without nourishment—not one single species having been found which can be traced to another. And yet, evolutionists insist that all of the more than a million species came by gradual change from one or a few invisible germs of life. The hypothesis is not only unproven and supported by explanations that are ludicrous, but its tendency is to destroy belief in God, belief in the Bible as the inspired Word of God, and belief in Christ as Son of God and Saviour of the world. Darwin himself was led to abandon every cardinal principle of the Christian faith. He began life a believer in God, in the Bible, in Christ, and in heaven. Before he died he discarded all. He declared himself an agnostic and said that he believed there had never been any revelation; he left each one to determine for himself 'on vague and uncertain testimony' whether there is a future life. Darwin's god was nowhere—he could not find him; Darwin's Bible was nothing—it was uninspired; Darwin's Christ was nobody—a mere man with a brute ancestry."

Chinese Mission Considers a Radical Change

The thirty-fourth annual convention of the Central China Mission of the Disciples of Christ met in the Drum Tower church at Nanking May 16-20. The mission is seriously considering a change in constitution which would give the native Chinese church equal authority with the mission in all matters, thus developing local leadership. This policy is in line with recent recommendations of the National Christian Conference of China. The Central China mission elected for president Rev. Guy W. Sarvis; for vice-president, Miss Minnie Vautrin; for secretary, Rev. Ben Holroyd.

Student Meeting of Large Significance

The recent ten day conference of college and university students at Lake Geneva was attended this year by 650 students from 109 institutions. Many dramatic decisions were reported in connection with the meetings. Two Chinese and one Japanese students sought baptism into the Christian church. The students were divided into 38 groups for their Bible study each day. Prominent among the activities at this great meeting is the influencing of young men to make decisions for Christian work. Many missionaries and ministers are recruited here. It may well be doubted whether the whole recruiting machinery of all the denominations produces results which are to be compared numerically with the results of the annual Lake Geneva Conference. Some of the greatest Christian leaders speak at this conference.

Methodists Are Sounding the Note of Warning

Since the last meeting of the Boards of Benevolence of the Methodist Episcopal church it has been apparent that something out of the ordinary would have to be done to bring Methodism up to its pledged obligation in connection with the Centenary. In a document called "Methodism's Future at Stake,"

Presbyterians Take Great Strides

PRESBYTERIANS seem to have seven league boots on these days. The reports recently issued from the office of the New Era Movement through Rev. Guy L. Morrill are very heartening, though there is strong appeal for more men in the ministry. Mr. Morrill says: "Each week last year nearly 2,000 persons united with the Presbyterian church on confession of faith, or 285 each day of the year. It is not improbable that the membership of the church will mount up to 1,825,000 by the time of the next General Assembly. The spirit of evangelism spreading through the church is also evidenced by the number of presbyteries carrying out the plan of the assembly's committee on evangelism. Next year seventeen presbyteries with 757 churches will use 24 full-time evangelists and 300 visiting ministers in soul-winning efforts. The membership of the churches on the foreign mission field exhibits the same cheering increases. In 1837 the communicants on the foreign field numbered 10, in 1907 there were 70,447, in 1917 there were 161,470, and in 1922 the native church members number 196,175. The total gifts to all causes in this year of financial stress amounted to more than $47,000,000. Of this amount over $32,000,000 was for congregational expenses which is $12,000,000 more than we were giving for this purpose three years ago. In the last three years the churches have raised and used for their own work $25,000,000 more than in the three preceding years. Much of this increase without doubt has gone into the salaries of ministers. Attention must still be given to this most important matter, until the Presbyterian ministry is put upon not only a living basis but an efficient basis of living. In contradiction of the assertion that the Presbyterian church does not need more ministers let these facts be considered. The foreign board was asking for 69 ordained men up to March 31, 1922, and at present has in sight only 16. The Presbyterian New Era mailing lists indicate that there are 2,018 vacant churches. In the Home Mission field 873 ministers serve 1540 churches. Nearly 40 per cent of our home mission pastors serve two or more churches, 17 per cent serve three fields and nearly 10 per cent served four fields or more last year." Most denominations would be a little boastful over receiving 120 ministers from other communions in a single year. The Presbyterians do not feel that way about it, but are a little worried. Of five hundred men of this sort received in recent years, it is shown that one-third of them had neither college nor seminary training. As the Presbyterian church has long stood for high standards of ministerial training, these figures are looked upon with alarm.

the following solemn words are spoken: "Never before in the history of the Methodist Episcopal church has its leadership been called upon to face a situation so grave or an opportunity so great as that presented to the Council of the Church Boards of Benevolence at its recent meeting in Chicago. From June 1, 1921, to June 1, 1922, there was a shrinkage in the payments of centenary subscriptions of approximately $2,000,000 over an already tragically declining income of the previous year. This serious diminishing of resources constitutes a direct blow at the heart of the missionary enterprises of Methodism. Already the crippling effects of loss in income are beginning to appear in the care of returned foreign missionaries who cannot be sent back to their fields for lack of funds."

Chicago Church Federation Issues Booklet on Publicity

The Chicago Church Federation will at an early date issue a booklet on "Cooperative Church Advertising." It is being compiled by an eminent lay expert in church publicity. This is one of the steps being taken in advance of the big publicity meeting in October to arouse interest. The pamphlet will be given considerable circulation in order to arouse church people to the duty of bringing religion to the attention of large numbers of people who would not otherwise be interested.

Forty Mission Study Groups in One Church

Not in all the bounds of Presbyterianism in this country can be found a church like Westport Avenue Presbyterian church of Kansas City for mission study. Forty groups are meeting for this purpose and the missionary offerings of the church last year were very close to $15,000. The pastor, Rev. George P. Baity, recently celebrated the 29th year of his pastorate in this church. He began with 46 members and there are now 1,500.

Dr. Taylor and the Self-Made Man

Someone has cynically said that you can tell the self-made man for he is always so awfully proud of his job. Dr. F. E. Taylor, the newly elected president of the Northern Baptist Convention denies that there is any such thing as a self-made man. In a recent sermon he said: "No one can honestly boast of being a self-made man. When you find a man who has made good boasting of having made himself what he is, don't you believe it. If he would know the truth, he is simply a part of all other men who have served him." Dr. Taylor will take July and August as vacation months and during his absence some eminent Baptists will preach for him.

Missionary Bishops Bring Cheering Tidings

The missionary bishops of the Methodist Episcopal church in a recent report brought cheering news of the extension of Methodism beyond the seas. In the Philippines there are 65,000 Methodist church members and 70 missionaries. A local ministry of a thousand men has been set to work, besides 1,000 native workers who are not preachers. The student Methodist church in Manila no longer seats the audiences. In the home mission field some equally splendid results have been achieved, and report is made of Maharry college, a medical school for negroes at Nashville, Tenn., which has an endowment of a million dollars. It is the largest medical school for the training of negroes in the world.

Church Record Book Goes Back a Hundred Years

The record of the Providence Baptist church of Christ near Princeton, Ind., has been kept for a hundred years in one large volume. The proceedings have often been in the form of excommunications. A brother was in jeopardy in 1825 for acting as a judge at a shooting match. The story also includes the record of the defection of eight members to a General Baptist church which was said to be "in disorder." The number of early members that received censure for drinking too much liquor is also interesting to modern readers. The old record book was brought out and many things read from it on the hundredth anniversary of the church recently.

Methodist Bishops Meet in Indianapolis

The Methodist bishops held a meeting in Indianapolis recently at which the bishops were appointed to preside over the various Methodist conferences of the country. The meetings are not open to the public but announcements are made of the main items of business. J. Henry Smythe of New York sought admission to the meeting that he might appeal to the bishops to lend their influence toward the change of the amusement clause of the denomination. He was not allowed to tell his story. Three bishops will be assigned to the task of keeping the Methodists up to their obligations in connection with the centenary movement. Of the $100,000,000 about $45,000,000 has been paid in up to date. Arrangements have been made for the bishops to meet in Baltimore November 14 to attend the unveiling of a statue to Francis Asbury, known as the first Methodist bishop of America. President Harding will be asked to attend.

What Religious People Talk About in Tennessee

Religious people talk about a wide variety of things in various sections of the country. While some are still debating the higher criticism and evolution, others are talking about the social application of the gospel and the coming of world peace. Down in Tennessee a group of church folk are all excited over the solemn question—Shall organs be used in the churches? Thousands of the conservative wing of Disciples deny, and the "progressive" wing of this conservative communion has sent for Rev. W. H. Book of Columbus, Ind., to debate the question with those who pronounce the use of an organ in worship a sin. Debating this subject is one of the specialties of Mr. Book. In Chicago recently Wilbur Glenn Voliva told four thousand people that the world was flat, for the Bible says so. The audience cheered this announcement to the echo.

Baptist Editor Retires to Private Life

Dr. Arthur W. Cleaves, editor of the denominationally owned organ, known as the Baptist, has resigned after two and a half years of service. He will spend the summer in the Maine woods. Since the paper came into being there have been at least six committees responsible for the conduct of it. This has meant the continual reshaping of policy. Before coming to the leadership of this paper Dr. Cleaves was a prominent New England pastor.

Baptists Undertake to Raise Ministerial Standards

One of the significant actions of the recent Northern Baptist Convention which was lost sight of in the keener interest of theological debate was a comprehensive resolution designed to raise the standards of education in the Baptist ministry. The state conventions are asked to pass resolutions that no man shall be ordained to the ministry who has not had a two year course of study which includes English, English Bible, biblical theology, Baptist principles and history, homiletics, modern missions and religious education. Nothing is said in the resolution about previous training. This is regarded as a radical advance step by its proponents which indicates the state of ministerial education in the past. The Ministers and Missionaries Benefit board is asked to administer its funds in the light of this recommendation. The next convention will be held in Washington next year the first week in June. It had been understood that the 1923 convention would go to Philadelphia and the 1925 convention to Seattle, but the convention at its last session voted that conventions should be held biennially. Just how soon the biennial convention plan will go into operation is not yet apparent.

Southern Presbyterians Report a Good Year

General Assembly reports of the Southern Presbyterian church are encouraging. The membership of the denomination is now 411,854, a gain of 14,796. The gifts to benevolence during the year were $5,006,000. This denomination is small, but has very high standards. Its ministers must be men with the regular college training and in addition three years of seminary work.

Organized Paganism in New York State

In the state of New York is another state almost entirely independent of the American government, the reservation of the Iroquois Indians. The spirit of this group is so strong that one may say there is organized paganism, resisting not only the inroads of missionaries, but all the arts and devices of modern life. Roads are built through the reservation only on condition that the white

Masters of Fiction

America is breaking its sectional barriers. The people are beginning to look beyond their own street, their own city, their own country. That is a healthy sign. Provincialism has been the bane of our intellectual life.

The easiest way to peek into the hearts and minds of the millions of mortals beyond the seas is to read the masterpieces of fiction which have been written by such creative literary artists as De Maupassant, Balzac, Daudet, Gorki, Tolstoi, Wells, Hugo and others. It is not only easy—it is charming. Foreign fiction by its acknowledged masters is never dull, never mushy, never stupidly conventional.

Fiction is of universal appeal in interpreting life. Every person sees life as drama. The big, vital steps of life are based on feeling. Foreign fiction lingers in the human heart because it is true and because it has the power to make the reader feel as the men and women felt who left their impress upon their day. Foreign fiction contains the play of these forces. The masters of foreign fiction have enshrined themselves securely in the affections of readers who demand not a veneer but the truth about life.

We have gone to France, England, Italy, Russia and other lands for masterpieces of fiction. We have had these immortal works carefully and completely translated and now offer them in 30 volumes—the only library of foreign fiction that is obtainable in this country at this time. Of our many publishing ventures this Library of Foreign Fiction is the most comprehensive and valuable.

30 Books—2,400 Pages—Only $1.95 for All—Send No Money

This Library of Foreign Fiction will delight you. Never before was there a chance like this. Here is fiction that interprets life. It does not distort life. We selected the works which we considered the very best. And we produced these volumes to distribute at a price which will astonish the reading world—$1.95, plus postage, for all 30 volumes. Thirty books for the price of one ordinary book.

If these 30 books were issued in the ordinary way they might cost you as much as a hundred dollars. We have decided to issue them so you can get all of them for the price of one ordinary book. That sounds inviting, doesn't it? And we mean it, too. Here are 30 books, containing 2,400 pages of text, all neatly printed on good book paper, 3½ x 5 inches in size, bound securely in card cover paper.

You can take these 30 books with you when you go to and from work. You can read them in your spare moments. You can slip four or five of them into a pocket and they will not bulge. The price is only $1.95 for the entire library. That's less than a dime a volume. In fact, that is less than seven cents per volume. Here is the very best at the very least. Never were such great works offered at so low a price. All you have to do is to sign your name and address on the blank below. You don't have to send any money. Just mail us the blank described on this page—you will pay the postman $1.95 plus postage. And the books are yours. Positively no further payments.

Let the great masters of foreign fiction take you behind the curtain and show you life as it is, character as it lives. See drama that will thrill you, humor hat will charm you, pathos that will move you.

Well-Known Student Worker is Bereaved

Every college student of the middle-west knows A. J. Elliott, student secretary for the international committee of the Y. M. C. A. for the middle-west. He has for years been a fruitful worker among college students. The tidings of the recent death of Mrs. Elliott will elicit sympathy from a large circle. There is one daughter, about sixteen years of age. Father and daughter will spend some time in the west. Mrs. Elliott lived in Wilmette, a suburb of Chicago, and the interment took place at Kankakee, Ill.

Anti-Christian Movement Breaks Out in China

Fundamental religious changes are not accomplished in any country without times of reaction. In the university circles of China at the present time there is a movement of protest against Christianity and the organization of hostile groups. In a student manifesto coming from the Non-Christian Federation of National University in Peking is the following indictment: "Christianity is the public enemy of mankind, just as capitalism and imperialism are, since they have one thing in common, to exploit the weak countries. Realizing that China has long been an object of exploitation of the capitalistic and imperialistic countries of the world, Christianity is utilizing the opportunity to extend its influence. Christianity is the intelligence officer of the capitalists and the hireling of the imperialistic countries. Everything that may aid its spread Christianity is willing to utilize. If no effort is made to exterminate this evil in time, it is impossible to tell its dangers in the future. We who have long had a deep hatred of Christianity are unanimous in our opposition, and have just united to help similar organizations to exterminate this evil fiend until China gets rid of it."

Bishop Lawrence Will Head Money-Raising Campaign

The Episcopal Theological School at Cambridge is out for a million dollar endowment. Bishop Lawrence of Massachusetts has accepted the work of chairman of the committee that raises the fund. Though he is seventy-two years of age, he has opened a campaign that is characterized by great energy. No churchman in Massachusetts is so able a leader for this task as the bishop for he has been student, teacher and dean in the institution which he represents. After twenty-nine years as bishop of the diocese, he naturally knows better than anyone else where the large resources of his church are in New England. His ideal of ministerial education is stated in these words: "We do not

The Fundamentals of Christianity
By HENRY C. VEDDER
Professor of Church History, Crozer Theological Seminary.

The answer in detail that this book attempts to give to the question "What is Christianity?" is based upon three convictions: (1) that man's apprehension of the character of God has not stood still but has grown with his growth (2) that the highest forms of this progressive knowledge of God are found in the Old and New Testament literature and culminate in the words of Jesus as preserved in the Gospels (3) that the teaching of Jesus is, therefore, the standard by which all other teaching claiming to be Christian must be compared and, in case of conflict, rejected. It is the main object of this book to convince its readers that the parting of the ways has been reached with the Historical Christianity based on Paul as its authority which still has such wide vogue and that the future belongs to a Christianity that will determine its doctrines, program and methods on the authority of Jesus alone.

Clergymen Ask for Mutual Recognition of Ministries

The Lambeth Conference declaration has taken root in Canada. Five Episcopalians and five Presbyterians of that country recently conferred on some practical steps to be taken, and finally agreed to petition their respective ecclesiastical superiors for a mutual recognition of the ministries of the two denominations. By the terms of this proposal, an Episcopal clergyman would be authorized to minister in a Presbyterian church while a Presbyterian clergyman would be free to minister in an Episcopal church on invitation. The ministers joining in the appeal live in the vicinity of Montreal. The petition has been forwarded to the Bishop of Montreal and to the Montreal presbytery. Nonconformist ministers are usually insistent that there shall be no negotiation which invalidates their ministry or casts a cloud on the ministry of their predecessors.

Catholics Will Build Great Shrine in Washington

Contracts are being let for a great Catholic shrine in Washington. The building will be in connection with the Catholic University, and will cost five million dollars. The present contracts are for the basement only which will seat 1600 persons and will contain fifteen altar chapels. The high altar is to be called "Our Lady of the Catacombs." This will be the contribution of the various Catholic women of the United States whose name is Mary. The virgin Mary is the patron saint of the church in the United States.

Working on Church Union in England

During March and April a group of nonconformists and established churchmen in England met to discuss the question of church union. A committee of thirteen under the presidency of the Archbishop of York brought in an exhaustive report on the theme. The Nature of the Church, The Nature of the Ministry and the Place of Creeds in a united church. The personnel of the committee was noteworthy. The Episcopal group included five bishops, besides Dr. Headlam and Dr. Walter Frere. In the nonconformist group was Rev. J. D. Jones, moderator of the Federal Council of the Evangelical Free Churches, Dr. Garvie, Dr. P. Carnegie Simpson and Dr. J. H. Shakespeare. Some of the statements in the committee report are quite startling when one remembers that they represent the sentiments of both groups. The distinction of a visible and an invisible church is worked out, and denominational churches are recognized as parts of the true church, though often faulty in life. The mark for recognizing the true church is the profession of faith in God incarnate in Christ, the observance of the two sacraments, an ideal of life protected by discipline and a ministry. The episcopate is accepted by the whole group without attaching any definition to it, as well as a council of presbyters. The two groups agree that the united church shall in a corporate capacity use the apostles' creed at baptism and the Nicene creed in liturgy, but the exact form of usage would be left to individual churches. It is expressly declared that these creeds are to be taken with considerable liberty of interpretation. The creeds are not to be regarded as a complete or final expression of the Christian faith. The men who sign the committee report do so as individuals, and the document is put out to influence thought in the various communions on the subject of Christian union. The men who sign are such foremost leaders that the statement of a plan of union can hardly fail to elicit a long-continued discussion among the Christian churches of England, and it might even lead to some attempt at organic unity.

THE CRISIS OF THE CHURCHES
By LEIGHTON PARKS, D.D.
Rector of Saint Bartholomew's Church, New York
Dr. Parks derives a powerful text from which to plead the cause of church unity from the present crisis of world civilization—a condition, in the author's own words, "so dreadful that not a few serious-minded men are asking themselves if Western civilization is about to fail." The author sees Christian unity as the imperative need of the hour, and it is to point a way to that end that he has written this book.

Label Without Libel

Sometimes it's useful (as well as amusing) to try to classify your friends or compatriots, to sort and label them, and then survey the result.

You'll find that the pigeon holes your specimens fall into are more likely to reveal yourselves than your victims. Your own mind will be better displayed in selecting than your subject in being selected.

As, for instance, Mr. Chesterton, who divides humanity into fools, knaves and revolutionists. Or the prominent critic who classifies American authors broadly as either patriotic or unpatriotic. Or the man who groups his fellowmen into Americans and foreigners.

Here in The New Republic office we own to a habit of classifying our countrymen as either "New Republic sort of people" or other sort of people. That shows us up a bit, doesn't it? Particularly if you know what we mean by "a New Republic sort of a person." Here's a letter we just got from one of them—a professor in the University of Southern California:

> "It (the November 16th) is an issue to be proud of; paper, text, a prevailing attitude of fair-play along with a capable handling of particular problems, make the reading of its pages eminently satisfactory; moreover, it has the prime quality of readableness.
> "The New Republic has made a good reputation in the past few years for good sense and thoroughness in dealing with current problems; and this copy shows its qualities at the best."
> Faithfully yours,
> James Main Dixon,
> "Professor of Comparative Literature
> and the Higher Journalism."

That's what we call a "New Republic sort of person"—naturally, because he earnestly writes himself down as one. But there's more to it than that. A "New Republic sort of person" doesn't have to like The New Republic or even agree with it. He may be like the gentleman who "always reads The New Republic with interest because he is so rarely in accord with its reasoning or spirit." In fact, our "New Republic person" doesn't even have to read The New Republic. Broadly, he is anybody who finds thinking not only necessary but actually interesting; who finds impartial discussion not an impractical ideal but a most hard-headed, practical means of getting things done; a democrat who knows that votes may be counted but opinions must be weighed.

But if he's that kind, sooner or later he'll be reading The New Republic. And here are six attractive ways for him to begin:

A Journal Read by Statesmen

A special introductory offer of the next 13 numbers of The Outlook for only $1

A RELIABLE, authoritative weekly review of important news is as essential a part of the working equipment of the business executive or professional man as his desk, telephone, or staff of assistants.

In order to make it possible for business and professional men who are occasional readers of The Outlook to become better acquainted with the character of the journal and to see it regularly each week for a trial period at but slight expense, we make the following special offer:

> We will send The Outlook each week for the next three months (13 numbers) for the small sum of $1 to any one who is not now a subscriber. The regular yearly subscription price is $5, and this offer is made to non-subscribers in order to show them what they are missing by not having The Outlook each week.

A World-Famous Editorial Survey

First in position and importance in each issue of The Outlook is the editorial survey of the outstanding events of that week, discussed without partisanship or prejudice and with first-hand knowledge and conviction.

This terse weekly editorial summary and interpretation of the world's news is world-famous. In Japan, for instance, according to one of the leading Japanese publicists, The Outlook is the most popular of all American periodicals. At home it is the most-quoted periodical on the floor of Congress.

Each number contains hours of reading, all of which is bracing, refreshing, and brain-expanding. Distinguished contributors write for every issue. The fascinating running story of the world's progress is prepared for you by eminent journalists, statesmen, diplomatists, scientists, men of letters, artists, educators and business men.

Why You Will Need The Outlook During Your Summer Vacationing

Wherever your summer jaunts may take you, The Outlook will reach you each week. Due to a remarkably efficient change-of-address department, we can guarantee immediate action on all change-of-address orders received by us. Other periodicals often require from two to six weeks to get action on such orders. But no matter how often, or how quickly, you change your summer whereabouts, The Outlook will be there each week to keep you clearly, reliably, and authoritatively informed as to what is happening in the world. Many of our readers will get along without newspapers this summer—but not without The Outlook.

"The Most-Quoted Weekly Journal in America"

You have noticed, of course, that the leading newspapers of the country are almost constantly quoting from The Outlook, which is noted for getting hold of articles of such sharp and timely interest and importance that their publication is actually a matter of news. But why rely upon the fragmentary reports in the newspapers, when you can have the entire, unabridged contents of each week's issue of The Outlook before you for the next 13 weeks for the small sum of only $1?

By starting your trial subscription at once, you will be sure to get all the distinguished articles that are scheduled for the summer.

YOUR VACATION—THE NATION

A college president writes:

> "I never miss reading a copy of THE NATION. It tells the truth."

The editor of a Pennsylvania daily paper:

> "THE NATION is read with profound interest every week and I make generous use of its pages. . . I regard it as easily the most useful publication in the country to-day."

A United States Senator:

> "I am a constant reader of THE NATION because I find it instructive and helpful."

Do not miss Anne Martin's description of Nevada in our series, "These United States."

"—And plenty of time to read." But there is always the point where you have read everything on the verandah table, and don't feel like International Finance and Its Reorganization, and the novel you haven't finished has started the round of borrowers.

Then The Nation in the mail is like the answer to prayer. You can throw away the bundle of last week's newspapers, satisfy your semi-active conscience without the distraction of police murders, and still have a few pleasant hours of verse and Lewisohn reviews and Roving Critics and Driftways.

THE NATION

is the best provision against boredom. But you had better choose one of these books to take along; or we can time it to arrive in the middle of your

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH is the most inspiring and beautiful hymnal in the American church. All the best loved hymns of Christian faith are included and, in addition, the book is distinguished by three outstanding features:

Hymns of Social Service,

Hymns of Christian Unity,

Hymns of the Inner Life.

Think of being able to sing the Social Gospel as well as to preach it! The Social Gospel will never seem to be truly religious until the church begins to sing it.

EDITORIAL

Denominations and Organizations Promoting Religion

FOR a concise and comprehensive view of the Christian forces of the United States, the new edition of the Year Book of the Churches, published for the Federal Council of Churches, is indispensable. It contains over four hundred pages of statistics and information so compressed as to be almost statistical. There is a reference list of presumably all the religious bodies in the United States, with the personnel of their general organizations, a list of their missionary, benevolent and educational enterprises and of their publications, a brief statement of the history, doctrine and polity of each body, and the latest available statistics. There is a directory of the Federal Council, with its commissions, committees, and affiliated and cooperating bodies; and a very complete directory of the undenominational or interdenominational organizations for social service and for the promotion of religion. About two hundred and fifty of these agencies are listed; a bewildering array of causes and specialized types of service, but less bewildering when viewed in such a conspectus giving the personnel and purposes of each and its relation to other and kindred organizations. An instructive contrast: One hundred and ninety-five denominations, mostly the heritage of our generation from earlier days, specializing upon the technicalities of doctrine and ceremony. Two hundred and fifty social service organizations, almost all the product of our own day, specializing upon the living problems of the present—peace, industry, temperance, purity, hygiene, education, play, citizenship. It would be a useful exercise to make an arrangement in parallel columns of some of the distinctive doctrines for the propagation of which denominations exist, and on the other hand the purposes for which these social agencies have been called into being. On the left we would put the propositions that "repentance is the fruit of justifying faith, not a ground of the sinner's pardon"; that "the washing of the saints' feet is an ordinance the perpetual observance of which is commanded by Christ"; that "the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father alone." On the right we would place such objectives as "the promotion of the cause of peace among the nations"; "to develop character, good citizenship, initiative, and resourcefulness in boys"; "to investigate conditions underlying labor legislation"; "to provide employment for discharged prisoners"; "to improve conditions of living in the home"; to further "the protection of the home, the abolition of the liquor traffic, and the triumph of Christ's golden rule in custom and in law." Copies of the year book may be secured from either of the offices of the Federal Council of Churches, New York or Chicago.

Good Roads, Good Schools and Community Churches

CONSOLIDATED public schools have begun to appear in every state where hard roads have made the transportation problem easier. Twenty years ago the first consolidated school in Illinois was organized in a township in Winnebago county. Now many such schools may be found in the various states of the union, particularly where the good roads movement has caught on. Hard roads and the automobile are changing the entire structure of rural life, and people are no longer willing to have meager facilities in small communities. A whole township goes together for a good school. That is the very reason there are about a hundred community churches in the state of Iowa. Even in advance of good roads the people in many rural communities are insisting on the consolidation of the churches that there may be a resident minister, a larger neighborhood and a more efficient religious ministry. Meanwhile the religious leaders of many communions continue to rail against the community church. One week it is a southern Methodist bishop. Another week it is a Disciples state secretary. From time to time officials from most of the denominations join in, although it must be said that one rarely hears such sentiments from Congregational leaders. There is no provision for the recognition of community churches by the denominations except the community church be a thinly veiled denominational church set to win the unwary. This conservatism in the face of basic changes in the very structure of rural life in America illustrates well the density of the official ecclesiastical mind. The automobile is already ceasing to be a toy. People do not just ride. They go somewhere. In such families there is bound to come a revival of interest in church attendance, for the automobile makes a church ten miles away more accessible than the church used to be one mile away. In the new day we shall have rural churches still, but they will not be hopeless little affairs with a handful of the faithful. They will assume the dignity of town churches and be able to command an able ministry.

"Lord, Teach Us to Pray!"

DR. Alexander Whyte was the last of the great Puritan preachers, a prince of the pulpit of Scotland, and his volume of sermons on prayer, to which is prefixed an exquisite interpretative sketch of the preacher, is a treasure. Happily it is now obtainable in America, and it ought to be much in the hand of every man of the pulpit, not only for its insight into the many-sided life of prayer, but for its profound and moving power as an example of great preaching. At times startlingly dramatic, it is everywhere rich in gorgeous imaginative coloring, and insights that flash light into the deep places of life and death. There is something in this book that defies all analysis, something titanic, colossal, overwhelming, which makes ordinary preaching lie a long way below such heights—a sweep of vision, a grasp of reality, a grandeur of conception that fills the heart with wonder and awe. Dr. Whyte seemed utterly oblivious of the modern difficulties about prayer, perhaps because he was a man of importunate, victorious prayer. He did not argue about prayer; he prayed. Where there is so much that is sublime it is difficult to select, but the sermons on the prayer of our Lord in the garden, on the Costliness of Prayer, on the Geometry of Prayer, are memorable. Perhaps the fault of the book—if it be a fault—is that its visions and conquests soar so high above our critical, hesitating, baffled, and, alas, neglectful, modern life, that it seems to belong to another dimension of experience. It makes one wistful, at thought of the ranges of insight and experience to which one has not attained. Piety was his passion; the great saints were his familiars; he tore the world aside like a veil from the face of the soul. If one would know the secret of great preaching, it is revealed in this book as nowhere else, perhaps, in our generation.

The Daily Vacation Bible School Movement

IN the field of religious education the Daily Vacation Bible School is the distinctive feature of the present generation. The summer of 1901 witnessed the successful operation of four schools in mission churches of New York City. The movement reached other large cities of the east within a year or so, and in 1907 four schools were conducted in Chicago. This summer greater New York and suburbs is operating over 250 schools and Chicago has opened over 200 with an anticipated enrollment of over 30,000 boys and girls. The country at large will have more than 4,000 schools. The founder of the movement, Rev. Robert G. Bovelle, is promoting the work in China, where he reports that in Pekin alone there are 42 schools. The Daily Vacation Bible Schools open at the close of the public schools. Attendance is voluntary, not compulsory as in the public schools. On account of its varied and interesting program which runs the range of marches, drills, Bible stories, music, character stories, memory work and all kinds of hand and craft work activities, it wins with the children. The term is five or six weeks, two hours a day. As to number of sessions this is equal to half a year of Sunday school, and each session is twice as long. A well known leader in the field of religious education speaking of the moral and spiritual value of the movement refers to it as a great summer evangelistic campaign. A minister and church leader of national reputation speaks of the movement as the greatest development of the church in a generation. All of the first hour has a direct religious educational value, while the second hour is given more specially to recreational and hand work activities under the direction of trained Christian teachers. To a considerable extent there is an effort to correlate and harmonize the various elements of the daily program so that something of unity prevails regardless of the variety of activities.

Fighting Famine With Modern Methods

GASOLINE power must replace the horse power in the famine areas of Russia, for the horses are dead. The Quakers with the practicality which has so splendidly marked their efforts in all the famine areas of Europe have begun the use of modern methods in farming. Incidentally they may teach Russia some lessons which will be worth more than all the famine fund has cost. Three tractors are in use all season tearing up the ground for potatoes and millet in famine sections remote from the railway. The tractors never work for individuals but only for communes and social groups which work co-operatively, for only thus can a whole village be saved. The American machines run day and night and young Russians who never held a steering wheel before are learning to clean spark plugs and mend ignition wires. Late in July the fall plowing will begin and the sturdy machines will start on the long battle to conquer the famine of 1923. Of course three tractors make a pitifully small force with which to face the starvation of millions of people. But probably before these lines are in print more machines will be on the way to Russia. The vast oil fields of that land guarantee an abundant supply of fuel. Were the machines multiplied into the hundreds and set to work all through the famine areas, it would soon be possible to announce to the world that the job was done. The reorganization of Russia into anything like industrial normalcy is a long slow process and one that is the task of no other people save the Russians themselves. But the feeding of the hungry waits only on a few simple agricultural expedients. Most of Russia is agricultural and lacks only tools to extricate itself from its present terrible crisis.

Protestant Strategy in European Countries

FOR centuries Protestant activity has been virtually impossible in some European countries. In others the work has been stunted because of handicaps imposed by governments. In spite of these handicaps the Protestant faith has made some headway, and little preaching centers have been established in most of the cities of Europe. Following the war many ancient restrictions were removed. Now, for the first time the gospel may be preached freely by Protestants in many countries. The popular movements in the direction of Protestantism have been striking and encouraging. Meanwhile the Jesuit machinations in the capitals of Europe revive once more the sort of political maneuvering which made the religious history of Europe disgraceful. Unless the Protestant churches move quickly, the door will be closed again and no permanent gains for a free faith will be made. For an hour like this it is a pity that our American denominations such as the Baptists and Methodists persist in going it alone. Enough money is available, if it were directed by a central board of strategy to make effective every struggling Protestant church in Europe. In place of that, denominations which have never had churches in certain European countries now place denominational advantage above the interests of the indigenous Protestant group. Europe is not a foreign mission field. We do not need to send American workers over there in large numbers. What is needed is to develop the native resources in the several countries by grants of money and by reinforcement of leadership. Theological seminaries must be set on their feet. Churches must be erected. A literature must be created and widely circulated. Many countries in Europe that are now nominally Roman Catholic but really agnostic, would turn to the Protestant religion if it presented itself as an effective movement promising to meet adequately the religious needs of the people.

A Million Cans of Milk For Russian Children

MILLIONS of Russian children will die for the lack of milk this year. Even a good grain harvest will not help greatly for the animals are dead and children must have milk to grow normally. The American Committee for Relief of Russian Children confines its work to children. Its overhead expense is all provided for by other than the publicly subscribed funds. Every dollar given actually reaches Russia where it is distributed by Rev. George Stewart, a Presbyterian minister of New York and Mr. Frank Connes, interpreter of the supreme court of New York. This organization has set itself the goal of securing a million cans of milk for the Volga district at once. The children of Russia in the famine districts that do not die will be worse than dead if not properly fed. It is from this vast mass of underfed children that a mass of degenerates and defectives will be recruited to curse Russia during the next generation. The most recent figures from Russia show that with all the relief work being done there are still seven million people who are unprovided for. Capt. Paxton Hibben in Leslie's Weekly pictures the grewsomeness of the situation in these words: "I came upon a boy, stretched on the bare flagstones. He was dying, and as his breath came in little, hoarse gasps, his mother was taking the ragged clothing from him, very gently, to cover a half-naked little girl. And over on a step of the station a man sat, a boy a year and a half old tugging at his father's torn coat, and a baby of four months awkwardly stretched crosswise of the man's knees, sucking at a bit of watermelon rind. Every railroad station was like this. And at night, as our car lay in the railway yards, I could hear all night long the thin voices of the children saying over and over again: 'Uncle! Uncle, give me a little, tiny piece of bread—uncle!' I think I shall hear that all my life."

American Students in French Universities

THE efforts that were made by the officers of the American Expeditionary Force in France and Great Britain at the time the armistice was signed, to provide the boys in the service with some useful occupation pending their return to the United States, resulted in the opening of the doors of practically all British and French universities to the men of the A. E. F. on the most simple and easy terms. The consequence was that a great number of American boys availed themselves of this opportunity. Practically all of the British and French schools received into their ranks temporary groups ranging in number from one hundred up to more than one thousand. In France this movement was particularly notable. Very few of the boys in the A. E. F. had any large command of the French language. Most of them had picked up bits of French in camp life, but this defect was soon remedied by intensive courses in the French language, and lectures by interesting instructors on themes that offered the greatest promise of being understood by the American boys. In each one of these French universities, some of which were among the oldest in the world, an American dean was placed in charge of the students from the United States, and delivered courses to those groups on themes related to France and to civilization. In addition, professors, preachers and lecturers visited these universities and gave stimulating addresses to the A. E. F. men at work there. The result of this system has been a very interesting increase in the number of students at work in French universities. Before the war Americans usually went to German, Scottish or English universities, and for under-graduate work to the universities of Cambridge and Oxford under conditions made possible by the Rhodes Scholarship plan. At the present time there are practically no American students in the German universities, but in the French institutions there are many. Of course, the larger number of them are in the Sarbonne at Paris; but there are representatives of American scholarship in every one of the sixteen provincial French universities, and the American students represent forty-six states and one hundred and seventy-four American colleges and universities. The number has risen from sixty-one in 1919 to thirteen hundred and forty-eight in 1922. A little less than half of this number are women, most of whom are teachers of French. These facts give eloquent testimony to the friendly feelings of the American people toward France as the result of acquaintance made during and since the war.

Britain and Self-determination

RIGHTLY has it been asserted with insistence that this is the century of democracy. Self-determination has become the passion of all the nations. The example of a few determined sections of the world's population has become contagious, and now there are few portions of the world that have any intellectual contact with the moving centers of life where the idea of self-government has not attained dominance. Even the very small nationalities are sharers in the passion of the time. To them as well as to the rest certain great voices have come with the assurance of universal sympathy in their proper aspirations after independence. In some instances this ambition is cherished without due regard to the long and severe preparation that ought to precede the attainment of self-government. But in all such cases the good will of the progressive nations is with the aspirants.

The early and persistent leaders in this movement have been the nations of the Anglo-Saxon group. They were the first to perceive the immense importance and the astonishing possibilities of the principle. Prophetic spirits in Great Britain caught the suggestion from the moral leaders of Israel, the philosophers of Greece, the tribunes of Rome, the leaders of the free cities of the middle ages, and the founders of the universities. Most of all they inherited it from the barons who wrested the Great Charter from the hands of King John on the plain of Runnymede, the Roundheads who brought King Charles to the block at Whitehall, the Pilgrims who sailed away in the Speedwell and the Mayflower to find civil and religious liberty in a new world, and the fathers of the two civilizations of Jamestown and Plymouth Rock. They were inspired afresh by the audacity and success of the French Revolution, and in later days they have been interested and sympathetic witnesses of the silent social and industrial revolution in Italy, the work of Mazzini and the followers of his potent ideas.

In the men of the Anglo-Saxon races this passion for self government has been steady and growing. The American Revolution was only one of its many expressions. That was an outbreak of the irrepressible spirit within the family. It was both a bold affirmation of the idea by a young scion of the household, and a significant lesson taught the mother-nation by one of the children. The final victory of the Americans in that struggle was already forecast by the fact that the best of the British nation was on their side. The best of the statesmen of England sympathized with the struggling colonies. The best of the British people were of the same mind, or indifferent to the attempt to conquer the provincials. The best of the soldiers of Great Britain were never sent across the Atlantic for the same reason. The red-coated armies were made up mostly of mercenary soldiers hired from military speculators in central Europe. And if there had not been a wooden-headed foreign king on the throne, one who hardly knew the English language but gloried in his Hanovarian inheritance and traditions, there would never have been a war between the mother-land and the colonies. When that struggle was over, England had learned the lesson that her children were of the same self-determined type as her own home people, and would never submit to autocratic treatment.

That lesson has been the secret of the colonial policy of Great Britain from that day forward. She has secured for herself large spaces of the earth's domain only to impart to their peoples the master ideas of the modern time—democracy, education, national honor, and religion—and then has set them on the high road to independence and a place in the sun. The British race has its faults, of which it is very proud. Among them are self-assurance, egotism stubbornness, irascibility, and a certain incapacity for easy adjustment to new and disturbing ideas. On the othe hand it has marvelous ability to hold its ground, to carry out its objectives in spite of heavy opposition, and t suffer if need be for great causes. British people are no easily aroused to enthusiasm. But once they have taken a stand, they are sure to hold on.

It is these qualities in them and their children that have made possible the world's great democracies. The example of America became contagious in the family of the English-speaking nations. Canada, Australia, New Zealand South Africa, one by one demanded the same self-government that the United States had achieved. And slowly grudgingly, but surely Great Britain assented to the proposal. There were many British people who opposed bitterly the movement toward independence on the part o these colonies. But there was the progressive heart of the nation that was always true to its ancient passion fo liberty, for itself and all the children of the family. Almos without demonstration the widely separated nations of the Anglo-Saxon blood found themselves lifted from the estate of provinces to that of colonies, and from that o olonies to dominions, such as they are today. And those ominions are held to the mother country by no arbitrary ule of royal decree, but by the most tenuous and gossamer-ke thread of official relationship. So much is this the ase that on the outbreak of the great war Britain did not now that she could count on a pound of gold, a regiment f men or a sea-going transport from the dominions. It was only the response of free peoples to the call of the mother race that poured gold and men and ships into the ervice of the union jack.

There is no reason to doubt that the other portions of he British empire will achieve independence as rapidly s they are able to vindicate their right to it. It must be nderstood that there are strong sentiments within the English nation urging freedom for all dependencies with he same vehemence shown by the most energetic nationalsts in these dependent groups. On the other hand the elfish commercial spirit often operates, as it does in other portions of the world, to retard the process of political iberation. The movement resulting from these contendng forces, favorable and unfavorable, both within and without the nation, is slow, but on the whole steady and ndefeatable. This has been the history of most of the British provinces. Their varying degrees of self-government are the result of careful consideration of their capacities for democracy, and the gradual transfer of power into heir hands. This movement is never rapid enough to satisfy the more ardent patriots. On the other hand, it is always too rapid to save the conservative elements in the nation from serious misgiving and alarm. On the whole he result is progress. And England is the one nation in he world, with wide colonial experience, that has succeeded in mingling wise administration with progressive development of the program of independence.

At the present time the eyes of the world are fastened upon the three most conspicuous examples of British dependencies struggling with the problem of self-government. These are Egypt, India, and Ireland. Egypt is a notable example of wise and constructive administration. From a French regime which well-night drained the land of its resources, the valley of the Nile has become one of the rich lands of the south. British residents like Lord Cromer and Lord Kitchener, though mere advisors of the native government, and having no official position save that of English gentlemen residing in the land, were in reality the rulers of Egypt. The local authority in every district was not the provincial governor half as much as it was the English doctor and engineer. By processes of this sort the people were taught a measure of thrift and expert knowledge of agriculture, stock rearing and other vocations. They were also taught to prize self-government. A strong sentiment in favor of a native administration that should have something more than the shadow of power was inspired by the spectacle of a race as efficient and dominant as the British. At length that plan was organized into the proposals made by Lord Milner. By some both in Egypt and in England these proposals were deemed too radical; by some they were thought too conservative. They are at the present time being tried out. No one is quite sure that Egypt is prepared for self-government. It is probable that if the strong support which British influence extends to the new administration in Egypt were withdrawn, the entire fabric of popular government would collapse. Time alone can determine. But it may be set down with confidence that it is the British disposition to grant to Egypt a full measure of self-determination at the first moment practicable. This, as in all cases, will be a compromise between radical and conservative opinion. But it will reach the desired end in due time.

Even more interesting, and much more in the public eye is the problem presented by India. There the situation is far more complex, and to that extent more tense. Half a hundred races, with as many dialects and widely varying religions offer a riddle which not the most acute intellects of Great Britain or India have been able to solve. Radical nationalists like Tagore and Gandhi insist that the many and diverse peoples of the great peninsulas are capable of self-government. Others as deeply interested in the welfare of the land affirm with confidence that the withdrawal of British control would precipitate intertribal strife which would undo the advance made during the past century. Here again it is not alone Indian opinion which demands independence and denounces the slowness of the government in affording self-determination to the widely scattered races of the great colonial empire. It is radical English opinion which is pushing for the complete emancipation of the land from British domination. Soon or late that will come. Nothing would be more disastrous than to have it come too rapidly. The best method seems to be to allow the Indian peoples the fullest measure of participation in the government. If in due time they disclose the same qualities of leadership in administrative work that they have manifested in literature and education, it will be proof that the time of the full realization of their national aspiration is at hand.

Of Ireland it is difficult to speak in this depressing hour. The plan that appeared to be on the point of consummation for a real democracy, as free and honorable as the estate of the great dominions of the empire, seems to have met a strange and baffling defeat at the moment when it was meeting approval by the electorate of that much harried land. The obstinate and incorrigible folly of a few self-appointed leaders like de Valera seems to have set back the clock for years. Perhaps the defeat of free government in Ireland by its own misguided agitators is but for a time. Constructive spirits like Griffith and Collins deserve the full confidence of all right-minded Irish people in all the lands, and the sympathy of progressive people of every race. It is incredible that Ireland should continue indefinitely to defeat the program for its own just and honorable inclusion in the family of free and self-governing nations. All that stands in the way of the realization of this hope is the rule-or-ruin policy of the bitter-enders. Great Britain will give to Ireland, as to the rest of her colonies and dependencies, the opportunities for self-realization at the moment when they can be appreciated and utilized. The movement for self-government in Ireland and in every other part of the world is undefeatable. And its surest guarantor and promotor is the history and spirit of the British empire.

The Objectives of Evangelism

IT is rightly assumed that a part of the program of Christianity is the service of evangelism. The Master went about calling men to himself and the work of the new social order he was inaugurating. In one of the most dramatic moments of his life he laid his hand on the great evangelistic message of the Prophet of the Exile and insisted that in his proclamation of the good tidings that ancient oracle had found realization. He sent his disciples out to invite men into the new fellowship. The men who became the interpreters of his ideals to the world made much of the call of others to his enterprise. And in the entire history of the church evangelism has had a notable place.

At the present time Christian leaders in all the churches are announcing the fact that the spirit of evangelism is prevalent and growing. This is counted as one of the favorable signs of the times. For such a movement there has been long and anxious waiting. It may be that the tokens of the present moment are really significant. Certainly there has been a more noticeable effort to win the attention of non-Christian people to the gospel during the past two years than in any recent period. A further note of hopefulness is found in the quiet and congregational character of the endeavor, rather than through campaigns and spasms of revivalistic energy. The day of the big meeting seems happily passing. It appears to have come to the attention of serious minded Christian people that an evangelistic "drive" in a community is as illogical and abortive as would be an educational spasm, in which some vocal persuader with the vocabulary of academic enthusiasm were to undertake to educate all the youth of the town in a series of daily or nightly exhortations.

It is a relief to find that evangelism which has so long suffered from the auctioneer method is quieting itself to serious and worthful appeals to men and women capable of estimating at their true values the factors of the Christian life. The income of young life into the churches from the families and the Sunday schools is healthy and natural. The tactics of the professional evangelist in the churches themselves are usually of a character to hinder rather than to promote the growth of the spirit of genuine Christianity. But in the Sunday schools such performances are so at variance with every principle of sound religious education that few self-respecting pastors will longer tolerate them. The evangelism that wins anything more than a transient and superficial success is that of the pervasive, pastoral, teaching order, that uses all seasons, and issues in the regular and orderly reception of young and old alike into Christian fellowship as a step toward more effective Christian service.

Insofar as that kind of evangelism can be promoted by denominational effort, by concerted community plans, by the encouragement and direction of church federations and councils of churches, or by the more widely extended ministries of the Federal Council of Churches, through its commission on evangelism, admirable results can be achieved. Indeed the reports of the past two years are encouraging as pointing to an era of sanity and efficiency in the evangelism of the Protestant churches. For it indicates a growing conviction on the part of Christian leaders that the serious business of the church is not evangelism, but the realization of the ideals of Jesus in human life. In the past it has been too much the effort of the denominations and the individual churches to promote evangelistic effort for purposes of self-interest. It is a pleasing euphemism to describe the efforts made to win converts as the "extension of the kingdom," or the "conversion of souls to Christ." In reality the chief objective of most of the evangelistic campaigns of the past has been to augment the membership of the churches, and thus serve the very practical institutional end of visible and financial success.

The only plausible appeal that can be made to people to unite with the churches is in the interest of the great objectives of the kingdom of God in the world. The usual type of evangelism is too transparently self-interested to win the enthusiastic enlistment of men and women who want to invest their lives in really great enterprises. When the church appeals to people to come into her membership because they ought to desire to save their souls, or to become a part of a church organization, the appeal is too shallow and unconvincing to get the best members of the community interested. But when strong personalities are made aware of the tremendous opportunity those who have the mind of Christ are afforded for the attainment of the ideals to which he directed them, the appeal is not usually in vain.

It is the age-long mistake of the churches that they have set their own success in the place of the true objectives which give them their only excuse for existence. Christian history is marred at a score of critical points by the fatal mistake of making the church an end whose success was to be promoted, rather than an instrument for the accomplishment of worthy purposes. Whenever that opinion prevails, it will be only the weak, the conventional, the conforming who will take the church seriously. An evangelism that aims at bringing people into the visible body of believers as its first and really important enterprise will always fail to make upon thoughtful people the impression of being worth their regard. Why should a church federation have a committee on evangelism? There are several answers. One is that the promotion of evangelistic effort in any manner possible is the most important work that can be undertaken by such an organization. We believe this to be wholly a mistake. There is value in the furthering of a sane, systematic and cooperative type of congregational and pastoral evangelism in every community. And this we believe can be greatly furthered by such direction.

Again, people who are aware that there is a more important field of Christian service than that of merely getting people into the churches, are led to acquiesce in a program of evangelism, even of the cruder sort, by the feeling that many people want it, and want nothing else; and perhaps behind the smoke-screen of some sort of evangelistic effort an opportunity may be found for some of those forms of practical Christian service, like religious education, community welfare, the relief of wrongs, the purging of public morals, the promotion of religious neighborliness, and other plans which are implicit in Jesus' program for any community.

The church and the Sunday school will have to be rescued from the habit of making them the stage for the exploitation of the ordinary forms of evangelistic effort. As long as they suffer under this incubus they can never reach the standard of efficiency of which they are capable. And the same unwise propaganda lies in wait to pounce upon every other organization that shows any degree of vitality. The Daily Vacation Bible School is the latest of these admirable forms of Christian activity to be threatened with an inundation of revivalistic zeal. There are eager propagandists of the evangelistic method who are pushing hard against the doors of such agencies of religious instruction, bent upon subverting them to their unscientific and medieval program.

The sort of evangelism that will prove really effective is the direct appeal to men and women, not to join the church, but to undertake the activities that can alone give the churches reason for existence. Why ask people to join the church, and then after they have learned to work in the harness of congregational and denominational loyalty, slowly and timidly inform them that there is something further to be done in the form of social service, adjustment of unsocial industrial conditions, salvation of the wastage of human life through the evils that afflict the world? Why not call them directly to these great objectives which were the theme of Jesus' thought and concern? Then there would be no possibility of keeping them out of the churches which held out to them such a platform of service.

The new and effective evangelism calls men and women to the great adventure of working at Christ's program. And the appeal of the church, not for its own sake, but for the sake of its supreme purpose, will not be in vain.

The Circus

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THE daughter of Keturah spake unto me, saying, There is a Circus in town. Wouldest thou like to borrow my two children tomorrow?

And I said, Nay, but I will borrow them today.

So we went to the Great Show.

Now, in my youth the Price of Admission was the half of a shekel for an adult and the fourth part of a shekel for a child. But now it is much more than that. But in my youth I did not always have the fourth part of a shekel, but I was always among those present. And Elephants are great consumers of water.

Now we went, I and the children. And there were Three Rings and Two Platforms. And there never was a time when a Spectator might watch any one feat without feeling that he was missing something better.

Now, as nearly as I can remember, the modern show hath much more skillful feats than the shows of my boyhood; for I saw wonderful stunts. But I think the Modern Show is based upon an error in Psychology; for it showeth more than can be seen or remembered.

And both in a Show and in a Sermon the Art consisteth largely in Knowing what to Leave Out.

And when we were home, and the children were tired out, and I was weary also, I sought to learn what had interested them. And the great confusing feats had not impressed them. But they had seen a Trick Dog, and an Educated Horse, and a Pony named Topsy, which they knew was the name of the pony their mother had owned when she was a little girl.

And the elephants, of which there were twenty-three, had not impressed them greatly; whereas a show with one elephant had been great in my boyhood. But they were impressed by the Hippo, as they called him. And they said, He looked like a Potato. Now, no grown person would have been clever enough to think of that; but as he lay there with two eyes in the small end of him, it was exactly what he looked like. And they noted the One Hippopotamus, and not the twenty-three elephants.

To Our Subscribers

It requires two weeks to make a change of address. It is necessary that our wrappers be addressed a full week ahead, and time is required to handle accurately the large volume of requests for change that come to us at this season of the year. Unless your vacation period is somewhat extended, we advise that you leave a few one-cent stamps with your postmaster or postman, and ask to have your Christian Century forwarded to you. You thus avoid the risk of missing a copy both at the beginning and at the end of your vacation.

We desire that our readers shall not miss a single issue, and while we will gladly make any change of address requested, we are sure the risk of irregularity is greatly reduced by the plan we suggest.

Experience proves that it is highly unsatisfactory to handle a change and a change back in one order. Our subscribers on vacation will therefore please take note that in their own interest we are disregarding all deferred "change back" orders and will wait for specific instructions at the time the subscriber wishes the "change back" to be made.

Two good rules to remember:

1) One change at a time;
2) Give present as well as new address.

The Outlook for the Disciples of Christ

By Winfred Ernest Garrison

THE Disciples of Christ are the most considerable religious body that has originated on American soil. Those of us who were born in this family of faith and who adhere to its fellowship enjoy the belief that the movement is in many respects typically American—exhibiting perhaps the defects of its qualities, but at all events strongly American in its spirit and temper. Originating in western Pennsylvania a century ago, moving westward with the current of migration, it has gained and held its strength in the middle west. The east, in general, knows it not. It is a stranger in New York and Boston. But the Mississippi Valley knows it. It built itself into the growing structure of the social and religious life of the states of the old northwest; it was with the pioneers in Kentucky and Missouri; it helped to lay the foundations in Kansas and Oklahoma. It is neither a criticism nor a confession to say that its followers are for the most part a rural and small-town people. Uncle Sam himself, it will be recalled, is not exactly an urban figure. If one analyzes this claim to Americanism, the following specific qualities of this group seem to justify it.

DEMOCRATIC CHARACTERISTICS

It has from the start been strongly democratic and individualistic. There was too much Scotch-Irish stock in it to permit it to be otherwise. A favorite text is, "Call no man master." Its earliest promoters protested against "clerical domination." It was long before one of their ministers dared to wear the title "D.D." They refused to be called "Campbellites." Even in the prime of his power and influence, the words of Alexander Campbell were often challenged by those who, in a general way, might be considered his followers. His opinions bound nobody. It may be said of them, as it has been said of the Baptists, that their democracy sometimes takes disorderly and inefficient forms. Perhaps it does. So does American political democracy. I am not saying that the Disciples have been the perfect embodiment of efficiency or of the spirit of democracy, but that they are strikingly democratic in the characteristic American way. Because of this, they have often been the prey of demagogues and they have perhaps been unduly influenced by catch-words and mottoes. They have sometimes been suspicious of their best leadership and especially resentful of any apparent assumption of superiority. While theoretically committed to education, they have been not over-cordial to those who had too much of it. They are impatient of theorists and theories, distrustful of the critical mind, disinclined to the scrutiny of their presuppositions, and disposed to rely upon the judgment of the plain citizen as against the expert. If the right of private judgment is central to Protestantism, they may claim to be typically Protestant as well as typically American.

The Disciples have sought to reconcile liberty with union believing them to be one and inseparable, now and forever This antinomy presents problems, some of them still unsolved, but every element among the Disciples firmly believes that these two principles can and must be combined in the church of the future.

They have been a practical-minded, common-sense, unmystical people, loving to believe that their faith rested upon demonstrable certainties and objective facts which anyone could apprehend if he only would, and presenting a definite program of action which anyone could follow Christian faith, they have said, like any other kind of faith is simple belief of facts upon adequate testimony. Repentance is the turning away from one's actual evil ways not sorrow for a general state of sin as a theological concept. Baptism is a specific act of obedience. The entire process of becoming a Christian is as clear-cut and definite as the procedure by which an alien becomes a citizen Because it is all so simple and obvious, they have been perfectly sure they were right, equally sure that others were wrong, and correspondingly positive in utterance. They have had little patience with the dreamy, the misty, the transcendental, or with any conception of religion which could not be expressed in the common meaning of plain words and compacted into a formula.

They have been lovers of simplicity—a simple creed the "simple gospel," a plain form of worship. For a long time there was a decided feeling of opposition to the building of "fine meeting-houses." They feel about clerica vestments as the average mid-western American feels about the gold-laced coat and the satin knee-breeches of diplomatic court costume; and their attitude toward ritualism is that of a plain citizen toward the formal etiquette of a throne room. They are partly annoyed and not a little amused by it. They are a hearty, vigorous, friendly and direct people, with a certain scorn for theological subtleties and bu little interest in the delicate nuances of style or opinion They may occasionally split their infinitives, but they seldom split hairs.

I.

In so far then as the Disciples do constitute a characteristically American group, their contribution to the religiou life of this country and their present outlook must be a matter of some interest to others besides themselves especially since they are far past the point where they began to count their members by that favorite American numeral, a million. The fact, too, that their history and principles are not widely known may justify a brief statement which will go below the superficial description of their characteristics as an actual group.

A conviction of the unchristian nature of the bitter denominational rivalries of the time and of the inefficiency of a divided church as an instrument for saving men, furnished the impulse for those religious stirrings, early in the nineteenth century, which issued in the formation of the body known as the Disciples of Christ. Thomas Campbell, a minister in the Seceder Presbyterian church, emigrated from his parish at Ahorey, Ireland, to western Pennsylvania in 1807. On account of resistance to his efforts to unite the various branches of the Presbyterian church in that region, he had already broken with the authorities of his church, organized the "Christian Association of Washington (Pennsylvania)" and was putting into print a "Declaration and Address" proclaiming the principles of union, when he was joined by his son, Alexander, who had spent a year in the University of Glasgow, where, through the influence of Greville Ewing and the Haldanes and by his own independent study of Scriptures, his allegiance to the Seceder organization had been considerably shaken.

Father and son joined heartily in a movement which was motived, first of all, by an ardent evangelical desire to redeem and enrich the lives of men by the gospel of Christ; second, by the conviction that only a united church could accomplish that end and could be in harmony with the will of Christ; third, by the principle that the basis of union must be the essential and imperishable religion of Jesus, centering in personal loyalty to him, rather than any complete formulation of doctrines however correct. It was their conviction that all human and speculative opinions should be eliminated from the test of fellowship, and that Christian men in their thinking and the church in its organization and activity must be free from every sort of overhead tyranny and especially from "clerical domination."

THE ANCIENT ORDER

In working out these principles, the Campbells laid renewed emphasis upon the classic Protestant attitude to the Bible, and adopted as a presupposition the then current conception of biblical authority. Their escape from the complexities of creedal and speculative theology lay through a return to the phraseology of the New Testament, and the adoption of Peter's confession, "Thou art the Christ, the son of the living God," as the sole creed and test of faith. Their specific effort soon took the form of an attempt to "restore the ancient order of things," that is, the faith, ordinances, and life of the church of the apostolic age as it is described in the New Testament. After the movement was under way, its leaders became convinced that the baptism of the New Testament was immersion. The adoption of this practice brought them into relation with the Baptists, with whom they remained in fellowship until about 1830. When the separation occurred, in some places by the action of the Baptist churches and associations in casting out the "reformers," and in others by the action of the "reformers" in leaving or dissolving the associations, the new body came into existence with a considerable group of adherents, most of whom had been Baptists.

A great and effective stimulus to evangelism came from the adoption of a simple "ordo salutis"—faith, repentance and baptism—a program which gave the seeker after salvation something definite to believe and something specific to do. An important accession of strength, together with a re-emphasis upon the right of individual liberty of opinion, came from union with a movement led by Barton W. Stone, under whom an important group, chiefly in Kentucky and Ohio, had come from the Presbyterian church by a different route to the same essential position.

By reason of the breadth of its fundamental principles and the absence of any official theology, the movement lends itself to freedom and progress. While it is true that the leaders of the first generation developed a very definite theology which has been held by a large proportion of their followers, this is no essential part of the movement. It has never been codified or enacted; it never has been and, without radical changes in the structure and ideals of the group, it never can be enforced.

TWO BASIC ASSUMPTIONS

In giving form and definite content to this fundamental motive to seek unity upon a basis of the simple and essential gospel conceived in terms of personal loyalty to Jesus as Lord and Master, Mr. Campbell and his associates adopted with new emphasis two then current assumptions: first, the principle of the normative character of the faith and practice of the apostolic church; and secondly, the conception of the Bible as an inerrant record from which, by a simple process of exegesis, the content of that faith and practice could with certainty be ascertained. The first of these had occupied but small place in the thought and program of the churches through the eighteenth century and the first part of the nineteenth, but it was nowhere denied. It had, in isolated instances, been strongly asserted. The second was a re-affirmation of the formal principle of the Protestant reformation. This principle of biblical authority was greatly clarified by these nineteenth century "reformers" by applying to the Bible the distinction between the successive dispensations of divine grace—the Adamic, the Mosaic, and the Christian—so that the New Testament alone became the lawbook for Christians. Mr. Campbell, who had in him the making of a higher critic, was insistent that the student of the Bible must ask when, by whom, and to whom a passage was written before taking it as the will of God for this age. The basis of unity was further immensely simplified by discovering that, by the testimony of the New Testament, the requirements for admission to the apostolic church were simply faith in Jesus Christ as the son of God, repentance, and baptism. It was therefore not necessary to come to the agreement upon a complete biblical theology, or even a complete New Testament theology.

These two assumptions, together with the underlying view of religious authority as something external, absolute and unchangeable, a revelation of the will of God conceived as existing outside of the universe and independent of it, completely dominated the religious thinking of the early part of the nineteenth century. As a matter of course they also dominated the thinking of the Disciples in the period in which they were developing the type of doctrine and the system of religious thought which has been prevalent among them for the greater part of a century. In any consideration of the future of the Disciples it is of primary importance to distinguish between those things which constitute their motives and principles, and those opinions and interpretations which were developed on the basis of current presuppositions, and which were determined largely by the temperament of the leaders, their Lockian philosophy and their reaction against certain common abuses.

Let us say again, then, that the essential motive of the Disciples of Christ in the inception of their movement was to restore the simplicity and purity of the gospel of Jesus and to unite the church in loyalty to him, troubling no man's conscience and trammeling no man's liberty with man-made creeds and human opinions. To that program the Disciples are trying to stand fast. But the working out of that program in our time may conceivably take either one of two directions: First, for those who hold strict views of biblical authority and who hold that "revelation does not need to be interpreted" (the recent words of a prominent minister), this program will mean the maintenance of a definite doctrinal statement, a "divine plan of salvation" with its ordinances and procedure, and a scheme of church organization, all conceived as God-given, unchangeable, final, revealed and known beyond the possibility of a mistake or a reasonable difference of opinion. This is the "restoration of a particular ecclesiastical order" of which Mr. Campbell spoke hopefully. Or, in contrast with this, it may mean, secondly, an effort to emphasize the leadership and lordship of Jesus, to maintain constantly an open and inquiring mind, seeking to find what are the central principles of his religion, using such means of knowledge as are at our disposal whether they are perfect or not, to disencumber these of the accumulations which cramp and hinder them, and to put them to work in the world functioning for our day rather than perpetuating the accretions of the past, realizing meanwhile that our interpretations and applications of the religion of Jesus are not necessarily inerrant and that one must be ready to maintain a vital fellowship with those whose loyalty to him leads them to quite other opinions and practices.

PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY

Under the first alternative, the maintenance of the unity of the Disciples themselves, not to mention their contribution toward the unification of the whole church, would be conditioned upon securing unanimous agreement upon three matters: that primitive Christianity had an organization, a formulation of faith, and a set of ordinances definitely intended to be authoritative, permanent ,and universal; that the New Testament gives an account of these so authentic and dependable (not to say inerrant) and so unmistakably clear that we can have indisputable knowledge of them; and that a certain "particular ecclesiastical order" is the one taught in the New Testament. Under the second alternative there is room for diversities of opinion about the whole range of questions of doctrinal formulation, ecclesiastical organization, ordinances, and all the rest of the technique of the religious life, together with unbroken fellowship in doing the work for which Jesus lived among men.

FACING SHARP ISSUE

The Disciples of Christ have come squarely up against these alternatives. They need not divide, and I for one most earnestly hope that they will not. But only the blind can fail to see, and only the dumb can refuse to say, that there is a wide diversity of judgment among them as to what are the major interests of the kingdom of God and what is the unifying and motivating purpose of the church in this day. There are those, in large numbers, whose interest is primarily antiquarian, the apotheosis of a "particular ecclesiasticial order." Of course, they believe in righteousness and justice and brotherhood; they want to see society redeemed as well as individual men saved; but the first essential for all this, as they see it, is the proclamation of "our distinctive plea," meaning by that phrase that "particular ecclesiastical order" which they believe was exhibited in the church of the apostolic age. The acceptance of that order they consider essential to loyalty to Christ and to fellowship in his church. And there are those, in numbers perhaps not so large but rapidly increasing, who are unwilling to identify the religion of Jesus with any "particular ecclesiastical order" or to limit their fellowship to those who are in agreement with them upon these matters of doctrine, ordinance and organization. They also believe in righteousness, justice, and brotherhood, and in the application of the principles of Jesus to the individual and social life of men; and they insist that in claiming for themselves and granting to others the widest freedom of inquiry in all historical, critical and social questions, and in claiming fellowship with all others who are seeking to practice and promote the religion of Jesus, they are not only in harmony with the spirit and teaching of the master but also loyal to the true fundamental principles of this religious movement. These specific doctrines and practices which have been generally current among the Disciples—for instance, a theory about the authoritativeness of the Bible, an opinion of the priority of faith to repentance, a certain psychology of conversion, a belief as to the design of baptism, etc.—are merely incidental, growing not out of the great inspiring motive of the movement, but out of local and temporary influences and therefore subject to change and open to free investigation, dissent and variation without disturbing the essential bond of unity.

The Disciples are not unique in having within their fold representatives of these two types of mind and temperament. The question is, Can they continue to live together? It is encouraging, though not decisive, to note that they always have lived together, for from the earliest days these two types have been in evidence. A long series of episodes in the history of the Disciples have exhibited the tension between the legalistic or strict-construction type of mind and the liberal or progressive type. The legalists said, No unimmersed person is a Christian. Mr. Campbell, whose heart always had leanings toward liberalism though his views on authority were strict, said: "I do not substitute obedience to one commandment for universal or even general obedience. Should I see a sectarian Baptist (sic) or pedobaptist more spiritually-minded, more generally conformed to the requisitions of the Messiah, than one who precisely acquiesces with me in the theory and practice of immersion as I teach, doubtless the former rather than the latter would have my cordial approbation and love as a Christian. It is the image of Christ the Christian looks for and loves. . . . There is no occasion for making immersion absolutely essential to a Christian." There are probably few of any Disciples now alive who would deny the name of Christian to all unimmersed persons.

Later the issue of open or close communion arose. The argument—like most arguments on religion—ended in a draw, but the more liberal practice prevailed and has been universal for half a century. The modern inter-denominational cooperative movements came into existence. Against some internal opposition—not serious in this case—the Disciples entered heartily into the Christian Endeavor movement. Church federation aroused more alarm and opposition, and the decision in favor of it is not yet unanimous, but the Disciples have taken their part, not without credit, in the federation movement. The practice of inter-denominational comity in mission fields even yet encounters out-spoken opposition, and very naturally and logically. If "our distinctive plea" is identical with the gospel and if every item of it is an indispensable part of the gospel, then an agreement to leave certain regions to the ministrations of the Methodists and Presbyterians and others must mean leaving the inhabitants of that territory without the gospel, that is, without the complete gospel. Truly a weighty responsibility. (Note that it is never a question of whether the heathen cannot be saved without "our plea." Nobody says that they won't be—though how can they be, if "our plea" is the gospel, and the gospel is the power of God unto salvation? The question about the salvation of the heathen is usually parried by replying that the real question is whether we can be saved if we do not give the whole gospel to the whole world.) Well, it is a good argument. In fact, there is no answer to it—if "our plea" for a particular ecclesiastical order is the gospel.

PASSION FOR UNITY

But the Disciples have, on the whole, gone into all of these cooperative movements, from Christian-Endeavor to missionary comity, with a good deal of heartiness. Whatever may be the apparent logic of their doctrinal positions, they are naturally, constitutionally, instinctively—and some of them illogically—cooperative. They have preached union from their earliest days, which were the days when not many good words were being said for it. They have had a program for union which they thought the world might reasonably be asked to accept. The world has not yet accepted it with unanimity, but Disciples of all shades of thought and all types of temperament are agreed that the union of Christians is both desirable and practicable. Perhaps the implication of the doctrine of baptism found in most of their older literature is that the unimmersed are unregenerate, and therefore presumably are not Christians,—in spite of Mr. Campbell's generous words. But the implication of their appeal for the union of Christians, which lies much closer to the heart of their motive, is that unimmersed believers are Christians; and this commits them to approval of every form of "denominational disarmament" and participation in every enterprise which manifests so much of unity as now exists and looks toward a fuller realization of the master's prayer "that they all may be one."

II.

In announcing this series of articles on the Future of the Denominations, the editor indicated four questions upon which the writers would endeavor to furnish information. It may perhaps give me a sense of assurance that this article covers the desired ground if I repeat these questions and attempt to answer them as definitely as I can. The discriminating reader can doubtless distinguish between the statements of fact and the expressions of opinion.

Is the denomination still characterized by its original genius and significance, or have its distinctive ideas and aims passed over into the common possession of the Christion community?

The original genius and animating motive of the Disciples' movement—which was, as I interpret it, the reunion of the church upon the basis of simple and essential Christianity, or, in Alexander Campbell's phrase, "to make the doors of the church as wide as the gates of heaven"—is still the central and controlling principle with a majority of Disciples. But any movement in its formative and unpopular period makes its strongest appeal to a certain type of mind, and these like-minded persons tend to develop a common type of doctrine. So, while the Disciples have been earnestly desiring to discard all "human opinions" as tests of fellowship, they have inevitably developed a set of opinions of their own which, in general, they have not recognized as human opinions but have thought of as absolute and divine truths, some of which they have made tests of fellowship, and others of which many have made tests of "soundness." The natural history of this process by which opinion acquires the sanctity of revelation, Harnack expounds and illustrates in seven volumes in his History of Dogma. I am speaking now of the attitude of the strict-constructionists, whose voices are usually loud in denominational councils. The rise of the newer biblical scholarship and the increased contact with modern educational influences have been accompanied by a large measure of increase in emphasis upon the original motive and demand for the original liberty.

It is happily true that what I have called the animating motive of the Disciples from the beginning has become in large measure the common possession of all Christians. So much is this a matter of common knowledge that those who have not known the Disciples, and perhaps some who have known them, may smile at the suggestion that this now popular idea owes something to their advocacy. This merely shows what a change has come over the spirit of American Protestantism in the last hundred years. Yesterday I worshipped in one of the larger Presbyterian churches in Chicago. On the cover of the calendar was this statement: "The gates of this church are as broad as the gates of heaven; the sole requirement for admission is an honest confession of Jesus Christ as Lord and Master." This is not the Presbyterianism of 1810, which rejected Thomas Campbell for holding that "some opinions taught in our confession of faith are not founded in the Bible." Whether the Disciples deserve much or little credit for the diminished emphasis upon conformity to creed, is of slight importance, but it is worth observing that men who love liberty and seek after the unity of all the followers of Jesus, if they find themselves in this fellowship, have reason to feel that its essential history and deepest motives justify their position.

How do the issues define themselves with respect to modern theology and the new social vision? At what peculiarly sensitive spots does modernism clash with tradition?

AUTHORITY AND SPIRIT

It has already been sufficiently indicated that there is among the Disciples the same difference of emphasis and presentation which everywhere exists between those who consider religion as essentially obedience to a revealed law of God and those who conceive of it in more flexible and less authoritarian terms; between those who define Christianity as a precise system of "facts to be believed, commands to be obeyed, and promises to be enjoyed," and those who think of it in terms of the appreciation of those spiritual values which Jesus has helped men to see and the embodiment of these values in the inter-related lives of men. It is the contrast—in Sabatier's familiar words—between a religion of authority and the religion of the spirit. When underlying principles are being thought out, as at the recent congress at Columbus, the conception of religious authority becomes one of the "peculiarly sensitive spots."

Since the traditional Protestant attitude has localized the ultimate authority in the Bible, the nature of biblical authority is a sensitive spot. Still more specifically, the questions of biblical criticism are sensitive spots whenever they happen to be raised in any definite way. The preacher or teacher who assumes or asserts the non-Mosaic authorship of the pentateuch, or that the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah was produced during the exile, or that the book of Daniel is a Jewish apocalypse of the second century before Christ, or that Jonah is a work of religious fiction, or that the author of the fourth gospel was other than the Apostle John, is not only very likely to be promptly called upon to defend his position (as it is right enough that he should be) but is still more likely to be looked upon by many as not "true to the Book" without having a chance to defend his position.

Perhaps the most sensitive spot of all just at present is the issue of "open membership"—that is, the question of admitting unimmersed Christians to membership in Disciples churches. It has become a live issue because of the assertion that some of their missionaries in foreign fields have virtually received the unimmersed into those Christian groups which, though unorganized or but informally organized, they frequently speak of as their churches. At the International Convention, held at Winona Lake last August, the action of the missionaries was approved by an overwhelming majority. This by no means indicated a general sentiment in favor of open membership, for if the general adoption of that policy by the churches had been submitted to a vote—as it cannot be without a usurpation of ecclesiastical authority which the Disciples will never permit to any convention—the majority would doubtless have been equally overwhelmingly on the other side.

OPEN MEMBERSHIP

Any discussion of the merits of the question would be out of place in this article, but perhaps it is permissible to state an impression of the state of opinion in regard to it. To call for a show of hands or a straw vote simply for or against the admission of the unimmersed, would give little useful information. The following groups and perhaps others, would have to be distinguished:

1. Those who are opposed to open membership on principle because they consider immersion essential to salvation according to the divinely revealed plan, so that an unimmersed church-member would have the same standing in the eyes of God as a person who is not a church-member at all.

2. Those who are opposed to it because "we have always stood for immersion" and because "our movement" would have nothing distinctive left if insistence upon immersion were abandoned. (This, I must say parenthetically, is a completely sectarian attitude, as well as one based upon an entire misapprehension of the genius and purpose of the movement.)

3. Those who are opposed to receiving the unimmersed because the New Testament teaches immersion, and it is ours not to reason why but to follow instructions. These differ from group one above in the fact that they do not follow out the implications of their position; they have no condemnation for Christians of other bodies; they recognize Congregational, Presbyterian and Methodist bodies as truly Christian churches; they are willing to co-operate with them in all possible ways, but they insist that the fact that the apostles did not receive the unimmersed into the church settles the matter for us for all time. These are they who say that the essential purpose of the Disciples of Christ is the restoration of primitive Christianity—as they understand it.

4. Those who are opposed not so much because they themselves have scruples as because they think that others have; because it would divide churches; because it would offend many good people; because it would provoke criticism; in some cases, perhaps, because they apprehend that it would get them into trouble and have personal consequences of an unpleasant sort. There are many in this class who consider open membership logical and ultimately inevitable, but think it the part of wisdom and Christian forbearance to make haste slowly.

5. Those who are in favor of practicing open membership in foreign fields and in those home fields where the church must serve the whole community. They would argue that where a single congregation occupies an entire field it has a duty to those in the community who cannot agree with its usual practice in regard to an ordinance, and that the members of such a church can be true to their own conception of truth and at the same time admit their unimmersed brothers to the full privileges of Christian fellowship.

6. Those who are thoroughly in favor of the open membership policy as a general practice, who say so out loud, and who advocate immediate measures in that direction whenever a congregation is willing to take the step.

STRENGTH OF GROUPS

Any statement in regard to the relative strength of these phases of opinion would be a guess rather than an estimate. It is probably true, as of statistical curves generally, that the central groups are the largest and that the numbers decrease toward both extremes. The first group is very small, and is negligible in influence. The second is considerable in number and includes those who are naturally of a sectarian mind, those whose sentimental attachment to familiar practices outweighs all other considerations, and the unthinking generally. The third is probably the largest class; it includes the intelligent conservatives and strict-constructionists and many of the most devout and useful, and many who could not in all respects be classed as conservatives. The fourth group is probably much larger than is commonly supposed. It includes many who have thought their way through to a liberal position, many who realize that their belief about baptism is itself a "human opinion," and the growing company of those who have little or no theological interest, who do not care very much about ordinances and cannot conceive that God cares very much about them; but they are all alike in wishing to avoid giving offense to their more conservative brethren or to precipitating division in the interest of unity. The fifth class would include many who are studying the concrete social problem of the church in congested city districts, in lonely country parishes, and in mission fields which have been handed over to the exclusive care of the Disciples. The sixth group is small numerically, but influential and growing.

Is the denominational apparatus adequate to the great task of present day Christianity?

No. No denominational machinery is or can be adequate to that task. It is the realization of this fact which is producing the wide-spread desire for a more effective organization of the Christian forces than any which is possible under the denominational regime. More specifically with reference to the Disciples, their "denominational apparatus" is rather notably inadequate for even their proportionate part of the great task. They have generous purposes and high hopes, but they are afraid of any organization sufficiently compact for efficiency. Up to the present time, they have preferred a doctrinaire independency to a functioning organization. A few years ago, when their general convention was re-organized on a delegate basis to make it representative of the churches, this organization was promptly scrapped at the next session and the convention reverted to its former status as a mere mass meeting. The fear that a convention of delegates would attempt to exercise authority over the faith and practice of local churches, prevents the organization of a representative democracy for the effective transaction of business.

Are the present denominational groups moving toward general coalescence, or toward further splits into still more denominations? Or is the entire denominational order moving toward collapse to make way for a distinctly different type of religious organization?

Perhaps this entire series of articles will make it possible to give a more intelligent answer to these questions. Some things are now reasonably clear. The clearest is that the present denominational alignment does not represent the grouping of Christians with reference to the most important issues of the present time. The possibility that several denominations will split along one or more of their obvious planes of cleavage, and that the fragments will join in other combinations, is a possibility worthy of careful study. Such a re-grouping on the basis of present like-mindedness rather than upon ancient issues would undoubtedly make for peace, for nowadays we do not indulge in acrimonious controversy except with those of our own respective ecclesiastical households.

DIFFERENCES AND UNITY

But this promises no permanent cure for the evils which afflict the church. Denominations have always arisen as groups of the like-minded, and they have been opinionated, self-satisfied, and unfraternal toward others in proportion as they were thoroughly homogeneous. If all of my kind of people are in my church, and if all the people in my church are my kind of people, evidently the impulse to fraternize and cooperate with the people of other churches will be greatly reduced. What Christians need to learn now is how to cooperate and fraternize with people whose opinions and practices are different from their own. We can learn this only by staying in close relations with such people. It is easy to have peace and brotherly love in a carefully selected and hand-picked group of those who hold to a single set of standardized opinions whether liberal or conservative. Do not even the publicans so? It is easy to grant liberty of belief to those who believe exactly with us, and to grant all others the liberty to get out. The seventeenth century had learned that much—except for certain state churches which tried to enforce conformity. They learned how to differ and divide and gather together the men of like opinions. We must learn how to differ and not divide.

The Disciples began their career with an insistence upon this very point. Will they divide now upon questions of opinion? That depends upon whether or not they know their own history and their own principles. A few years ago a group of ultra-conservatives split off because they considered certain forms of missionary organization unscriptural. There is always the possibility that other groups of strict-constructionists will separate themselves when they find themselves in the minority upon some question of practice or policy. But such separations are not likely to carry with them any large fraction of the body. The more liberal element has no notion of separating. The great middle-of-the-road group cannot possibly separate itself from those on either side of it. The most authoritative spokesman for this central group, the weekly paper which is as nearly official as a paper of the Disciples can be, commenting editorially upon the recent congress at Columbus, said: "The differences were all in the realm of opinion and not in the realm of faith. So far everybody is within his rights and his Christian liberty." As the differences referred to included divergent views upon the reception of the unimmersed into membership, the nature of religious authority, evolution, and other equally delicate topics, it is clear that the centerists are in no mood to make any of these topics a ground for division.

The Disciples are happily free from the limitations of an official theology, and they have no machinery by which one generation can fasten upon the next its passing conception of what constitutes orthodoxy. They have, it is true, their habits, their ways of thinking, and their forms of expression, all familiar and endeared through long use and hallowed association. But they are in a position of remarkable freedom to lay aside old error and to adopt new truth, and they have the flexibility which will enable different parts of the body to move at different rates of speed without loss of their essential unity, though not perhaps without certain internal strains and tensions. They need only remember their own favorite motto: "In faith, unity; in opinions and methods, liberty; in all things, charity."

Next week Dr. Joseph Fort Newton will present an outside view of the Disciples. Dr. Newton enjoys the distinction of being affiliated with two communions, the Universalist and the Congregational.

Dialogues of Twilight

By Arthur B. Rhinow

Charity

SPIRIT—Wait for me.

ORGANIZATION—Oh, I forgot about you. Why don't you hurry?

SPIRIT—I cannot hurry.

ORGANIZATION—I am empty without you.

SPIRIT—Then wait for me.

ORGANIZATION—But I am full of enthusiasm for progress.

SPIRIT—There is no enthusiasm without me.

ORGANIZATION—No enthusiasm? When I come, people fall in line.

SPIRIT—With organization.

ORGANIZATION—Oh, I know I need you. Then hurry.

SPIRIT—The spirit cannot be forced.

ORGANIZATION—But I have the vision. The world is in my plan.

SPIRIT—You plan for me, and yet without me.

ORGANIZATION.—Oh, hurry.

SPIRIT—If I hurry, I die.

ORGANIZATION—And—

SPIRIT—And you die.

The Unquenchable

YOUTH—Raise the shade? Will it not hurt your eyes?

AGE—No; it is getting dark. The night is coming.

YOUTH—The night is coming. Are you afraid?

AGE—Afraid of the dark? No.

YOUTH—You are old and you have lived.

AGE—I am old and I have lived.

YOUTH—Was it worth while?

AGE—Life was a striving for what one cannot get.

YOUTH—But you got much. Wealth, fame, and pretty things.

AGE—Attainment was disappointment.

YOUTH—And are you tired of striving, desiring?

AGE—I am so tired.

YOUTH—Let me straighten your pillow. How pretty your white hair is. And are you willing to drop all desires?

AGE—Yes! All but one.

YOUTH—But one? Why do your eyes glow? What one?

AGE—To live.

In the Park

MAN—See those patches in the green.

MOTHER—Yes; they are beautiful.

MAN—No, no! I mean where the bare earth shows.

MOTHER—See the children playing on them?

MAN—I see nothing but clay instead of grass.

MOTHER—I can see little feet toddling and tripping, wearing down the green. Oh, the beautiful patches!

MAN—They are so bare.

MOTHER—No, no! I can see little ones. Hundreds of them. He, too. He lies far away, a cross upon his heart and a cross upon his grave. But I can see him playing on the bare spot over there.

MAN—You are dreaming, dear.

MOTHER—The bare spots make me dream.

MAN—The unbroken green would be so fine.

MOTHER—Oh, don't, don't. Green and gold blend so well.

MAN—Green and gold?

MOTHER—Golden childhood on the green. And do you not see the lovely flowers?

MAN—On the hard clay?

MOTHER—Through the clay and far away. Crimson flowers. "A sword shall pierce thy soul."

MAN—Hush! Look at the path over there.

MOTHER—Worn by many feet.

MAN—Why did they not take the road?

Mother—They loved the green.

Man—And killed the grass.

Mother—And seamed the green with life.

Man—And—

Mother—And seamed their life with green.

In the Cell

Husband—Don't go away.

Wife—My time is almost up. You know the rules are very strict.

Husband—You will come again?

Wife—Yes.

Husband—You know you must come.

Wife—Why, dear?

Husband—You promised "for better or for worse" you know.

Wife—Did I? I never thought of that.

Husband—But you know what you promised when we were married.

Wife—I was so nervous.

Husband—Then you did not know?

Wife—I knew that it was all right.

Husband—Why?

Wife—I loved you.

Husband—But I am not the same man. I am a convict now.

Wife—What I loved is the same.

Husband—I do not understand.

Wife—That is the glory and pathos of a woman's love. The loved one does not understand.

Husband—But you will keep your promise "for better for worse"?

Wife—I do not remember the promise.

Husband—But—

Wife—But I shall keep my love.

The Woman of Samaria

(Street in Shechem (Sychar). Men gathered around the woman who has met Jesus at Jacob's well. Also Naomi, her friend.)

Woman—Is not this the Christ? He told me all things that ever I did.

Jonah—All you ever did? All? How many moons were you with him? (Laughs coarsely; other men join in the laugh, excepting Tibni.)

Tibni—How beautiful she is! So different!

Woman—(with lowered head, as though to herself)—He told me all I ever did.

Jonah—(bantering)—What pretty hair you have.

Woman—(covers her hair with her veil)—He told me all.

Naomi—Where is your water-pot?

Woman—Oh, I forgot.—He told me all.—Nay, touch me not, Jonah.

Naomi (tenderly)—What did he say?

Woman—"Thou hast had five husbands; and he whom thou now hast—"

Jonah—Go on. He told you all. By Mt. Ebal, he must have talked a long time. (Laughs coarsely; but the other men do not join in, as they see tears in the woman's eyes, which she tries hard to hide. They leave hurriedly in the direction of Jacob's well. Jonah slinks away.)

Naomi—Tell me. How can he tell you all?

Woman—His heart told my heart. Nothing was hid from him.—And—

Naomi—And?

Woman—He believed in me none the less, as only the Christ could. (Weeps bitterly in Naomi's arms).

Over There

Baby—Just to cross the street. It must be wonderful.

Fairy—Soon, very soon, my child.

Baby—Why did Mother shriek?

Fairy—The wheels, the many wheels.

Baby—But why this longing for over there?

Fairy—That is life, my dear. As long as we live we have an Over There.

Baby—Has Brother?

Fairy—He dreams of oceans and lands beyond.

Baby—And Sister?

Fairy—The great adventure is in her soul.

Baby—And Father?

Fairy—He craves for more.

Baby—And Grandma? Her life is almost done.

Fairy—She has glorious visions.

Baby—And has Mother an Over There?

Fairy—Yes, yes. Your own.

Baby—They all? And are there no wheels for them?

Fairy—Cruel and crushing wheels. But man must hope if he would live. As long as there is life there is an Over There.

Turning Pages

She—Look at this picture in the fashion plate. My brother says it looks like me.

The Lover—I think it does.

She—But I think this picture on the other page looks like me.

The Lover—So it does.

She—Foolish! How can I look like both of them? They are so different.

The Lover—I don't—

She—Isn't this a pretty frock?

The Lover—Surmounted by a sweet face.

She—Do you think so?

The Lover—Yes; it reminds me of you.

She—What do you mean? This is the third face that reminds you of me. And there is little resemblance between them. What do you mean?

The Lover—It is hard to say.

She—Your flattery is idle.

The Lover—I do not flatter. I mean it. I see you in every woman's face.

She—How can you?

The Lover—I do not know. It is a mystery.

She—I fain would know. Have you no way of telling me?

Why Did the Rail Men Strike?

THE public is little inclined to look with favor on a strike that threatens to hold up the return of prosperity. The average man says, "We all must accept a gradual return to pre-war levels in price and income, and the wage-earner must take what is coming to him along with the rest of us." Out of the general welter of prejudice induced by the so-called "open shop campaign" the average man jumps to the conclusion that labor is a poor sport when it protests cuts in wages. The deflation of the farmer was a landslide. No one was clearly responsible for it; so it was charged up to natural catastrophies, such as cyclones and earthquakes. But the deflation of labor is always a matter of definite action and there is therefore a chance to lay blame and to fight. No one has accepted deflation willingly. The landlord well deserves the title of "rent-hog," but his vice lies in his having an opportunity to keep his prices up more than in any virtue on the part of those who are unable to maintain theirs.

Labor must accept reduced wages as a matter of course. That it should be unwilling to do so makes it no exception to the rule. That laboring men should use whatever resort they have at hand to prevent large reductions is simply to do what all others do wherever opportunity affords. The human factor is about the same in all classes. In some respects labor has a better case to argue than most others. From the point of view of capital a reduction of income seldom affects bread and butter, though it may cut dividends or luxuries. But to labor it may mean a reduction of even the minimum of comforts, or bread and butter itself, to say nothing of savings or the permanent loss of such gains as have been made in standards of living.

The Railroad Men's Grievance

The recent wage cut ordered for a million and a quarter men by the Railroad Labor Board is not the original source of present disaffection. Like the sinking of the Maine it is the overt act that crystallized a series of grievances. It bulks large as a fighting point, but it is far from the sole and only issue. The cuts ordered are not large, but they are one item in a series, some of which have been made and others yet to be made. The real cause of the strike lies back of and beyond this single cut in wages.

The leaders make their protest on such points as the following: The railroads have persistently refused to obey the board's orders. They farmed out contracts to evade wage scales and up to the date of the strike not one of the twenty-three guilty of this subterfuge had obeyed the board's order of a month previous to void such action and restore the board's jurisdiction. The roads refused to establish adjustment committees as provided by law, though the board demanded that they do so. The Pennsylvania railroad, the most powerful single system in the land, set up a form of shop representation in defiance of the board's stipulations and obtained an injunction preventing the board from even censuring them for it. Orders to replace employes discharged for union activities have been wilfully ignored.

The union leaders claim not only that the roads defy the board at will, but that the three "public members" are in reality biased by the ideas of "big business" and are therefore not impartial. They think this charge is justified by the denoument in this wage order. The law specifies that wages shall be fixed with due regard to the cost of living, and the board openly confesses that this factor has been disregarded in this case, pleading that times are abnormal and that labor must accept less than is just until the roads are "back on their feet." The fact that the board admitted to the conferences such organizations as the Illinois Manufacturers Association and others which the men characterize as "notorious labor baiters," is cited as proof of this charge. The fact that it has scrapped working rules which the unions claim have been built up through years of experience is a further source of suspicion of the board's impartiality.

Is It an Outlaw Strike?

Whatever the truth is as to the above contentions of the labor leaders it was certainly a bad tactical mistake for the board to characterize the strike as "outlaw." If that word is to be used it should have been applied long ago to every road that refused to obey the board's orders. Either the board has had no power or has lacked inclination to compel the roads to obey. A true account of facts will perhaps show that lack of power more than lack of inclination is the explanation, for we may assume that the board would naturally be jealous of its authority and wise enough to plan against just such protests as labor is making. It was circumspectly explained when the law was in the making that the board's authority would be more recommendatory and arbitral than legally enforceable. Now labor asks what recourse it has other than to strike. A railroad can go serenely on farming out everything from the repairing of locomotives to scrubbing up an office, but a wage earner cannot change the contents of his next envelope.

It was bad tactics for the board to give official sanction to the term "outlaw strike" because the situation demanded salving rather than irritating. If the board has no mandatory powers, the strike could not be an outlaw strike, and if the roads have defied the board it was poor policy to withhold the use of that invidious term until it could be applied to the men. If the board's powers are only those of recommendation, the men are striking to prevent the employers from enforcing a rate they have not accepted; if it has mandatory power it should have demonstrated long ago that it was willing to wield its authority against the roads as the first offenders.

To use such a term is to lend official sanction to a slogan much loved by such labor baiters as are now represented in a certain type of employers' association (happily a disappearing quantity) and to that portion of the public who carry in their bones the age-long feeling of disdain and superiority to the hand worker. No more inane delusion has gotten currency than that which ascribes all high cost to high wages. It is about as scientific as witchcraft. Wages play their part but they are not always even the major factor.

The Wage Cut and the Cost of Living

The Cummins-Esch law provides that wages shall be based upon the cost of living, upon wages in like outside industries and upon the state of railroad business. The men contend that the cuts so far made cannot be justified by any one of these considerations. So many varying citations can be made under the second point that the argument pro and con only puzzles. On the third the men cite the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the effect that net earnings so far this year on 201 first class roads are nearly four times those for the same period last year and that the roads stand to earn the full normal income of the "three year test period" of over nine hundred million dollars. They claim the roads themselves admit this probability and that the net earnings of railroads during the past five years are the largest of any five years in their history, thanks to the government's underwritings and the granting of high rates, together with the fact that 1916 was the banner year of all railroad history. The lowering of rates, they contend, will increase business and net profits and does not therefore require a reduction of wages below the cuts already made.

But the main contention of the men is on the basis of the "cost of living" factor. Senator Cummins, the author of the law, stated recently that "the men are entitled to fair wages no matter whether the enterprise is profitable or not" and is further quoted as saying that the minimums of this cut are not such a wage. Senator Borah characterizes it as "like peonage" and Senator Simmons, a conservative southerner, declares "no man can support a family on such wages." In giving the board the men's answer their president, Ben Jewell, wrote, "We have repeatedly said we could not accept a decision based upon the theory that labor is a commodity." Wages therefore cannot be adjusted on the basis of a labor market or with respect to capital's profits without reference to the cost of living. He states further that the defense made for the cut by comparison with the wages of 1917 is disingenuous and unfair, as the cost of living had mounted far more rapidly than had railroad wages between 1914 and 1917.

The men claim that the highest wage allowed under this scale would be $1,724 and the lowest $563. As a matter of fact, they say, few men in either class will earn so much, for those figures assume that a man will work every day without loss of an hour for illness, vacation, accident or being laid off. These factors average at least 7 per cent and when they are taken into account the cut produces a minimum average of not more than $523 for 100,000 men and of $800 for a quarter of a million. Of course no intelligent man will argue that a family can be supported under an American standard on such wages. The leaders point to the fact that Chicago allows a larger sum for food for its jail birds than this lowest wage will allow to honest workingmen.

What Is a Cost of Living Wage?

The railroad wage-earners contend that fifty cents per hour is the lowest possible base for a decent cost of living wage. This would give an average annual income of about $1,150, counting out an average of 7 per cent for loss of time from various causes. This is a very modest contention. The Industrial Conference Board, an employers association, puts it at about $1,400. The Department of Labor makes approximately the same estimate. With the single exception of the higher paid classes of clerks, every class falling under the board's order falls below this line, and a half million fall below the minimum named by labor as a bare subsistence. The better paid classes fall considerably below the purchasing power of their 1914 wage. The comparison for clerks works out a little under 88 per cent and that of signalmen 83 per cent. Other skilled classes run about the same, while unskilled labor fares a little better. In the latter case it is not a question of comparison with any previous period but a sheer problem of what it costs to live. Their wage was not a living wage either in 1914 or now. The depressed classes in labor cannot be blamed for fighting to keep wages up to a decent standard even in a time of deflation.

To rescue the matter from thoughtless generalizations let us detail some of the problems of the housewife under the wage scale here offered the depressed classes. Striking an average from budgets made up by two large employing concerns, the Industrial Conference Board and the Department of Labor, we find that the allowance for food is 43 per cent of the expenditure, for shelter 13 per cent, for fuel and light 8 per cent, with 17 per cent left for furniture, illness, recreation, education, benevolence, insurance and all those sundry items which in the average middle class household make up that margin that we call comfort and the refinements of life. The total for these items, out of the $800 income, would be $136 for the whole family. Of course there is nothing for saving, and an American standard is not a mere physical living—it is a saving wage, plus education for the children, decency for the home and the same right in the wage-earner's family as in yours and mine to have the living won by the logical bread-winner. For shelter the allowance is $8.50 per month—less than one-fourth the current rental of the most modest dwelling in a small city. For clothing it is $152. Let your wife figure that out, and try to defend it for even a family of three, let alone the average of between four and five. Then consider the case of the 100,000 who will earn under $600.

The net result of this analysis is that more than one-half of these men would have to work for less than a decent physical living under this cut. The other half would have less actual purchasing power than in pre-war days. And the cut in wages is not the whole story. The wage budgets of the roads for the past six months were $691,000,000 less than for the corresponding period of last year; punitive over-time charges were scrapped by the Labor Board; the "secondary wage," that is, the charge over and above a basic cost-of-living estimate allowed to skill, was arbitrarily lowered; working rules were changed to the detriment of wages and thousands of men were discharged. Some of this was doubtless needed rectification, but it all enters into the contention of labor that further cuts are not required by any emergency in railroad finances, and that in any event no cuts should be made below a decent American standard of living. The ethical question involved in the whole issue is inherent in the contention for a human minimum based upon the actual cost of living for an American family.

Cleansed by Suffering*

GOLD is refined by fire. Israel came back from exile purged of idolatry forever. One of America's most eloquent preachers never put his heart into his sermons until keen suffering had mellowed his soul. Pain works miracles in our hard human nature.

> Pain's furnace heat within me quivers,
>   God's breath upon the flame doth blow,
> And every part within me shivers
>   And quivers in the fiery glow.
> Yet say I, trusting: "As God will."
> And in his hottest fires, hold still.
> He kindles for my profit purely
>   Affliction's glowing, fiery brand;
> And every blow he deals me, surely,
>   Is given by a master hand.
> So say I, hoping: "As God will."
> And in his hottest fires, hold still.
> Why should I murmur for thus the sorrow
>   Only longer-lived would be.
> Peace may come—yes, will—tomorrow
>   When God has done his work in me.
> So say I, praying: "As God will."
> And in his hottest fires, hold still.'

This is a poem which I heard Robert Speer quote, in Northfield, Mass., when I was a junior in college. I did not then appreciate much beyond the music of his voice and the beauty of the words, but now it has been woven into the very fiber of my life. Suffering has its mission. Suffering is God's refining fire. Jesus was made perfect through suffering; we seek perfection by way of cultured ease. But we need to be heated white in the furnace of pain, to be dipped, hissing hot, into baths of tears, and to be battered by the shocks of doom to shape and use. Personality needs the mellowing experience of pain, disappointment and suffering. Speaking of the Prince of Wales the writer of "The Glass of Fashion" says: "May he not mistake popularity for influence." That is a deep saying. People only have influence who have had experience in broad human ways, adversity as well as prosperity. Of a certain priest it is said: "He is too sleek, too fat, too comfortable, he cannot sympathize with me in my pain for he has never known it."

It seems a cruel process to send the steel plow ripping through the velvety meadow-land, but in August comes the golden harvest, the flowing sea of wheat. It seems a pity to blast the marble from its mountain home, but the heroic statue in the public square is the result. Suffering has its mission. The London fire stopped the plague and started the new city. The breaking of home ties threw the boy upon his own and made a man of him. The loss of his inherited fortune caused the idle youth to make the most of himself. Heaven is dearer because some of our friends are already there. Our present affliction works out our eternal salvation. Many a hard man, ruthless, driving, grasping, has, in a long sickness, found the secret of life. He has gone back to his office with unsteady step, with pale face, but with a kind heart and a new program. "Suffering," says Dr. S. M. Cook, gives a sweeter tone to the voice, a gentler touch to the hand and to the heart a greater capacity for loving."

* Lesson for July 30. "The First Return from Exile." Jeremiah, 29-10; Ezra, 1:1-11.

A Hindu poet sings: "Crying came I into this world while all about me smiled; may I so live that I may leave this world smiling while all about me weep." The best lumber is seasoned, the best gold is refined, the best steel comes out of the super-heated furnace, the best man is tempered by joy and sorrow, success and disappointment, strength and pain. Only by knowing both success and defeat, by experiencing both sufficiency and dependence, the glow of health and the hour of pain, can enriched, mellowed, sympathizing personality be evolved. "Then welcome each rebuff, that turns earth's smoothness rough, that bids nor sit nor stand but go." "All things work together for good to them that love God."

British Table Talk

London, July 1, 1922.

THE joint report on the reunion of the churches issued by free church and Anglican leaders, is being fiercely attacked from both sides. A strong Anglican party, for which The Church Times speaks, considers that its leaders have been trifling with realities, ignoring differences which are vital, and saying, "Peace! peace!" where there is no peace. Many free churchmen, of whom Dr. T. Reaveley Glover is spokesman, make much the same charges from their side; they thing that the free church leaders in their desire for peace have consented to ambiguous formulas which may be read in different senses, and in no way advance the cause either of truth or of lasting peace. Some of the strongest critics hail from the north of England. My own friends, who criticize the document, do not agree with its modified acceptance of a constitutional episcopacy, but they are much more concerned, lest our people should be committed to a creedal basis; they have no desire to accept the Nicene creed as in any way a test of Christian thinking. It looks as if the men who signed the report will have to face a severe attack; and at present there are few signs that the Lambeth proposals will be generally welcomed. None the less, these critics do less than justice to both groups of signatories. The Anglicans have moved, and give many evidences of their desire for a reunited church in which there will be room for variety of method and expression; they have a deep desire to end the evils of division, which they recognize more clearly than some of us do. And on the other hand, it seems clear that many free churchmen have no belief in any united church, and little desire for it; their objection would be equally emphatic against any proposals which mean corporate reunion. They consider questions of church order and creedal expression quite secondary; and they sometimes forget that differences in such secondary matters hinder their work in the primary matters. It is of course the chief task of the church to deal with the first things; but no one in the ranks can have any doubt that the bitter divisions within the church of Christ do make all its members less powerful in their witness to the great concerns.

Schools and Speech-Days

It is the season of the year when parents and their children are exposed to exhortations from distinguished men. Few can be more fortunate than some of us who heard Sir Peter Rylands, one of our leaders in industry, speaking at Chigwell, the school at which William Penn was a scholar nigh upon 300 years ago. Sir Peter was emphatic upon the work which industry demands of schools. More and more in the big businesses they sought for men whose minds had been trained in such a way that they could tackle the details of any business swiftly and intelligently. They did not want vocational training; a public school boy or graduate, who had been trained to think, could easily learn the ways of a business; and it was more important that he should bring freshness of mind, and individuality, than a smattering of technical knowledge. . . . One of our foremost schoolmasters who built up Cundle, his school, into a great institution, recently died very suddenly after delivering a lecture in London. Mr. H. G. Wells, who was presiding at the lecture, spoke of Sanderson of Cundle as the greatest of our schoolmasters. Others had introduced science into their schools, but this man cared more for the scientific spirit, which may be introduced into all subjects. He was singularly free from tradition. "Find out what a boy can do, let him do it, and he will do it with enthusiasm and joy." He won through in the end, but he had a severe struggle.

"But undoubtedly his greatest feat, though hardest to assess, lies in the spiritual sphere. Beginning probably with the idea that engineering was good for certain types of boys, and extending the ideals of workshop training to the other subjects in the curriculum as the best means of fostering the creative spirit and of teaching boys to make a practical use of the tools of knowledge, he had reached the conviction that the boy and not the subject was the center of instruction, for 'though standard suits are good, those made to measure are better'; and this led him on to the generalization that the creative spirit he sought to encourage existed in some form in every boy. 'In the rudest flint there lies a diverse spark,' and 'the greatest waste in the world is the waste and decay of capacities, bodily, mental, and spiritual.'"

An Education Week

West Ham is a poor district in the east of London. It has within it a large population, of which 80,000 last week were receiving out-door relief. Yet this district has organized an "education week," the plans of which reveal an eager enthusiasm for education, and a comprehensive vision of what it means. The program includes a Pageant of West Ham, and all manner of celebrations. On Sunday leading educationalists such as Mr. Lewis Paton, of Manchester, are preaching; on Saturday the players from Mansfield House—a settlement in Canning Town—are giving "Major Barbara." There are also lectures and expositions of educational methods and ideals. When there is such a fine enthusiasm it is always necessary to look for the man; and though he would disown the honor, every one in Canning Town knows that the former warden of Mansfield House, Mr. Hughes, is the leading spirit in this work; he has given many years to the service of education in this region, where poverty always shadows human life, and he has not toiled in vain. In connection with the "week," poems were invited from residents in Canning Town; they were submitted to Mr. Quiller Couch, the Cambridge professor of English literature; he thought so highly of them that he advised the committee to publish a volume. I have not seen it yet; but I have read the poem, crowned with laurel by Q., and it is magnificent. I will secure a copy and send it. This district of London is full of interest for members of my college. There our men began Mansfield House about 30 years ago in the days when settlements were new; Percy Alden and Will Reason were our pioneers, and we used to pay visits to them at the settlement in our youth, and learned our first lessons there in social service.

A Story With a Moral

A young man was seated in a railway carriage. The carriage was very full and a number of ladies were standing. The young man had his eyes closed. His companion thereupon said to him: "Why are your eyes shut? Are you sleepy?"

"No," he answered, "I keep them shut because I cannot bear to see these ladies standing."

"The Ass of Heaven"

In that most beautiful journel, "The Country Heart," there is a poem by Katharine Tynan, from which it is a pleasure to transcribe some verses:

"If I were like St. Francis,
As no such thing am I,
I'd give the folk of Heaven
A name to know me by:
The Ass of Christ, my Master
In lands beyond the sky.

"If I could bear as meekly,
Stumbling uphill, my load
As he, my little brother,
Inured to curse and rod,
'Twould not so ill beseem me
To be the Ass of God.

"But I am proud and froward,
And fain of my own will,
Fretting against my burdens,
Aware of every hill;
Not like the little brother,
Patient, forgiving ill."

EDWARD SHILLITO.

CORRESPONDENCE

A Good Word for the Movies

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Recent reports from annual denominational gatherings indicate a temper, on the part of several such bodies, of scathing criticism and vociferous condemnation of the movies. As a minister of one of these bodies may I be allowed to register at least a mild yet emphatic dissent from such sweeping judgment. In the first place because it is obviously one-sided. Will Hays is denounced by one of his church leaders as a modern Esau—entirely overlooking the fact that in the Arbuckle case Mr. Hays has gone farther than the law-courts, which not only acquitted Roscoe but also declared him a much-abused man! Does Mr. Hays deserve no commendation for this? Or are our ecclesiastical censors only able to note the omissions.

And what is true of Mr. Hays is equally true of the character of screen plays. As one who studies a play or two each week in some motion picture theater, the writer is entirely aware that much of the tawdry and sensual is presented, yet equally aware of many screen plays that are not only clean but really inspiring. Vera Gordon's efforts are notable in this way, while Barthelmes, Ray, Douglas Fairbanks and wife, with a number of others represent what is clean and instructive. The play by William Hart, representing a Protestant missionary as robbing a stage to obtain money to build a church, when seen, as a whole, is not nearly so insulting to a clergyman as Dr. Briglieb hysterically represents it.

In any case why not emphasize and commend those pictures which are worthwhile and those actors whose lives are just as decent as those of church leaders, rather than merely howl over the indecent ones? Why not give the motion picture industry, including Mr. Hays, a square deal?

As a user of motion pictures in my Sunday night services I have found the finest courtesy and cooperation among the motion picture distributors, and have been told frequently that it is their desire to give the best when the moral people rally to their support. This, the church people as a whole, have not done, allowing good pictures to die for lack of patronage; yet they flock to see such a mess of frothy sensuality as "Foolish Wives." Finally, as to insulting Protestants in motion pictures, but treating with respect Catholics and Jews—a point emphasized by Dr. Briglieb at Des Moines—it is pertinent to remark that when Protestant churches restrain their ministers from being mere sensationalists, high class vaudeville performers, a la Billy Sunday, performing marriage ceremonies in bathing attire or at some public show, as a show, etc., etc., then there may be a call for such a complaint. Meantime let us watch our own step! In any case if the ridicule be undeserved it will redound to the hurt of those making it. If it be deserved, why not profit thereby?

Put the Child in the Constitution!

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In your editorial comment, June 15, regarding the adverse decision of the supreme court on the child labor law, you say that in the fight against child labor "the church has a powerful ally in the union labor movement." Since the words were written the American Federation of Labor has taken action proposing "an amendment to the constitution prohibiting the labor of children under the age of sixteen in any mine, factory, workshop or other industrial or mercantile establishment" and empowering congress to enforce the provisions of the proposed amendment by appropriate legislation.

This action should be promptly ratified by the churches. The issue thus presented is definite and unmistakable. Let the constitution itself stand as an impregnable wall of defense against all who would rob children of their God-given rights. Let state legislation continue, but in the end the people as a whole must decide the question. Once raise the slogan, "Put the Child in the Constitution," and an alignment of forces, for and against, becomes inevitable. The fight will be in the open. It may prove to be a long one, but judging from recent victories on similar lines we cannot doubt what the outcome will be: justice and right will win and childhood will come triumphantly into its own.

Quakers Ask Other Denominations to Help

For the first time in religious history, the Quakers have asked men and women of other denominations to join them in their protest against war. The religious society of Friends, embracing Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland, decided at their yearly meeting to send an appeal throughout the world. The Church Peace Union of New York has taken cognizance of this action and has mailed to the clergy in various parts of the United States the text of the Quaker resolution. Among other things the Friends say: "As Christians we are striving for a warless world. We are firmly convinced that this can be achieved only by refusing to participate in war, simply and sufficiently because war by its very nature is at variance with the message, the spirit and the life and death of Jesus Christ. We unite in supporting treaties of arbitration and conciliation, limitation and reduction of armaments, international courts of justice, a league or association of nations for the preservation of peace. This is well: it is a great achievement for statesmen to accomplish these things; but it is not sufficient for the Christian church. The fundamental peace principle of Christianity demands the utter rejection of war, unequivocally and without compromise. With this principle in its charter the Christian church can always utter a clear and unmistakable verdict on any specific measure of statesmanship that is proposed; it will not be misled or coerced by argument or by force, into participating in any kind or degree of preparation for war, or into lending the sanction of Christianity to the waging of any war whatsoever." The churches over the land are asked to read the letter from the Friends at their prayer service and make it the subject of discussion among the people.

Looking Toward Merger of Two Denominations

The Western Unitarian Association in its recent meeting in Chicago considered the question of the relation of Unitarian and Universalist churches in the western territory and voted that the merging of these churches in local communities would be a good thing. The philanthropic funds would in such case be divided between the two denominations. The consolidated church would have membership in both bodies, as would the minister. The church would somewhere in its title carry the words, "Universalist-Unitarian." A fellowship dinner was held in connection with the conference at which the hope was expressed that the two denominations might be merged. Several independent churches were received into the Unitarian fellowship at the meeting of the conference.

Disciples Missionaries Want a Tibetan Typewriter

Who has a typewriter that will write Tibetan? The Disciples missionaries in the land of Tibet have to write the Sunday school lessons out laboriously by long hand for the use of the mission. The Tibetan character has never been used by any typewriting concern. It is stated, however, that the Hammond Typewriter Company will reproduce the character, but it will require several hundred dollars to do it. The missionaries are now seeking the funds to make this achievement possible.

Winona Lake Assembly Opens Its Sessions

Winona Lake Summer Assembly has opened its sessions under the leadership of Rev. George W. Taft, president of the Northern Baptist Theological Seminary. A number of eminent Chicago ministers are on the program this year, inculding Dr. W. R. Wedderspoon, pastor of St. James Methodist church. The themes discussed include the Bible, missions, religious education, denominational programs, the devotional life, rural work and pastoral problems. Last year the attendance included eighty ministers and 1300 registered Christian workers.

Life of Missionary Leader Now Off the Press

"The Life of Archibald McLean," by W. R. Warren is now off the press and will be distributed to the advance subscribers before the Disciples convention at Winona Lake in August. A. McLean was one of the most widely known Disciples of this generation, and his death two years ago removed from the leadership of foreign missions one of the most devoted champions of that cause in the American church. The book will be distributed from the offices of the United Christian Missionary Society in St. Louis.

More About Buddha Than About Jesus

An evangelical revival is having some vogue in the ranks of the Unitarians. Rev. Joseph H. Crooker in a recent issue of the denominational journal declares

Bishops Defend Dry Law

THE following statement was unanimously adopted at the recent meeting of the board of bishops of the Methodist Episcopal church: "The bishops of the Methodist Episcopal church have noted the present discussion of the Volstead act and the eighteenth amendment to our constitution. Such discussion was to be expected. Ingenuity would be exhausted to discover or invent reasons for the repeal of the laws. Allowing that all the results anticipated have not been realized, that fact lies not against the law but against those who have failed in its enforcement and against those who have encouraged the betrayal of administrative trust. When all has been said, the accomplishment in the writing of these particular laws makes the greatest chapter in America's story of moral reform. It has attracted the attention of the world. It has given to our industrial life an advantage recognized by economists everywhere.

"The relation of the drink traffic to crime has long been familiar. We need to see that the disrespectful treatment of prohibitory laws is not a mere academic impropriety. The great objectives of civilization can not be gained where lawlessness goes unpunished and unrebuked. Mob violence is today a menace which demands most careful thought and wisest treatment. The ability to suppress or prevent disorder which jeopardizes the right of property and life is one of the ultimate tests of civilization. Obedience to law is not an elective to be rendered or refused on the basis of individual or group choice. This we believe. But it is inconsistent to inveigh against the spirit of lawlessness on other fields if in our attitude toward the prohibitory enactment we encourage contempt of law. Those who make public opinion must be held accountable for the total result when inconsiderate criticism of laws induces insult to laws. The press of this country must be made to see its inescapable responsibility if its persistent caricature of so-called temperance laws lead the immature to believe that law itself belongs really and only in the comic supplement.

"Where present legislation seems inadequate let it be perfected. Where the law is ineffectual, find the cause and as quickly as may be, remedy it. Let us insist upon it that those who are sworn to uphold the constitution deal with occasion not as propagandists of personal judgment but as defenders of the law.

"Let us choose for office those only who have by word or act established their right of recognition as the friends of prohibitory reform. And saying this, we would record appreciation of the help given to this cause by the President of the United States and by the chief justice; and we would pay tribute to those in the house of representatives and in the senate of the United States and to those in other places of public trust, who have taken and held their place on the side of national morality.

"For the sake of the nation and the world, in the interest of industrial prosperity as of peace and order, for the promotion of all the ends of education and religion we accept for ourselves and urge upon all our people the solemn obligation to guard sacredly the results already gained and to complete the work upon which so many lovers of mankind have wrought, anticipating with confidence the day when despite the cupidity of some and the treasonable intrigue of others the life of the nation shall be lifted to the level of its laws."

for a drive in the denomination that shall not be centered on money, but on the pulpit. He makes the following indictment of the ministers of that communion which will not arouse much dissent in evangelical circles. "Some of the things told me about able Unitarian ministers by their friendly parishioners have seemed to me very unfortunate. For instance: an intelligent young man reported that his pastor referred more frequently to Daniel Webster than to Dr. Channing, that he quoted Shakespeare oftener than the Bible, and that he told his congregation more about Buddha than about Jesus."

Campmeeting Undergoes a Transformation

The Methodists still have campmeetings, but these are undergoing a great transformation. This is well illustrated by the Des Plaines campmeeting, near Chicago. The professional evangelist has well-nigh disappeared. The revivalism of the past is only a memory of the old timers. The evening addresses this year are given by Prof. Soper of Northwestern University, specialist in comparative religion. Religious education is one of the interests greatly stressed. The campmeeting is thus evolving from the old-time mourner's bench to a modern school of church methods. These radical changes have resulted in a much increased efficiency in the local churches. Methodist leadership sees that Methodism must have light as well as heat in order to carry on.

Catholics Would Rewrite American History

A reinterpretation of American history from the standpoint of religious prejudice is one of the latest phenomena in the educational world. The Knights of Columbus have formed the Columbus Historical Commission which will produce text-books for Catholic schools. As most of the members of the commission are Irish, these text-books will be made to serve the interests of the anti-British element in our population. In a recent book, "A Hidden Phase of American History," by O'Brien, large claims are made for the part played in American history by Irish Catholics in America.

Southern Baptists Will Build Great Hospital in New Orleans

A site has been donated to the southern Baptists on which a two million dollar hospital will be erected in the city of New Orleans. The undertaking of philanthropic phases of Christian service is one of the rather recent developments in this denomination.

Methodist Program in Italy Draws Continued Opposition

In 1914 the Methodists got their first foothold on the top of Monte Mario in Rome. They now own a total of forty-six acres, and propose to erect a college upon this eminence. The Catholic press both in Italy and America has been turning its guns on this enterprise and it is called an "artistic desecration." Owing to the fact that the vatican is not on good terms with the government in Italy, it seems likely that the protest will be futile. The large gifts made to the Methodist cause in recent years makes it possible for them to make large extensions of their denomination in various parts of Europe where the Methodist banner was never before unfurled.

Methodist Missionaries in India Want No Controversy

The premillennialist movement has wrought sad havoc on many mission fields, disturbing the beautiful fellowship that used to exist there. The Methodist missionaries in North India in their annual meeting recently protested against the millennial controversies, insisting that the church is large enough to include men of all views on this subject. The premillennialist faction has been insisting upon the recall of missionaries who would not take the second coming passages of the scriptures literally. These were accused of "not believing the Bible."

Electric Lights in Nazareth

The Christian consciousness gets a bit of a shock out of all this talk of the modernization of Palestine. Under the Turk all things continued as in the days of the fathers, including the robbers on the way to Jericho. But under British rule there is a definite plan for utilizing the water power of the river Jordan, and lighting the streets of Bethlehem, Nazareth and Jerusalem with electric lights. One does not object to the removal of sundry odors from the streets of the holy cities of Palestine, but electric lights seem to be a distortion of the picture. It is but a short way until tractors, steel plows and even factories will change the whole face of the landscape. The man who wants to see the Palestine our Savior saw can hardly have his desire satisfied.

Union of United Brethren and Southern Methodists Makes Progress

The suggestion at the quadrennial conference of the southern Methodists of the union of that body with the United Brethren has been taken seriously in both churches. Arrangements are being made for a meeting of the unity commissions of the two denominations. Meanwhile the subject of union of northern and southern Methodisms is a live one, and was up for discussion by the southern Methodists.

Minister Addresses Two Evening Audiences

The owner of a vacant lot across the street from Linwood Boulevard Christian church recently tendered the use of this property rent free for open-air religious services. Dr. Burris A. Jenkins at once took advantage of this opportunity and he has large assemblages. On a recent evening he also addressed a union service in First Baptist church.

Bishop Opposes the Ku Klux Klan

The Ku Klux Klan is seeking respectability in many communities in the southland by visiting churches, and handing ministers significant purses of money. This is often done as a reward for a sermon "against Romanism." It is stated on good authority that many ministers in the south have joined the organization. Bishop W. N. Ainsworth

City Temple Minister Returns Home

DR. FREDERICK W. NORWOOD left New York on July 8 to return to his duties as pastor of the London City Temple with a record of sixty-seven public addresses in this country in as many days. He arrived here May 3, coming as the guest of the commission on interchange of speakers and preachers of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches, and traveled extensively, speaking in cities as far apart as Boston, Detroit and Durham, North Carolina. During the first six Sundays of his visit he preached in New York at the Broadway Tabernacle (Congregational), exchanging pulpits with Dr. Charles E. Jefferson. He also addressed gatherings attended by more than one thousand clergymen, delivered several commencement addresses at colleges and schools, lectured before university and divinity students and spoke at public dinners and luncheons before both lay and clerical audiences.

Dr. Norwood was born and bred in Australia, and he brought to his audiences in America an interpretation of the British people and empire from a colonial viewpoint. The purpose of most of his addresses was to create a better understanding among the English speaking countries. It has been reported that Dr. Norwood, during his stay, received calls from two of the largest Protestant churches in this country, both of which he felt obliged to decline. He also received invitations to return next year and preach during part of the summer at the Broadway Tabernacle and the Fifth Avenue Baptist church in New York.

Before sailing Dr. Norwood expressed his appreciation of the warm welcome he had received in America. He was particularly pleased, he said, with his treatment by the press. "I had heard much on the other side," he said, "of the sensationalism of the American press, and of the irreverence and irresponsibility of your reporters. In this respect I was agreeably disappointed. Your newsgatherers showed remarkable skill in reporting the parts of my addresses I was most anxious to see in the papers, and in reproducing them with accuracy and understanding. They helped me greatly in spreading the message I tried to bring." Among the happy occasions of Dr. Norwood's visit was one in which the editor of The Christian Century had the pleasure of being associated with him—the June commencement at Oberlin College when both received the degree of Doctor of Divinity.

of the southern Methodist Episcopal church has the following to say about the organization: "We have indeed fallen upon days of degeneracy if the Christian ministry has allied itself with the Ku Klux Klan and debased the pulpit by a defense of its methods."

Presbyterians Send Message to Japan

The General Assembly directed that a message of good-will should be sent to the church of Christ in Japan. This was recently formulated and placed in the hands of Dr. Masahisa Uemura. It was addressed to Rev. Makoto Koyabashi, stated clerk of the church of Christ in Japan. Among other significant utterances in the document was the following: "We believe with you in the vital relation of Japan to the Christian movement in the Far East and in the world. No more significant event has occurred in modern times, few more significant events in all history, than the emergence of your country from the isolation of many centuries into the noonday blaze of world prominence. The remarkable energy and skill with which the Japanese are adapting themselves to the wider demands of the new era demonstrate that they are a people of large capacity. Justly was Japan recognized at the peace conference in Paris as one of the five major powers of the world, an equal member of the family of great nations. It has been said that "Japan is leading the orient; but whither?" We in America see in the Christians of Japan men who are striving, under a solemn sense of responsibility, to have their country lead with "clean hands and a pure heart" toward high levels of national character and altruistic service."

Church Unveils a Picture

Pictures are actually coming back into the Protestant church for the first time since the iconoclasts of Martin Luther's day put them out. While the stained glass window has been with us for many years, with its representation of Bible scenes, it is not common to find a painting in a Protestant church. Recently in University Church of Christ in Buffalo a painting of Christ Teaching the Multitude was unveiled. It was the gift of a business man not a member of the church. The Christ figure in the painting is life size.

Priest Makes An Address in Methodist Sanctuary

Catholics and Protestants have but little fellowship in a religious way, and for that reason the breaking down in some measure of the bigotry that separates them is a real news event. Recently a community meeting was held in the community hall of Jackson Heights Methodist Episcopal church, New York. At this meeting Rev. Ward G. Meehan, rector of St. Joan d'Arc Roman Catholic church, made an address, as well as Rev. Fred G. Corson, pastor of the Methodist church. By agreement with the Protestant leaders of New York this section of the city is to have only one Protestant church and this a Methodist church organized on community lines to receive people of the various denominations. This Methodist church is building an edifice at a cost of $150,000.

Reserve Corps of Chaplains Maintained

The United States now has a reserve corps of chaplains of six hundred men. This organization will be kept in constant touch with the churches through a board of administration which includes Bishop Brent, Dr. Charles S. Macfarland and representatives of the Roman Catholic and Hebrew reserve chaplains. A number of these reserve chaplains will serve in camp this summer. The whole force of chaplains, both active and reserve corps, are now organized under the chief of chaplains, a reform that has come only since the world war.

Geneva Church Protests Futile Conference

The Genoa conference was a futile thing in the eyes of the Protestant church of Switzerland. Recently this church in which John Calvin was once a member sent a communication of the Protestant churches of the world which voices a significant protest. This communication contains the following paragraph: "The Genoa conference offers a spectacle which throws into the clearest relief the moral confusion with which the entire world is at present afflicted. At the conference, transactions are taking place which are disturbing and disconcerting to our sense of right, and a spirit of commercialism and of sordid materialism is prevalent. Persons intriguing for favors display self-interested obsequiousness and hypocritical politeness towards those whose crimes they repudiate; the predominating idea is to secure a portion of the spoils of others. Thus this conference which was originally convened for an excellent object and is attended by eminent men, runs the risk of ending in scandal and impotence."

Watch-dogs of Orthodoxy in Methodist Conference

The Pacific Christian Advocate has a story of "The Faith of Our Fathers League" in the New Jersey conference, trying this year to question ministers entering the conference in full connection. Dr. John Handley objected strenuously to any examination of ministers at the hands of self-appointed committees and Bishop Berry said it was a gross impropriety for that committee to draw up a creedal statement and to attempt to coerce men to sign it. Toward the end of the conference Dr. Harold Paul Sloan, leader of the conservative element, presented a resolution originally drawn up by the liberal party some days previous; this resolution expressed entire confidence in the loyalty of the board of bishops to the doctrinal standards of the Methodist Episcopal church."

A Dictionary of Religion and Ethics

Edited by SHAILER MATHEWS and GERALD BIRNEY SMITH, of the University of Chicago, with the co-operation of a large number of specialists.

All words of importance in the field of religion and ethics are defined. The most important of them are discussed at length. A system of cross references unifies the entire work. The volume is intended primarily for ministers, Sunday School teachers, and general readers who are interested in religion, not as technical students, but as those who wish to acquire accurate and compact information of the latest developments of study in the field. It will be an especially useful reference book for public and Sunday School libraries.

The Origin of Paul's Religion

The James Sprunt Lectures Delivered at Union Theological Seminary in Virginia.

By PROF. J. GRESHAM MACHEN,
Princeton Theological Seminary.

Professor Machen examines with care the various current theories. His conclusion is that the whole of Paulinism is derived from Jesus and from the supernatural Jesus of the New Testament.

tistics showing how easy divorce has become in certain western cities. San Francisco has half as many divorces as marriages; Portland one divorce for every two and a quarter marriages; Seattle one divorce for two and one-fifth marriages. The secretary insists that run-away marriages and the marriages that are performed in wedding parlors are the ones which most largely result in divorce.

Fellowship of the Kingdom Grows in England

The Fellowship of the Kingdom is a new organization in British life which has five years of history. It has sprung up among the Wesleyan Methodists and was originally promoted by young ministers. It has grown until it now includes in its ranks large numbers of ministers of all ages. The gospel as applied to modern life is preached, and behind the social gospel these men put a genuine evangelistic urge. Fellowship in this new preaching passion is the distinctive note of the organization, for it is by fellowship that the fires on the heart altars are kept alight.

Baseball More Interesting Than Second Coming

The Baptist state convention of Michigan this year was a pretty warm affair, coming as it did prior to the national convention. The discussion on fundamentalism and the second coming was all-engrossing until a wireless outfit began to issue the baseball scores. Then the dominies gathered around the instrument, forgot their controversies and cheered the score which favored Detroit. Let this story be told in all places where people still deny that preachers are human.

Roger W. Babson Tells Why He Goes to Church

Roger W. Babson continues to devote his unusual talents to the cause of the churches, and he has recently issued a sermonette called "Why I Go to Church." This was appreciated so highly that it was printed in display in the Milwaukee papers during the recent sessions of the advertising convention in that city. Among the statements made by Mr. Babson which arrest attention are the following: "The need of the hour is not more factories or materials, not more railroads or steamships, not more armies or more navies, but rather more education based on the teachings of Jesus. The prosperity of our country depends on the motives and purposes of the people. These motives and purposes are directed only in the right course through religion. In spite of their imperfections, this is why I believe in our churches, and why I am a great optimist on their future. We stand at the crossroads. We must choose between God and mammon. Materialism is undermining our civilization as it has undermined other civilizations. Unless we heed the warning in time and get back to the real fundamentals, we must fall even as the civilizations of Egypt, Greece and Rome fell—and for the same reason. Statistics of every nation indicate that true religion is the power necessary for the development of its resources, and for its successful continuation. The challenge goes out to every man to support his church, to take an active part in the religious life of his community, to live according to the simple principles upon which this, the greatest country in the world, was founded three hundred years ago."

Preacher Heads a Political Movement

Preachers were once supposed to live in a reclusive fashion, but in these latter days we find them engaged in all sorts of public enterprises. The head of the "Ford-for-President Club" is a Methodist preacher. Rev. William Dawe of Dearborn Methodist church, Detroit, has been very active lately in the carrying on of his club which has gained considerable recognition in the press of the country. Dr. Dawe says: "Some great American will find it his task to lead this nation out of its troubles and I believe that man is Henry Ford."

Methodist Causes Are Remembered in Will

Mrs. G. F. Swift of Chicago died recently and in her will a number of Methodist causes were generously remembered. She belonged to the family that is so well known in the packing business. Among her bequests are the following: $100,000 to the College of Engi-

NEW BOOKS BY AUTHORITATIVE WRITERS

THE MIND IN THE MAKING

By JAMES HARVEY ROBINSON

James Harvey Robinson has done for the mind of man what H. G. Wells did for the history of the world. "The Mind in the Making" is a brief, vividly written outline of the mental experence, heredity, and possibilities of the human race. Suppose you were sitting with your head bent on your knees and your arms clasped around them in a box just large enough to hold you in this position. Suppose it was in your power to make the walls of that box slide back, so that you could stand upright and walk about? The mind of man, if Mr. Robinson is to be believed, is cramped into such a box, and the sides of the box are his own fears, hereditary instincts and inhibitions, irrational beliefs handed down to him by savage ancestors and intense, egotistic hatred of criticism. To read such books as "The Mind in the Making," and follow the lines of thought they suggest, is to feel the walls expand. ($2.50)

PREACHING IN LONDON

By JOSEPH FORT NEWTON

Dr. Newton was known as "A Preacher-Ambassador" when minister at the historic City Temple, London. A noted editor has spoken of him as "an interpreter of England and America to each other." He was never more happily such an "interpreter" than in the pages of this volume, of which he says, by way of introduction: "The City Temple ministry was undertaken as a kind of unofficial ambassadorship of goodwill from the churches of America to the churches of England, and as an adventure in Anglo-American friendship. It was a great privilege to stand at the crossroads of the centuries at such a time, a teacher of Christian faith and an interpreter of the spirit and genius of our country to the motherland. This 'Diary' records observations, impressions and reflections of men, women and movements, of actors still on the stage of affairs, of issues still unsettled, and of beauty spots in one of the loveliest lands on earth." ($1.50).

PAINTED WINDOWS

By "A GENTLEMAN WITH A DUSTER"

With the same facile pen with which he revealed the vices and virtues of England's great and near great in "The Mirrors of Downing Street," and with the same healthy, constructive directness with which he attacked the decadence of modern society in "The Glass of Fashion," the famous "Gentleman" (Harold Begbie) turns his fire on the churches. In "Painted Windows" he shows the present chaotic condition in the churches. He chooses as his vehicle the twelve leading British clergymen of all denominations, and through a searching character study of each of them, he turns the spotlight on the strength and weakness of modern church practices. Pulpit and press will take sides with and against "Painted Windows." It will be condemned, criticized, praised and quoted. Everybody who is anybody will read it and discuss it. ($2.50).

MODERN READERS' BIBLE

(Abridged, in Two Volumes)

By PROF. RICHARD G. MOULTON

The first volume, the Old Testament, is just from the press; the second volume, the New Testament, having been published some months ago. The final volume contains six sections and covers the entire Old Testament. By this great work, which has long been a favorite as published in many small volumes, Dr. Moulton has done a world of Bible readers a valuable service. Solely by omission of text that is of the nature of documentary appendices and minor passages whose removal renders the main purpose plainer, Dr. Moulton in these two volumes makes one-third of the Bible text, given word for word, convey the meaning of the Bible's whole contents to the general reader better probably than the complete Bible has ever been able to do it. (Each volume $2.25).

THE EAGLE LIFE

By J. H. JOWETT

There is a never-failing freshness and joyous assurance about everything that Dr. Jowett writes. He draws spiritual refreshment from the springs of the Old Testament even as he draws from the New. Many thousands there be on both sides of the Atlantic who fain would hear this great Christian teacher, but failing this are grateful for his books, to which they turn again and again for sustaining advice and comfort in hours of depression and times of trouble. This new volume of studies in Old Testament texts takes its title from one of the forty-eight chapters. ($1.50).

FIFTY-TWO SHORT SERMONS FOR HOME READING

By W. ROBERTSON NICOLL

This delightful collection of brief sermons by the editor of "The British Weekly" can be used for evening worship in the home. It will also be very suggestive to the minister who is looking for sermon subjects. Dr. Nicoll's unrivalled acquaintance with literature is revealed in these very original and polished little discourses. ($1.75).

Christianity Produces Reactions in China

The presence of the Christian missionaries in China is bringing a number of interesting reactions. The outgrowth of violent anti-Christian societies shows a fear on the part of the strict nationalists that customs will be changed. The native religious organizations tend to take over Christian customs in various ways, one of the institutions most commonly copied being the Sunday school. The governor of Shansi province in China has organized what he calls a "heart-cleaning" society. A hall has been built seating 3,000 persons. It is like a church both within and without and a great organ has been installed. In this institution it is hoped to bring the people to an appreciation of ethical duty. There can scarcely be any doubt as to the source of the new ideas in the mind of the governor.

Presbyterians Had No Easter in Their Church Year

The Presbyterians had no Easter in their last statistical church year. This is not due to any Presbyterian peculiarities, but to the fact that Easter is throughout the world a movable feast. In spite of the fact that the statistics lack the support which is always given by an Easter Sunday the net gain in Presbyterian churches last year was 34,557. The rolls show 93,259 added on confession of faith, 65,234 added by certificate from other churches, and 11,195 restored to membership. Losses by death were 19,919, by dismissal 54,179; and 55,050 were placed on the suspended list, so that the net increase for the year was 34,557. Few denominations keep their records so carefully as to show how great is the loss from suspension. The Presbyterians presumably gained from other religious communions more than they lost, according to the above figures, but the loss of 55,050 in a single year by sheer lack of interest gives away the secret of the leakage in all denominations.

Tomb of John Wesley in Decay

Though he has millions of spiritual children, the tomb of John Wesley is now in serious decay. The scandal of this fact has come home to British Methodists, and they held on June 20 a meeting to consider the renovation of Methodism's cathedral chapel, City-Road. The monument to John Wesley in the churchyard behind the chapel is called "a crumbling monument in a decaying wilderness." The City-Road Chapel property was acquired in 1775. John Wesley died in 1791 in a house adjoining the chapel. The British Methodists hope to make the premises inviting to tourists who come to pay their respects to the founder of Methodism.

Catholics Hold Educational Meeting

The Roman Catholic church has its own organization of educational interests which is called the Catholic Educational Association. This association holds largely attended meetings annually. This year the sessions were held in Philadelphia and about twenty-five hundred delegates were present. The address of welcome was delivered by Cardinal Dougherty, who celebrated pontifical high mass. Sectional meetings were held in which the problems of various types of schools were discussed. Parish school, high school, college, university and seminary had its own sectional meetings. Even the Catholic deaf mutes held a conference and the Catholic Negro Education Society met. Reports were made with regard to the situation in various cities for parish education. Two-thirds of the Catholic children in a typical American city go to the public schools and this fact proved disconcerting. Bishop Thomas J. Scanlan said: "Education is more than knowledge of facts and things. It implies a cultivated sense of right and wrong and well-understood principles of conduct."

Roman Catholics Bewail Small Number of Converts

The accessions to the Roman Catholic church from non-Catholic sources has been variously estimated by Protestants, but in the past it has been difficult to secure information with regard to the actual situation. In a recent issue of America, a Catholic weekly, certain facts are given by a correspondent which may help to show how things are going in the way of winning non-Catholics to the true fold. The priests of New York led the list for the whole country. In that city there were 2,573 converts by 1,141 priests, which is an average of 2.25 each. At the end of the procession stands the city of Santa Fe where there were only 71 converts for 93 priests. Meanwhile complaint is made of the efforts of Protestant proselytizers who work among Catholic peoples in the great southwest by means of manual training schools. It seems evident that while the efforts of the Paulist Fathers, who are organized particularly to win non-Catholics, are fruitful in a measure, the business of converting America to an allegiance to an Italian pontiff is not making rapid progress.

Breaks New Ground in the Field of Religious Discussion.

NEW CHURCHES FOR OLD

By John Haynes Holmes

Facing the alarming facts of declining church attendance and loss of ecclesiastical influence, the author of this important book is not satisfied to appeal to people to stand by existing churches, but calls for a wholly new statement of religion which shall work itself out into a new form of church organization. A revolutionary, but sincerely constructive work.

A Cultural Guide for Those Who Seek Self Improvement

The scope of LIFE AND LETTERS will be wide, embracing subjects of genuine interest to those who would realize contact with the vital schools of thought, past and thorough manner, and will, in a measure, be guided by this present. LIFE AND LETTERS will do its work in a policy: ONE SUBJECT AT A TIME. Instead of hopping around and land nowhere, each issue of LIFE AND LETTERS will be devoted to practically one subject.

Let us, by way of illustration, suppose that an issue of LIFE AND LETTERS is to be devoted to Charles Darwin. Our subject would be handled in a most thorough manner, along the following lines: A good picture of Darwin. An authentic biographical study by a competent student of his life. A number of articles presenting various phases of his theories and discoveries. An estimate of his importance in the progress of science. Interesting and human sidelights on his character. A guide to the best Darwinian literature. The result would be that when you have finished reading this particular issue of LIFE AND LETTERS you will have a most comprehensive idea of Darwin's life, theories and achievements. That is what we mean when we say: ONE SUBJECT AT A TIME.

This does not mean that matter unrelated to Darwin would be held out in the issue under discussion. By all odds we would give news and views of other equally valuable subjects, except that they would be dominated by the main subject of the month, which in this instance would be Darwin. On this page we print a list of subjects which will be handled in LIFE AND LETTERS. A glance at this brilliant list will convince you that LIFE AND LETTERS will be of real service to you and that matter of such prime importance will not be found so abundantly in other publications.

LIFE AND LETTERS is going to tackle ONE SUBJECT AT A TIME. Below we list some of the names which our editorial department is going to handle from month to month. Look over the list carefully and then decide whether or not you should order LIFE AND LETTERS to carry the facts about these master minds to your own home. The names below are listed in alphabetical order. The editions of LIFE AND LETTERS devoted to each celebrity will not be published in the order listed below:

It Will Bring You the Best Fruits of Culture

Our policy is very simple. We want to bring the best fruits of culture to the people at a price the people can afford. We want to do worthwhile educational work in the one way that really counts—and that is we want to present the material so that the readers may study for themselves and thus develop themselves.

The great need of this age is education. All persons cannot go to universities. Most persons must go out into the world and make a living. Shall such a worthy people be held away from the things that count? Yes, they are being held away by the terrible prices charged by the profiteer publishers.

We have shown that good books can be printed in booklet form at only 10 cents per copy, and we have made hundreds of thousands of friends—people who write us floods of letters praising us for our campaign to bring literature to the public at one-twentieth the cost charged by others. And now we shall prove that the people can be given a magazine that will print the masterpieces of literature, and not charge 35 cents a copy. Instead, we shall charge only 25 cents a year.

Of course, we shall not give you a magazine that looks like the American Magazine. We do not intend to enter that field. We intend to print LIFE AND LETTERS on a Goss rotary press which costs $50,000 and which will print the magazines at the rate of 25,000 per hour. LIFE AND LETTERS will be printed in newspaper style. By using a newspaper rotary press we shall reduce printing costs to the very minimum, thereby being able to give you a newspaper-size magazine at only 2 cents per copy, or only 25 cents per year.

Our first issue will bear the date of August, 1922. If you will subscribe now you will get your name on the list in good time to get a copy of the very first issue. And if you believe in what we are doing, if you want to help, then please do more than subscribe for yourself. Get your friends to subscribe for LIFE AND LETTERS. For only $1 you can get your own name and the names of three of your friends on the subscription list of LIFE AND LETTERS for one entire year.

A Journal Read by Statesmen

A special introductory offer of the next 13 numbers of The Outlook for only $1

A RELIABLE, authoritative weekly review of important news is as essential a part of the working equipment of the business executive or professional man as his desk, telephone, or staff of assistants.

In order to make it possible for business and professional men who are occasional readers of The Outlook to become better acquainted with the character of the journal and to see it regularly each week for a trial period at but slight expense, we make the following special offer:

> We will send The Outlook each week for the next three months (13 numbers) for the small sum of $1 to any one who is not now a subscriber. The regular yearly subscription price is $5, and this offer is made to non-subscribers in order to show them what they are missing by not having The Outlook each week.

A World-Famous Editorial Survey

First in position and importance in each issue of The Outlook is the editorial survey of the outstanding events of that week, discussed without partisanship or prejudice and with first-hand knowledge and conviction.

This terse weekly editorial summary and interpretation of the world's news is world-famous. In Japan, for instance, according to one of the leading Japanese publicists, The Outlook is the most popular of all American periodicals. At home it is the most-quoted periodical on the floor of Congress.

Each number contains hours of reading, all of which is bracing, refreshing, and brain-expanding. Distinguished contributors write for every issue. The fascinating running story of the world's progress is prepared for you by eminent journalists, statesmen, diplomatists, scientists, men of letters, artists, educators and business men.

Why You Will Need The Outlook During Your Summer Vacationing

Wherever your summer jaunts may take you, The Outlook will reach you each week. Due to a remarkably efficient change-of-address department, we can guarantee immediate action on all change-of-address orders received by us. Other periodicals often require from two to six weeks to get action on such orders. But no matter how often, or how quickly, you change your summer whereabouts, The Outlook will be there each week to keep you clearly, reliably, and authoritatively informed as to what is happening in the world. Many of our readers will get along without newspapers this summer—but not without The Outlook.

"The Most-Quoted Weekly Journal in America"

You have noticed, of course, that the leading newspapers of the country are almost constantly quoting from The Outlook, which is noted for getting hold of articles of such sharp and timely interest and importance that their publication is actually a matter of news. But why rely upon the fragmentary reports in the newspapers, when you can have the entire, unabridged contents of each week's issue of The Outlook before you for the next 13 weeks for the small sum of only $1?

By starting your trial subscription at once, you will be sure to get all the distinguished articles that are scheduled for the summer.

The Outlook Company, 381 Fourth Ave., New York C. C.

Please enter my subscription for the next 13 numbers of The Outlook. I enclose $1.

Do You Want to Get Ahead?

Roosevelt often amazed his hearers by his knowledge of history, politics, economics, the natural sciences and the arts.

His mastery of the world's knowledge on any subject—when he had need of it—always gave him leadership on the platform and at the council table.

The secret of his wide range of information was known to all who lived and worked with him.

He "burned the midnight oil."

No matter where he was—on a railroad train, aboard ship, on a ranch, in the African jungle, in his study in the White House—he was always to be found making use of his leisure hours by getting more knowledge from the best books.

Experts in the field of learning were at Roosevelt's service.

You can command these experts as Roosevelt did

You can, as he did, each day broaden your field of knowledge and increase your power of leadership by giving a few minutes of your leisure time to planned reading.

The Most Beautiful Hymnal Published by the American Church

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH, edited by Charles Clayton Morrison and Herbert L. Willett, is a delight to the eye and to the hand. No expense has been spared in its production. The paper is the best and of perfect color. The binding is most attractive. Great care has been bestowed on the "make-up" of the pages. They are attractive to the eye. The hymns seem almost to sing themselves when the book is opened! They are not crowded together on the page. No hymn is smothered in a corner. The notes are larger than are usually employed in hymnals. The words are set in bold and legible type, and all the stanzas are in the staves. Everything has been done to make this the most beautiful hymnal ever produced by the American Church.

This is just one reason why your church should adopt this book this autumn

What Shall be Done With Great City Churches

REV. SIDNEY BERRY, of Carr's Lane, Birmingham, has declined the invitation to again follow Dr. Jowett, this time in the Westminster Chapel, London. Many considerations must have entered into his decision, and no doubt it was wise; but it brings up the question of the future of our great central city churches, and what must be done with them. Central London, like New York and Chicago, has greatly changed from what it was in the days of Joseph Parker, when people lived over their shops in easy walking distance of the City Temple, or Westminster Chapel. Today the people who attended, and especially those who supported, such churches live at a distance—as far away as ten or twenty miles—and most of them have cast in their lot with the churches in their neighborhoods. As a result, the great churches of central London, as in our American cities, are hardly to be described as churches at all, but merely preaching-stations, attended by the few who are loyal by reason of old associations, and the passing transient population. Unless they happen to stand on old foundations with endowments, or are taken in hand as denominational enterprises, they are not only precarious financially, but lay upon the preacher an intolerable load. The City Temple, for example, is run on the English penny, and a series of stormy Sundays puts it in debt, with no resources to fall back upon, which adds to the burden of its ministers, whose load is already heavy enough. Sometimes relief is found by putting two or more churches together, as in the case of the First Presbyterian church of New York, to which Dr. Fosdick ministers; but that is not always possible. If the church is not to abandon its witness in the heart of our cities, this problem must be faced in a large and statesmanlike manner. Meanwhile, we nominate Dr. John Hutton, of Glasgow, to be minister of Westminster Chapel; it is where he belongs, and free churchmen ought to make it a common Christian enterprise in central London.

Barbarism Increasing In America Again

ALTHOUGH lynching showed a decrease last year, there is evidence that this year will be as bad as ever. The department of records and research of Tuskegee Institute is making a study of lynchings reported in various sections of the country. For the first six months of 1922 there were 30, as against 12 for the first six months of 1921. Two-thirds of these murderous attacks occurred in two states, 7 in Mississippi and 12 in Texas. Five men were burned to death and three more were put to death and then their bodies burned. In only eleven of these thirty cases—about one-third—was the crime of rape even charged. This latter fact is significant in view of the claim that lynching is justifiable as a means of protection to the white women of the nation. During the past six months every lynching has occurred in a southern state, which is a bit unusual because northern states have in recent years shown a disposition to indulge in this great American pastime. Meanwhile these outrages are making bitter the hearts of the most patient race in all the world. As Negro newspapers increase and spread abroad the story of these crimes, as Negro literacy makes black men and women more able to judge public issues critically, there is a rapid increase of social resentment on the part of the black people. No great injustice such as lynching can go on for years and not bring down justice upon the heads of the perpetrators. To deny this is to disbelieve in God. The problem is one that must be met with legislation as well as education. Lynching is anarchy and the forces of the federal government should go into every community where one of these crimes occurs and ferret out the guilty parties. If every lynching were followed by a score of penitentiary sentences, there would doubtless be less tendency for white men to indulge in these organized murders.

Disobedience to Law

PRETENCES to justify evasion of unpleasant laws are numerous in America. To violate the law, and not get caught is clever. The man who violates the traffic laws with his automobile usually thinks of his performance as smart. To be arrested and fined is an experience one relates to friends as a good joke. Those who wear personal liberty badges these days to advertise that they have a still in the cellar think they are doing something very brave. They tell us that prohibition was slipped over on the American people as a war measure, but as a matter of fact it was considered by 96 legislative bodies in 48 different states and passed by 92 of these bodies. Few public measures have ever had so long a period of discussion or so decisive a vote. Yet the liquor-law-breaker continues to hold that he is a law unto himself. In an unlimited monarchy where law does not represent the social will, but only the whim of the autocrat, men have often been compelled to resist the law as a matter of conscience. The man who resists the social will of a republic, however, needs to think twice, for the probability that he is wrong is much greater than in the country with a monarchical form of government. America today faces no more difficult problem than the enforcement of the social will among the people with the machinery of the law. The labor leader does not hesitate at murder to accomplish his ends. The big corporation is quite willing to provoke murder by agents provocateur if that will help win a struggle. Theft when practiced upon a large scale may be called either business or politics, and the thief admitted to good society. A part of the service of the churches to the nation at this time is to build once more than wholesome respect for the law which shall result in justice in human relationships.

"The Little Corner Never Conquered"

WHATEVER bitter sadness and regret may fill our hearts as we think of the great war, whose tragedy has passed into the dark annals of the world, the story of relief, of feeding the hungry, of succor to the mutilated, and the victims of devastated regions, is a record of which we have a right to be proud. A part of the story is told by Miss Jane Addams in "Peace and Bread in Time of War," told with Quaker-like gentleness, forthrightness and simplicity of utterance, as she is wont to tell everything. Reasonableness, moderation, and charity have ever been the temper of her thought, and they make a clear air in which to see the facts. But an encyclopedia would be needed to tell the whole story, hence a series of volumes issued by the Red Cross, one of which is "The Little Corner Never Conquered," by Dr. John Van Schaick, Jr., reporting the work done in Belgium. As a Commissioner of the Red Cross in that region, only a tiny corner of which was never over-run, he writes with full knowledge, in a singularly serene and simple style, and one feels behind every page a great horror of the war the victims of which he and his fellow-workers were aiding. Very wisely the writer waited until the war spirit had subsided, the better to give a calm, accurate and thorough survey of the work done in the brave little land; and his title may stand as a symbol of that little corner of the human heart, overshadowed but never utterly desolated, by the tragedy of the war.

Attitude of Business Men on Industrial Questions

ONE of the difficulties confronted by the church and its agencies of industrial betterment is the disinclination of men representing the capitalistic point of view to confer with those who have different approaches to the economic questions of the time. It is the frequent statement of those who attempt to bring together people of various groups for conciliatory consideration of the problems which industrial disagreements have caused, that they have no trouble to persuade the labor people to attend such gatherings, and that Christian leaders interested to any degree in the labor situation are glad to come, but that the men who have capitalistic or administrative interests take a supercilious and contemptuous attitude regarding all such discussions, and rarely consent to attend. This is the more surprising and depressing when it is recalled that for the most part the laboring people are not church attendants, while the majority of men of the capitalistic class are connected with some religious organization. Conditions of this nature tend to fix in the minds of the artisan groups the firm conviction that men of the moneyed class are indifferent to such inquiries as the church is instituting in the industrial field, and propose to keep aloof from all such conferences. Still worse is the fact that business men as a class echo the sentiments of the capitalistic group, without any painstaking effort to understand the merits of the controversy. Indeed there is resentment at the efforts of Christian agencies to ascertain the facts regarding housing conditions, wages, hours of service, child labor, women in industry, protective measures, and similar matters. But the inquiry cannot be stopped. It is one of the forms of human interest which the church, in the spirit of the Master, is bound to pursue, until the facts on both sides are known, and capital and labor have faced each other not as foes but as partners.

American Schools of Research in the Orient

ONE of the interesting developments of recent years has been the effort to provide foundations for study on the part of American students in the various educational centers of the old world. The classical schools in Rome and Athens have long been significant and useful centers. In the year 1900 the American School of Oriental Research in Jerusalem was established and has since continued under the united auspices of the leading American colleges and universities to offer a home, library facilities and lectures for graduate students from American institutions traveling through Palestine or residing for a period in Jerusalem. Usually during some portion of the year journeys of investigation to interesting points are made under the leadership of the director who is in residence for the year, and a few modest efforts at excavation have been made at promising sites. The outcome of the world war gave renewed opportunity for research work, exploration and excavation, not only in Palestine, but in every portion of the ancient biblical world. The fact that Palestine and Mesopotamia were both alloted to British auspices under the agreement made by the entente powers gave opportunity for further expansion of the same idea, and two years ago the American School of Oriental Research in Bagdad was established. Such eminent Semitic scholars as Professors Clay, Barton, Montgomery, Torrey, Albright, and Paton have been deeply interested in the project and have served in the capacity of promoters and annual directors. It is particularly desirable that the libraries connected with these two foundations be augmented as fully and rapidly as possible. The library of the late Prof. Morris Jastrow, Jr., of the University of Pennsylvania has been recently given by Mrs. Jastrow to the trustees of the American Schools of Oriental Research, to be divided between the two institutions; and the library of the late Dr. William Hayes Ward has been promised for the school in Bagdad as soon as sufficient equipment can be provided for it. This is a most admirable and gratifying addition to the American facilities now available for oriental study.

Publicity Man Protests Against Sectarianism

MR. IVY L. LEE, one of the best known publicity experts of the country, has been saying some rather pointed things about civilization and religion. The vast machinery of modernism, he says, has become a kind of Frankenstein monster which threatens to crush its creator who is caught in the cogs of his own invention. One thing, and one thing only, he insists, can save the world from further clashes growing out of its own close-knit organization, and that is the Christian religion; but that religion must be emancipated from sectarian differences and the emphasis put where Jesus put it in the sermon on the mount—the doing of good in the spirit of love. Nothing else matters. What the denominationalists quibble over is of no importance at all, however vital it may have seemed to the men of other times. For real men, living in an age of reality, and whizzed at too rapid a pace by a high-geared material civilization, only the realities of religion will suffice; its details of rite mean no more to the men of today than the different kind of service one store gives a customer as compared with another store. The church, he concludes, is the greatest instrument we have for the culture of the religious influences needed to mitigate, and at last abolish, the brutality of modern civilization; and if ecclesiastics are unable to make it what it ought to be, laymen must come to the rescue. Surely here is plain speech; but, as the little girl said, "He's not preaching; he is telling the truth." Sectarianism is bankrupt, and it is now in order to try Christianity.

Is There a Way Out of the Muddle?

HEW to the line, let the chips fall where they may. The right must prevail though the heavens fall. Such aphorisms salve the qualms which attack the boldest when they see the havoc wrought by their irreconcilable and pertinacious devotion to pet ideas. Society is suffering from some of this havoc right now. Those who are causing it, or are withholding the adjustments which might bring forth order, doubtless need all the comfort they can extract from this and kindred philosophy. It relieves them of responsibility as active agent or abettor of the present social confusion and distress. How satisfying and sweet the tears one sheds over the culpability for universal ills of those who will not agree with one, and who deliberately follow courses different from those which one knows to be right!

Judge Gary recently was thus deeply grieved that the workingmen in the employ of the steel corporation would not yield to his decisions. Their moral obliquity was so great that he could not so far sacrifice his inflexible moral principles as to confer with them or their representatives. This has been the social and ethical program through which whole ages have moved in the past. But at length in our time the statesmanship of compromise has emerged. The middle of the road is the only way out. Be extreme on your side so as to roll up capital against the day of barter with your opponent. The acme of folly is to be reasonable at the start. Always ask for more than you expect to get, for then you will get something like what you want and deserve. Right is what issues from tedious and cunning diplomacy. Right is what your opponent can be induced to yield.

This is at this date the prevalent statesmanship in the affairs of nations, in the affairs of corporate business, in the affairs of churches. In politics it is the way of "muddling through" which has been reduced to a science and an art in some states under the leadership of certain resourceful diplomats. In business it is the game, and the game has enormous attractions to certain natures capable both of large affairs and of small. In church councils it is embodied in the report of joint committees, couched in language which settles nothing, filled with buts and on-the-other-hands, which upon the public reading before the convention brings the throng to their feet at the declaration that "this representative committee presents to you a unanimous report," whereupon all sing a hymn of praise and go home, each party to crow over the victory it has won. This type of statesmanship has now been practiced long enough for thoughtful folk to recognize its limitations. Compromises which leave both parties to a contest exultant over the victory, have been found to wear very poorly indeed. Their net value is found by much experience to be that they leave two controversies where before there was but one. It looks rather as though the middle of the road leads deeper into the muddle, that "muddling through" is actually a device for getting in worse.

Is there a tertium quid? Is there a way out when both of these courses only lead to new distress? Manifestly we must find one, else the confusion both in politics and religion will become intolerable. What shall be done with such issues as the tariff, and the denominational tangle, and socialism, and the changed authority of the Bible? Does any sane man longer hope that the United States senate will get anywhere but deeper into the morass, in the business which has engaged it for weeks and seems likely to engage it for many other weeks still? An editorial in a leading daily remarks that the situation is such as to make certain really able senators act like dunderheads. What they are doing, and are likely to do much worse at last, is such an outrage upon intelligence, not to speak of its moral implications, that voters must go to the polls, when next they get a chance, in a frenzy of rage. To do what when they get there? Will there be any choice between parties or groups of statesmen?

Some light would seem to shine out of the very extremity of such folly and blundering. It is beginning to dawn upon the citizen of average intelligence that the drawing up of a tariff schedule is not a political issue nor an ethical question. It is the business of technicians; and the muddling of politicians, no matter how superior as politicians they may be, is intolerable. Something like this is true of numerous questions which we now insist upon treating as ethical issues, and wage battle for or against. A little intelligence would subdue our rage, and enable us to see how our zeal for righteousness only makes us ridiculous, and dooms social interests of grave concern to disaster. In the field of religion the sectarian divisions of the community have reached this issue. No real doctrinal or ethical principles are at stake. Special interests, and official prerogatives, and the selfish fear of the loss of power or control of ecclesiastical machines—such considerations alone now dominate the denominational question. Yet ecclesiastics, reputedly able, act like dunderheads when they alternately take hold of and shy away from this question. Of course, no real progress is made in settling the issue; its nature is not recognized, or else it is deliberately obscured. No essential truths of God or man are involved. No precious doctrines are to be defended or to be sacrificed. No sacred traditions are to be preserved or betrayed. Only offices are to be retained or lost, pride of place and power is to be nursed or blasted, barren prejudices are to be honored or exposed. If the essential character of this issue were clearly apprehended the "problem of the divided church" would evaporate, requiring no labored solution.

Society is going to the bow-wows unless the socialistic state is established the world over: hosts of socialists and bolshevistic sympathizers are sure of it. None of these appears to discover that democracy is not born in a day; it does not emerge robust and triumphant from a revolution which may have carried off never so effectually the autocratic or plutocratic or selfish capitalistic civilization which may have preceded it. Is it not time all of us realized that the determining issue before Russia today is not political or ethical, but technical? Bolshevism is disappointing all but foreign doctrinaires, not because it is political and spiritual heresy, but because the leaders and their followers in Russia do not know how to make it work. No more does anybody outside of Russia know how to make it work. The reactionaries are making themselves foolish by their tirades against its moral obliquities. History will doubtless show that few or no social and political revolutions have embodied more noble commitments of life and substance and ambitions to lofty motives of human service. The foreign champions of bolshevism are often quite as insane in their heralding of the new day of world redemption through what is to emerge from poor distraught Russia. Neither the doctrinaire bolshevist nor the raging reactionary has discovered the real issue. Socialism is now a technical question; it is not fundamentally a political or an ethical. All of us are socialists in idea and ideal. Our trouble is that we are not sufficiently adept administrative technicians to make socialism work. None is more forward to declare that socialism has not the technique for its own task than certain convinced socialist leaders themselves. Yet we go on wrangling over what are assumed to be the ethical and political questions at issue, when, as a matter of practical concern there is nothing to fight about. We could not make the socialistic state succeed, even if we had it established today in full form and fettle. We do not know how. Is it not perfectly apparent that, if we ever arrive at the socialistic state, we must grow into it? We must get our democracy, of whatever type or degree of sublimation, by winning it, by working it out, by developing its technique. We cannot wish or scold or dream or argue or legislate ourselves into this kind of kingdom of heaven, or any other kind.

If we should sanely and without prejudice put our heads to the business, we should likely find that nine-tenths of our political and social and religious problems are not ethical at all, but are technical, and furnish incentives to study and scientific experiment, and none at all to controversy. The suspicion grows that even the now tender question of the authority of the Bible is one of these. Of what possible service can it be to any of us to continue threshing over the old straw of scriptural inspiration? What longer signifies fluency in the quotation of scripture texts to prove a point? Opposing parties in every theological controversy do it with equal vehemence and finality. The devil himself can quote scripture, and has doubtless often done it with profound conviction. And the venom with which participants in some of our theological controversies practice the art arouses the suspicion that others share both his facility and his spirit. To show the whole world in error except me and my dutiful wife by an appeal to scripture is the easiest thing in the world, and the silliest. Multitudes of people who are struggling with all their might, and yearning with all their hearts to bring in the kingdom of heaven, do not care one fig what it may please us to demonstrate to be the truth through a tissue of scripture proof texts. The truth is not to be arrived at by that means. If it were we should have found it ages ago. We shall work out the truth, experience it, not pounce upon it among the references in a concordance.

From which it would seem clear that all along the line we are only getting ourselves deeper into the muddle by mistaking the nature of the problems with which we have to deal. If we could quit being heated moral philosophers long enough to realize how much we need keen-witted scientists, social engineers, expert schedule and budget-makers, and highly qualified administrators, we should far more quickly come out of our despair and fury over the degeneracy of civilization. Those who differ from us are not emissaries of Satan and malign foes of human weal—not all of them. Among those who may seem most radically to differ from us on ethical or political or religious questions there are likely to be many who are wrestling with the practical problems of making this world the right kind of place for people to live in and die from, more effectually than are we ourselves. We should probably find this out to our great profit and to the advancement of our society if we should sincerely join with them in conquering the technical difficulties in the way of realizing our glowing ideals of love and life and righteousness and peace in human affairs.

The Prophet and the Larger Majority

RELIGION inspires appeal to the ever larger majority. The theology which prompts the little man to cry, "God and I are a majority!" is of a piece with the "Me-und-Gott" Kaiserism which ribald poets and cartoonists have celebrated, only it is the frayed and threadbare remnants of what is the tougher fibre of Kaiserism. The God of both is a fabrication of self-will. He is the salve for outraged conceit, the prejudiced "mamma" whom the over-grown pettish child "tells" on the more robust playmates who crossed the spoiled will. The manner in which religion and a fabricated deity have been employed to sanctify stubbornness and pugnacity is the age-long scandal of religious history. Having decided just what truth is, and finding that my fellows do not agree with me, I concoct an omnipotent and absolute sovereign of the universe, and set him at the task of vindicating my conceit. He is absolute in his power to serve my little purposes; he is strictly limited in his powers and attributes by the demands of this specific function.

In every crisis of religious controversy we witness a rebirth of obsessions of this nature. Sonorous challenges of the living God to interfere are heard from those who find themselves balked and blocked by the steady movements of truth in directions which they have not previously determined. Their increasing isolation prompts dramatic appeals to the future for vindication of their obsessions, and they even go down to embittered defeat and death, nursing the inexpugnable hope of such vindication. Sweet-spirited delusions of this character can only call forth compassion from the lover of truth. But bitter and self-willed minorities give sure signs of their evil spirit, and get their deserts in the utter neglect or the excoriation of that future to which they have appealed.

The sacrilege of such appeals lies in the fact that they are the cheap imitation of the true impulse and sure refuge of the devout religious minded. This appeal to the larger majority is the stay and support of the great spirits of all ages. It is of the essence of religion that a man should appeal from the hasty, thoughtless decisions of his own community, his own country, his own generation, his own age. In the case of small ideas, limited truths, the vindication often comes through the appeal from the verdict of his immediate associates or neighbors; a true prophet usually lacks honor among his own. The greater prophet has sometimes been forced to appeal to an arbitrament larger and truer than the wider circle of his own countrymen. Again and again a statesman has assumed a greatness, even in his own generation, among citizens of other lands, which his own kin and the members of his own nation have either disallowed or have grudgingly accorded. And the greatest of all have appealed to the surging majorities which only the ages can roll up.

These majorities have sometimes lived in the past. All appeal for the conservation of established ideas and ideals is not reaction; all is not the cowardice and stagnation of the reactionary. Doughty dead generations have often risen up in the spirit to condemn the whole regime of a gluttonous and perverse brood succeeding them. Sons have often proved very unworthy of their noble sires. True prophets have sometimes looked backward and seen visions more glorious than the generation around about them could vouchsafe. Kindly and gentle spirits have been broken by the discovery that their own, their children, their friends, their neighbors, their community, their country, their age, were following a wild and ugly course which they could see clearly would lead only to destruction. Such have often wept, but they have not become embittered, nor poured forth venom upon the wayward.

Here is the infallible mark of the false prophet, this venom. The true prophet is never bitter and vindictive. He never betrays the fact that it is his own stubborn will which is being outraged and frustrated. He is grieved for the wayward, and for their faithlessness to the great truths established by the past, but their effront is not taken as personal. He is not maddened by the violation of his private conceits. An embittered "champion of the truth" can infallibly be set down as a false prophet. He does not so much honor the past and its great ideas, as he resents the desertion of his own leadership.

But the great, the determining majorities are in the future. It is to them that the prophets more properly appeal. Because this is the larger court, the true prophets are more commonly found among those who look to the future for vindication, while false prophets more often appeal to the past. They are the true reactionaries. Confucius demonstrated the possibility of true prophetic vision on the part of one who looks toward the past, but his followers readily, almost inevitably, mistook his intent, were blinded to his vision, and the intellectual and social stagnation of Chinese civilization through age upon age resulted. Yet Confucius was a true enough prophet to abide through history as a seer and revealer of the truth. Only a true prophet could survive as he has survived. And the kindliness of the man, the sweetness of his spirit, is a mark which he shares with all true prophets. Though he looked backward, the malignity of the reactionary were not in him.

Greater prophets have looked forward, have seen the golden age before and not behind, have found the solace of disappointed hopes and ambitions for their own society in the better society of the future, have crowned their religious devotion by appeal to the larger, clearer-minded, purer-hearted hosts whom only the future can marshal. But false prophets also appeal to the future. At the same time their fondness for the past is betrayed in their eagerness to have the future repeat it. Their uniform deficiency is made up for by revisualizing what has already been: they ordinarily lack the power to conceive truth big enough and vital enough to create new ideas. Ideals which smaller majorities of the past have been incapable of formulating are also beyond them. Their appeal to the future is by way of reinstating a golden age which has already been, or the forcing upon new generations of ideas and doctrines which were the glory of bygone ages, but are still not of sufficient glory to reward the spiritual prowess of the larger hosts of the future which the true prophet readily discerns.

The familiar marks of the true and the false prophet, remain, whether they face forward or backward. However vehemently the false prophet appeals to the future and its vindicating majorities, the spirit of his own conceited stubbornness flashes forth. He wishes the oncoming generations to hasten and support him. He wants not truth, but his truth, to prevail. He prescribes for the future, does not call upon larger majorities to express their will. He insists before they arrive that they shall render the verdict in behalf of his minority. All the hosts, to the end of time, and through the abyss of eternity, are false and reprobate unless they vote for his creed and fall into step beneath his banners. He does not want the majority to prevail; he wants to prevail, and his appeal to these larger hosts is only in the interests of his cause and the cause of his coterie. Thus he is, indeed, a false prophet; he is no prophet. He is not a seer; he does not truly vision what is to be, but violates every sanctity of the future by projecting upon and against it his private caprices and prejudices.

It is noteworthy, and altogether true to the expected realities, that no great man should ever achieve precisely what he sets out to win. If the great were little enough to insist upon the precise expression of their personal will among the majorities of the future, their disembodied spirits would be eternally wailing over withered hopes and groaning under the weight of frustrated ambitions—every one of them. The truly great cannot, therefore, desire the uncompromised and unvaried replica of their visions. They wish truth to prevail; they wish the free spirit of the ultimate majorities to have its way. They do not stubbornly stand for their own formulas and their own conceits. Their capacity as prophets is vindicated in their visioning before the time the free choice of the coming generations, and although they be at fault in the details of their vision, they rejoice none the less in the prevalence of the truth. They would rather have the larger majorities of the future true to their best, than to have them vote slavishly for them and their measures.

It is inevitable that the vision of the greatest should be at fault in detail. Therefore, the truly great in life do not stick at details. Main purposes and major ideas are so grand and satisfying that the loss of a coveted gain here, and the failure of a friendly cherished plan there, are not resented. Nor should the vindication of their greatness after their death be contingent upon these trifling successes, or their memory clouded by such failures. As a matter of fact, history does not discredit them for their astigmatic aberrations of vision. It is amazing how quickly the pettinesses of the great are forgotten. The revelations, made by a recent writer, who faithfully sets down in the print of a current magazine some of the follies and foibles of the early life of Abraham Lincoln, have only vexed many readers. It seems scandalous to revive such events, facts though they may be, about one so great. And all of that greatness has been achieved in the memory of men and women still living!

Lincoln's greatness does not consist in the acceptance by the succeeding generations of each formula and process of his statecraft. No great character of history, probably, died so opportunely as did he. He lived long enough to make clear the pregnant, central idea of his thought, and bring out the purity of his spirit. There is no telling what renewed follies and foibles might have clouded his later days, if later days had been vouchsafed him. His last state papers and public utterances show alarming signs that power and the success of the moment were going to his head; in time they might have even invaded his heart.

All of which is beside the present point except as it may make clear that even the greatest cannot properly appeal to the larger majorities of the future to vote for aught but their own truth; it is crass presumption to appeal to them to vindicate any private will, however lordly. Not the greatest dare exalt his formulas to the rank of infallible truth. His appeal to the future must be for the free expression of the larger majorities' free will. If he has not truly visioned that will, then is he demonstrated a false prophet. Especially does bitterness and spleenful excoriation of his living opponents outlaw him before this larger court. These majorities are so tenacious of sweet-spiritedness among the great of their history, that they decline to believe about even the near-great the scandalous details which clouded their lives among their contemporaries. It is inevitable that we forget, or overlook, or decline to countenance the true biographies of the heroes of the past. Their petty devices to gain their own among their contemporaries we sheen over with misrepresentations to their credit, or allow to sink into oblivion.

Where, therefore, is true religion to be found? Who is professing it, and expressing it, today? What is to be the issue of these so bitter theological and ecclesiastical controversies, which are rending ancient churches asunder, and storing up fuel for new fires of controversy for new generations? Who are the true prophets and who are the false? Whom will the larger majorities of the future vindicate? These are questions which it should not be too difficult to answer, in the light of a true democratic faith.

The Old Established Business

A Parable of Safed the Sage

ONCE upon a time there was an Old Established Business. It was the leading concern in its Line, and all the trade knew it, and what was more, the Proprietor knew it. And his credit was good at the Bank, and his goods were Reliable, and the Profits were Steady.

And there came a Young Fellow, and hired himself unto the Proprietor as Assistant General Manager, the Proprietor himself being the General Manager.

And for a season the Young Fellow knew his place, and kept it. And he learned the Business, until he knew its Middle Name.

And after a season he began to make Suggestions.

And the Proprietor answered him, saying, I was in this Business before thou wert born.

And the Young Fellow answered him, saying, That is just what is the matter with thee, and with this Business. I have been born but few years, but I have learned something every day, and thou hast had no New Idea since about 1863.

And the Proprietor was wroth, and fired the Young Fellow.

Then did the Young Fellow go unto certain men, and say, Stake me, I pray thee, and I will start a Business which will make this trade sit up and take notice. For behold, my late Employer hath Fired me for trying to give him the benefit of a few ideas that originated since 1492.

And a few men resolved to take a little Flier, and they set him up in the same kind of Business that he had lately left.

Now his late Employer looked forth across the way, and he saw a Large Sign on a Small Office, and he laughed and said, That Young Fellow will be Insolvent in about Ninety Days.

But before the end of Ninety Days the Old Man was losing customers.

And the Young Fellow failed not, but lengthened the cords of his tent, and strengthened his stakes.

And there came a day when the Proprietor sent over for the Young Fellow, and said, I am getting old, and thinking of retiring. What wilt thou give me for the Whole Shooting Match?

And the Young Fellow had been waiting and toiling for that hour. And he said, Nay; let us merge the two plants, and thou mayest have a safe investment for thine accumulated wealth, and come and sit at the desk of the President, but I will be General Manager and Chairman of the Board of Directors.

For Henry Clay was right when he said, I would rather be right with the Chairman of the Board of Directors than be President. Or words to that effect.

Now this parable teacheth that there come times when it is the part of Wisdom for Age to lend an attentive ear to the counsels of Youth. For some concerns go broke for lack of the wisdom of experience and more go broke because they cease to learn.

And that is why I and Keturah—we refuse to Grow Old.

To Our Subscribers

It requires two weeks to make a change of address. It is necessary that our wrappers be addressed a full week ahead, and time is required to handle accurately the large volume of requests for change that come to us at this season of the year. Unless your vacation period is somewhat extended, we advise that you leave a few one-cent stamps with your postmaster or postman, and ask to have your Christian Century forwarded to you. You thus avoid the risk of missing a copy both at the beginning and at the end of your vacation.

We desire that our readers shall not miss a single issue, and while we will gladly make any change of address requested, we are sure the risk of irregularity is greatly reduced by the plan we suggest.

Experience proves that it is highly unsatisfactory to handle a change and a change back in one order. Our subscribers on vacation will therefore please take note that in their own interest we are disregarding all deferred "change back" orders and will wait for specific instructions at the time the subscriber wishes the "change back" to be made.

Two good rules to remember:

1) One change at a time;
2) Give present as well as new address.

The Future of the Disciples of Christ

By Joseph Fort Newton

ONE of my earliest memories as a reader of books goes back to a page in the Life of Alexander Campbell, telling of his reflections as he paused with a companion on the heights of the Blue Ridge mountains, and gazed upon the far-stretching lands to the west. Sitting on his horse, he meditated aloud on the future of the land spread out before him, surveying it, like Moses of old, as a land of promise in which the gospel of Christ might run and be glorified, making human society a beloved community. No other thought filled his mind; no other passion swayed his life. He saw a far-reaching opportunity not for wealth, nor for power, but for Christian enterprise; but he also saw that a divided Christianity was unequal to the conquest of America—and his insight is as valid today as it was long ago.

Judged by any test, Alexander Campbell is one of the really great figures in the history of American Christianity. Less a mystic than his father, he was an abler scholar, preacher and leader—a man of undoubted genius, more a teacher than an evangelist—and it is to be regretted that his name is linked with issues in their nature ephemeral; though in his debate with Robert Owen he made the whole church his debtor. Both father and son had experienced the pettiness and futility of sectarianism in Scotland—where sects were small enough to be called insects—and it seemed incredible to them that all the old divisions should be transplanted, much less perpetuated, in America. Hence the "Declaration and Address" proposing Christian union, formulated in 1809, while they were yet Presbyterians, which must be accounted an outstanding document in our religious history, all the more remarkable when we remember the narrow, bitter, vindictive sectarianism of the time.

REFORMATION IN BEHALF OF UNITY

Reformers always hark back to a purer, nobler past, and it was nothing short of a New Reformation which the Campbells proposed, invoking the example and authority of the primitive church in behalf of unity, as Luther had invoked it in behalf of liberty. With magnificent audacity they appealed "To all that love our Lord Jesus Christ, in sincerity, throughout all the churches, to unite in the bonds of an entire Christian community—Christ alone being the head, the center, his word the rule; an implicit belief of, and manifest conformity to it in all things—the terms." Read in the context of that generation, such an appeal was at once heroic and prophetic, but it was a voice crying in a wilderness. Besides, by a sad fatality, it contained within itself the seeds of all the old contentions. Anyone can be wise after the event, but it is easy now to see that the last clause of the appeal, stating the "terms" of union, was destined to be the rock on which the movement would come to grief. The distinction between matters of faith and matters of opinion was valid; but as it was impossible to agree as to what are matters of faith, and what matters of opinion, the door was left ajar for the spirit of schism to work its unhappy ends.

Nothing could be simpler than to affirm that only matters of faith, things essential to salvation, were to be made tests of a united Christian fellowship. But when the exigencies of organization made it necessary to be specific the leaders had to reckon with two mutually exclusive, if not mutually destructive, principles—the authority of primitive Christianity, and the obligation of Christian unity. The first took form in a famous epigram: "Where the scriptures speak, we speak; where they are silent, we are silent." The second found form in an old maxim: "In essentials, unity, in non-essentials, liberty, in all things charity"; but the details were difficult, and doubly so as the emphasis began to shift from the obligation to unity to the principle of authority, since the question as to what are the essentials was left unsettled. Two schools of interpretation arose, one crudely literal, after the manner of the time—often running to an arid legalistic formalism—the other in the direction of a more liberal and spiritual reading of the gospel. Those schools survive to this day, with varying degrees of conflict and cooperation; but even thus early a movement intended to end sectarianism began to look like another sect—one more faction in a bewildering agglomeration of factional feud.

NEW LEADER OF MOVEMENT

There is no need to follow in detail the vicissitudes of the movement as it passed out of Presbyterianism, into the Baptist fellowship, and beyond into a distinct body. Had Campbell remained the only leader, it is not difficult to tell what turn it would have taken. More given to proselytism than to evangelism, he felt that "to attempt union among jarring sects without the explosion of their foundations, is altogether fruitless." Indeed, in his zeal of "the ancient order of things"—by which he meant the reproduction of the apostolic church in modern days—he became for a time furiously iconoclastic against human opinions and innovations, ready to throw them all on the scrap pile—apparently not realizing that he was trying to set up another set of opinions. He was convinced that "a week's debating is worth a year's preaching," surely a novel method of promoting Christian unity! As a lad I read all his great debates, rejoicing to see lithe and sinewy intellects meet in the clash of wits, but wondering the while at the issues about which they made so much ado. Happily a gentler, more spiritual influence entered the movement with Barton W. Stone, who, next to Walter Scott, ranked with the Campbells among its leaders. His wise tolerance, his noble evangelism, his deep spirituality modified the movement, turned it toward the winning of souls, and revived its almost forgotten passion for Christian unity.

Some of us have always felt that Stone was nearer to the real spirit and basis of Christian unity than any one else in the entire group. Even at this far off date it makes the heart beat faster to read the story of his religious struggle, his revolt against a dark, benumbing Calvinism, and his discovery of the love of God—"that God loved the world, the whole world, and sent his son to save it!" A deep and vivid experience of this truth lay at the root of his passionate and persuasive evangelism, giving beauty to this spirit and wings to his words. Also, his agonizing difficulties regarding more than one doctrine—including the trinity—taught him that one may be orthodox of heart, and loyal to the Master, even when unable to accept cut and dried dogmas as to his nature and person. His religion was evangelical and biblical rather than metaphysical, and he was unwilling to make any theological dogma, or even a baptismal formula, a test of Christian fellowship. He preached much the same truth that Campbell preached, but in a different spirit and with a different emphasis—with more love, more sympathy, more liberty, more patience—seeking to lead men to Christ and leave them in his company to be taught by him, without insisting in advance and in detail on what they ought to learn! Had his insight and method been followed the movement would have had a different history, less prone to a hard formalism, and it would have led us nearer to the goal of Christian unity—which was the initial inspiration and purpose of the enterprise.

SIMPLE AND DIRECT APPEAL

In these despites, the new reformation grew rapidly and spread widely, following, alas, the usual course of denominational development; and the reasons were not far to seek. It was democratic, in spirit as well as in form, founded upon the right of every one to read and interpret the Bible for himself, and to have a voice in the management of his religious inheritance. It was simple and direct in its appeal, offering a definite proposal, relying upon the free agency of men, and demanding action, obedience, adventure, over against the perplexing supernaturalism and mysticism of the day, which seemed to ask men to wait for the winds of God to sweep them into the kingdom of heaven. No wonder it attracted plain, practical, unmystical folk who earnestly desired to know what the Lord required of them. It was tirelessly evangelistic, its preachers being men of the people, many of them untaught, who united moral earnestness with great native ability in their ceaseless labors—holding before multitudes weary of the pettiness of sectarianism the vision of unity and fraternity. When the civil war broke out the Disciples, taking their lead from Campbell, stood against slavery, but equally against all war as un-Christian—a fact worthy of grateful remembrance today. Campbell died in 1866, and the mantle of leadership fell upon Isaac Errett, who struck a new note emphasizing the spirit over the letter, calling for "the union of believers in the fellowship of the gospel, and the education of Christians in a nobler spiritual life." He put his plea into a watchword: "Let the bond of union among the baptized be Christian character in place of orthodoxy—right doing in place of exact thinking." If only he had left out the words "among the baptized," or at least had allowed liberty of interpretation in the matter of baptism, he would have made much greater advance—but it was not to be so.

So much for the past. It is a goodly inheritance, a noble tradition, at once a challenge and a prophecy, and it justifies an honorable pride in all who love the Christian cause. If its early vision of a united church, with Christ himself as the chief corner stone, was Utopian in its day, it was none the less heroic and alluring, as well as providential, in spite of an impossible basis of union and the frequent inconsistency of its advocates. Often torn by internal disputes between literalists and liberals—as witness the incredible schism about church organs—as a fact the Disciples have had few seceders, and their loose form of organization makes their comradeship and loyalty all the more notable. At no time have they forgotten that their special mission was to teach the desirability of, and if possible to show the way to Christian unity, but their unique message has been held somewhat in abeyance in recent years. Their position today as a separate communion is utterly anomalous in the light of this origin and history; and while they may refuse to accept it as either justifiable or final, the fact remains that they are regarded, if not as a sect among sects, at least as a full-fledged denomination, with "all the emoluments thereunto appertaining." As such they have rapidly advanced in influence and power, noble in educational enthusiasm, fruitful in missionary enterprise, rich in pastors, teachers, evangelists, and leaders in all walks of life.

VISION OF UNITED CHURCH

What of the future? Unless we are to admit the dictum of that cynic, that the only lesson learned from history is that men learn nothing from history, the history of the Disciples of Christ must have taught us something. For one thing, it is plain that union based on the letter of the New Testament is impossible and undesirable. Agreement on such matters will never be realized on earth—not while grass grows and water runs. Nor is it worth our time to seek it, because, as Campbell himself saw, to have the ancient order of things without its spirit and power "would be mere mimicry, which we are assured the primitive saints would rather never see." For the same reason he feared, at times, that the "name Christian will be as much a sectarian name as Lutheran, Methodist, or Presbyterian." What he feared has actually happened, and inevitably so when it is made a synonym, if not of theological dogma, certainly of ritual uniformity in respect of baptism. No, the letter killeth; it is the spirit that maketh alive, and when we have the spirit of the primitive church—free, happy, heroic, dynamic, creative—debating about the letter looks like tithing mint, anise, and cummin.

By the same token, the only basis of union among Christians is the vision of Christianity, not as a system of dogma, nor an order of rites, but a way of life, a spirit, a temper, a service of love and joy. It is in the realm of the ethical and spiritual, and therefore the practical and universal, that unity can be attained. How can this be, since men differ almost as much in ethical insight and judgment as in theology? Manifestly, it can only be realized by loyalty to a person, by fellowship with the living Christ, by growing together into his largeness as we serve together in his spirit. George Eliot was right:

"What we believe divides us, whom we believe unites us." The apostolic band differed in taste, temperament, training, and point of view, but they were one in their love of the Master and their fellowship of his presence and purpose. No other tie held them together; no other could do it. They, too, had differences, and even disputes, but in the end it was a common and like precious fellowship with a living Lord that made the many one in faith and hope and love.

When Barton Stone insisted on making a simple confession of faith in Christ as the Son of God the only test of fellowship, his insight was as straight as a line of light. But, alas, it soon became evident that much else was implied in that simple confession. Indeed, a whole system of dogma was implied, and it became as hard and fast as if it had been elaborated and written down in a Westminster confession of faith. So, and naturally so, a system of dogma became the real bond of unity, and not simple loyalty to Christ. And the same is true today. However loudly the Disciples may deny that they have a creed and make it a test of fellowship, the fact is that they have an unwritten creed, implied if not affirmed, and woe be to him who questions it. Always it has been so. Must it be so always? Must every effort to end sectarianism end by adding another sect to the list? Must we always thrust a system of dogma—a dogma about baptism, if no other—between men and the Master of men, insisting that they accept our dicta if they are to have our fellowship? By what right or authority do we deify our opinions and interpretations, and demand that men accept them if they are to work with us in the fellowship and enterprise of Christ?

THE TEST OF FELLOWSHIP

But, it will be said, we must obey Christ. Exactly, but when we draw a circle and shut out those who differ from us in the details of dogma and rite, we are disobeying him —professing to obey his word while crucifying his spirit. Looking at the realities of life and the gospel, how can a man bring himself to think that Jesus intended that the question whether water should be poured upon a man, or the man put under the water, should be a test of Christian fellowship? Yes, we must obey Christ, but what does he command? "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another, as I have loved you." That is the supreme commandment, and the measure of its obedience. Will any Christian thinker say that Jesus makes immersion, or any other such question, a test of his fellowship with us? If so, he must face the alternative which excludes from Christian fellowship not only the blessed Quakers, but at least seven-tenths of the entire Christian community of all ages! The religion of Christ is love, or it is nothing. Of course, we pay lip-service to that truth. We press it upon individuals. With resounding eloquence we urge it upon classes and nations as the only final solution of social and international difficulties. Why cannot we act upon it ourselves in our mutual relations as churches? If the church cannot realize the will to loving fellowship in its own life, how can it play other than a secondary, if not an insignificant, part in the world?

After all, what is Christianity? One text tells it all: "For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." What is the basis upon which men seeking goodness may unite, that all may pray of each one and each one share the faith of all—that in fellowship we may learn what none may know alone? "The solid foundation laid by God remains, and this is its inscription: 'The Lord knows who are his, and let every one who names the name of the Lord give up evil.'" Words have their uses, but realities must rule and first things must come first. Not identity of opinion about Christ, but sympathy with his spirit, and the wish to follow him in his sole occupation of doing good, must be the basis of fellowship in the church of today, as it was in the beginning. The business of the church is to bring men to look upon life as Jesus looked upon it—to make them disciples of his faith, his courage, his pity, his great brotherly heart of goodwill—and send them into the world to persuade men to be little brothers of the Lord Jesus.

CONTINUE LEADERSHIP TOWARD UNITY

If in all these many words I have written with burning earnestness, it is because I know the Disciples of Christ, from the inside as well as the outside. Nay, more; I love them, I believe in them, and I share to the full their historic and heroic passion for a united Christian community. Indeed, I count myself a member of their gracious company, as I do of all fellowships that seek to carry forward the cause of Christ and his spirit of creative goodwill among men. Therefore I make plea to them, both by the obligations of their history and the passion of their hearts, not to let the leadership toward Christian unity pass out of their hands, as it seems well nigh to have done. The question is, have the Disciples of Christ the faith, the courage, the divine audacity—such as the Campbells had in their day—to go a step further in following Christ? Today, as of old in the gloaming of the day, he makes as though he would go further on, higher up, leading us into new enterprise in a new, strange, and almost terrifying world. Shall we detain him for a night, or rise up and follow him into a new day—into a new synthesis of Christian insight, enterprise and expectation which shall make our present divisions seem like men playing with the toys of religion!

Suppose, at their approaching convention, the Disciples of Christ should set forth, not a system of dogma, much less an order of rite, but a proclamation of love of Christ and one another as the basis of Christian union—nothing else, nothing less—and the doing of the things he told us as the way to the realization of that love as the power of salvation, not only of our own souls, but of the church and the world! Suppose they should be daring enough to propose the renunciation of the corporate selfishness which they like the rest of us share, and declare their willingness for their body to die, if need be, that the love of Christ may live and grow, appealing, once more, to all who love

Christ in sincerity to join in the bonds of an entire Christian community—love of Christ, not uniformity of opinion about him to be the only tie—what might not such a gesture mean to the broken and scattered body of the crucified Christ! Speak to the followers of Christ that they go forward!

Little Biographies of Lustrous Americans

By Joseph Ernest McAfee

VII

YOU would be surprised to find him keeping restaurant in an inland town. He is surprised, himself. He is trying to succeed where two Greeks have recently failed. Which shows that his old-time nerve has not deserted him. He got the place at a bargain. All he paid was the face of the ten-thousand-five-hundred-dollar note which the defaulting proprietors left in the bank. He is all that could be desired in the way of affability, hustle, cleanliness, and volubility. That last is a prime asset in the operation of some eating-houses in some localities. The quarters are sumptuous, considering the locality and the volume of business. It and its furnishings are reminiscent of the good old days when the daily intake at the cash register was five hundred dollars, and seem incongruous among the present meager pickings of fifty as a liberal average. That counter for stool customers cost twenty-five hundred dollars all by itself, and these stupendous mural paintings—stupendous in their dimensions and in some other surprising particulars—well, how shall art be reckoned in gross dollars? The first on the left is labeled "The Lusitania," so that everybody can tell just what it is. The structure, hurt to the death and about to plunge to the quiet depth, quitting a very turbulent surface, is a cross between Noah's ark and one of Mark Twain's Mississippi River steamboats. Midget creatures, to be identified as human beings, are dribbling over the sides in numerous trickles, to join the element where they are supposed to be little at home, but their conduct does not betoken serious perturbation. Opposite, an enormous canvass depicts a scene in the Rocky Mountains, where a graceful Adirondack deer in the foreground slakes his thirst from an East Tennessee stream of water. The former owners were Greeks, but their artist soul was cosmopolitan. Our present owner is proud of all his array of art, a dozen such canvasses, but he himself is the central piece. His slight, wiry form is reminiscent of the early days when he weighed in as a jockey at eighty-five pounds, and mounted the Kentucky horse who won against the pride of the Prince of Wales' own stables on the English track. When he attained a hundred and sixty pounds, he was too much for such sport. For eighteen years, all told, with intermissions as cook and restaurant proprietor here and there, he has served in the United States navy. If the late war had continued a bit longer, he woud have had a command of his own. Fighting Bob Evans, in the Caribbean back in '98, declared he could go to sleep in a fog, if our hero were on the bridge as his navigation officer. He holds up a shattered hand and tells how a ball went through it in the engagement off Cuba when Cervera's fleet finally ventured out to sea. The other hand supplies the finger which pulled the trigger which sent the musket ball into the gold lace on the person of the commander of the Maria Teresa. He knows his was the shot among all the shots which wrought so doughtily: to this very day he can see the Spaniard topple to his last fall. He is still a reserve officer of the navy. In his youth his father signed for him a bond which holds him to this allegiance until the age of sixty-two. At every launching of the navy he receives an official communication, announcing the event, and enclosing warrant for transportation at the government's expense. He can attend or not as he may elect. But always is he in reserve, his whereabouts a matter of record, charged to be ready at call. Personally he is sure Uncle Sam makes a mistake in scrapping battleships, for all will be needed in the still inevitable war with Germany. In the meantime he is making every guest in his eating-house feel that he is a guest indeed. When weevils resist all efforts to drown them in the milk of the breakfast cereal, he is prompt and generous in substituting dry toast on the menu. He is a scornful rebuke to the canard that Americans are provincials; he is a cosmopolite. How futile that an inland town, two thousand miles from salt-water, should confine him! Though he has well nigh forgotten how to open a blue-point, his days as a chef in the old Hoffman house are a living memory.

VIII

THE nearest he has to a home is two-by-four bachelor quarters in a metropolitan club. He is a clubman. Not a gilded one. His club is high-brow, not plutocratic. The name sounds nifty, whatever the qualification. The club quarters are the faded and frayed relic of the greatness of two generations ago, where now none too pecunious devotees of art and literature foregather. Perhaps he would fain be one of the other kind of clubman, but since he cannot he shares the high-brow's scorn of plutocracy—within reason.

He needs all the spiritual sustenance of his art and his literature to buoy him. He gazes from the one narrow window of the hole-in-the-wall which he calls home, upon walls, and then more walls, red walls, and universes of walls that may have been red once but which are now gray, gray with paint which was once white, and gray with age.

There are fire-escapes, miles of them, twisting and writhing like serpents up the sides and around the corners of the walls. Down in the narrow, concrete-paved pit from which the crowding walls have been restrained, there grows an ailanthus tree. An ailanthus is even equal to that. It actually grows, and appears to find a certain joy in life. A well-known railroad company has discovered the ailanthus and has started to propagate it in barren, cinder-covered areas of its yards, from which every other kind of vegetation has fled in despair. The gardener-horticulturist reserves his most venomous curses for the ailanthus, but our clubman must bless the reputedly noxious intruder, if he has any pastoral soul left. It is his one reminder of the Garden of Eden from which city-dwelling humanity has so sadly fallen.

It is hot. It is terribly hot. It is terrifyingly hot. A certain club-woman of his acquaintance down-stairs has announced that she will engage to stand it just one more day. After that the powers-that-be in the universe must take their chances; she will not be responsible longer for what may happen to her, or to others through her. Yesterday two perished of the heat in his city; the day before that six. They simply lay down and died, or toppled over dead without taking the pains to lie down beforehand.

Even if there were any air stirring, no zephyr could penetrate to his one narrow window, for between it and any of the outside but a faint, dim, far-away, straight-up spot of blue, there are walls, and walls, and ever more walls, five stories high, ten stories high, twenty stories high, and copings and water tanks above that.

Multitudes swelter in the heat, and welter in the squalor which their enervation and cramped quarters inevitably breed, but they are poor. They cannot help it, or think they cannot. Nobody ever suggested to them that they could help it, at least not in language which they could understand.

But he is different. He is cultured. He is versed in the affairs of men in all lands and all ages. He consorts with artists and litterateurs, shares their passions, and sounds the depths of their soul-springs. This is his home from choice. No, not untarnished, unfettered choice, but choice-on-the-whole. This is life. This is the determining, continuing, molding, ineluctable, unescapable and not sought-to-be-escaped note in his soul's harmony.

He lives immersed in this, winters and autumns and springs, and this withering summer season finds him still gazing out at walls, walls, walls. Of course he is not a bound prisoner. He is allowed out for his meals. He knocks about evenings. There is a library down stairs, and the papers and magazines are always under hand. Indeed, the denizen of the tenement goes to the movie, and gossips with a wide circle of neighbors and acquaintance. These are brothers except in degree, a degree of difference so slight as to be indistinguishable to the bumpkin of the open fields.

IX

HERE is our clubman, again. He is not at home. He has fled from his crypt among the walls of his voluntary prison. The withering heat finally wilted even his spirit, which club life has only calloused and encrusted. Yet he has not fled far. He has not needed to. His journey was scarcely a hundred miles, an afternoon's run in a friend's car. He has no car. On the whole he does not want one, considering that his friends have cars.

Now he looks out upon no walls. Between him and the vast above, there are but filmy birch leaves idly dancing in the gentle breeze. Between him and the horizon of his farthest vision there is—nothing, absolutely nothing around a half of the circle. Topping the edge of things are waving mountain summits, thirty, fifty, sixty miles away. In the foreground is greenery, the richest and softest and most satisfying greenness which the human eye encounters. Beyond that is a valley which the eye can plummet only in the gap where the foreground abruptly breaks. In that gap there peeps out from among the trees, which in the distance look like rank, lush grass, the glinting white sides of houses of a considerable village, and in the center of the little cameo, which they and the greenery present, the slender spire of a church overtopping all.

Beyond that break there roll hills upon hills, and mountains upon mountains, and at the horizon Ossa and Pelion themselves, of which tales are told running back, not, indeed to the antics of Olympians off their divinified guard, but to the malign watchfulness of skulking Indians and the triumphant watchfulness of the flooding pioneers, physical and spiritual progenitors of us all.

The half circle is complete, fringed only by these noble mountains. Behind are their partner mountains, the noblest of the host that on which our clubman's shell-like cabin nestles. By this background he is overwhelmed, not by its frown or its beetling crags, but he nestles in its overpowering security.

He reads in his familiar newspaper, of the daily writhing and sweltering of the hosts in the city heat. But only cool breezes and tingling evening balms reach him. Last night, in the center of that majestic semi-circle which describes his forward horizon there was a sunset the like of which human language never described and before which the most vivid and entrancing colors and lines of the greatest painter who ever lived or shall ever live, must degenerate into a pallid smear. The air about him is a billowing succession of odors such as no apothecary ever compounded, mingling the scent of an inexhaustible variety of flowers, changing with each phase of the season, and the intoxicating mold and must of all out-of-doors. Wild fruits, and the less tangy imitations which the blundering science of men has also produced, grow round about, almost within reach of his arm where he sits.

Two weeks of this, one week, at most a month. Then back he scurries to his hole in the wall, to the soot and the grayness, gray-red and gray-white, of walls and walls and more walls.

And this is civilization. This is our clubman's legacy of adventure bequeathed from his knightly ancestor who jousted the tourney for its daring moment, and lay fever-withered for unreckoned weeks recovering from his wounds. He, no more than his ancestor, can stand all of either. But is this civilization, this breath of clean, pure air, and this dull eon of soot and walls and viewless grayness? Will not true civilization contrive a fusion of these, until the sensory and the intellectual gratifications of both shall merge? Must man forever live two lives to attain the complete life? Must city always be city and country always country? Must we forever flee the one to attain the other? Shall civilization never become civilization?

Mysticism—Priestly and Prophetic

By Arthur B. Patten

LET us recall our definition. Mysticism is "the doctrine that man may attain through contemplation and love to an immediate consciousness of God." The priest's contemplation and love bow him before God at the altar; the prophet's lift him and set him with his face toward the people. It is said that the priest goes from men to God, and that the prophet comes from God to men. But in the true mystic, the two become one. The prophet-priest meets the ministering God at his throne in the midst of men. His contemplation is vitalized into noble thinking, and his love breathes the spirit of both the great commandments. He does not so much think God's thoughts after him, as with him, and he not only embosoms himself in the love of God for his own delectation, but he also embraces the divine love for men, and so becomes one of the lesser sons whom God gives in love to the world that other men may not perish, but may have the eternal life of love. Here Christ rises to the distinction of Lord and Savior.

The priest is called to conduct worship, and the prophet to lead thought. But Jesus would sweep them both into the higher unity, for he declares, "God is spirit, and they that worship him must worship in spirit—and in truth." So worship is a function of thought, and thought is a feature of worship. Mysticism must never mean mystification, but rather clarity, conviction, and crusading passion. The psalmist was a pragmatic mystic, who was able to say, "As I was musing, the fire burned." The mystic's direct experience of God must be directed to some high prophetic end, as well as developed in some great priestly mood. Mood and mastery must meet, and feeling and thought must fuse in the altar flame.

RENOVATED MYSTICISM

There is not a little "revived mysticism" being proclaimed today that falls far short of being renewed mysticism, for it lacks the modern ideal of God. It lacks Christ's vision for a renovated world. Any mysticism which carries one to the altar, but does not "carry on" into thought life, and above all, into thought for life, is devoid of the modern experience of God. And it is indeed divested of Christ's experience, for the master came back from the mighty meditation of the wilderness, not only in the spirit of wonder and adoration, but in the spirit of his divine crusade; he returned to make the synagogue ring with the ardor of his apostolate, as he cried, "The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor, deliverance to the captive, recovery of sight to the blind, and liberty to them that are bruised—to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord." No worship can be mystically great unless it is meaningful, and able to visualize the circle of at least one golden year with a program acceptable to God.

If to get into tune with the infinite, a man neglects the finite harmonies of common life, or despairs of their power, he misses the very music of the gospel as it thrilled in the soul of Christ.

AN ADEQUATE OBJECTIVE

When the true mystic goes to church, it must be in the spirit of that other psalmist who went both "to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple." We need for great devotion, at once more adoring wonder in our hearts, and more detailed ethical content in our thoughts. We must ask many spiritual questions and find many potential answers in the sanctuary, if we are to commune deeply with the God who is a providence for all earthly affairs. We need a new discipline at the altar, but it must be a discipline of application as well as of adoration. Detached exercises in the closet or in the church will never enthrone God in the kingdom of heaven on earth. Even if we shut the door, we shall need to leave some window open toward the Jerusalem of our human citizenship. Otherwise our worship will be merely exoteric and not effectual for saving good.

One modern advocate of a revived mysticism recently wrote, "To love God with the brooding love that finds its absorbing occupation in the mere gazing upon the beloved is a liberal education." That may be revived medieval mysticism, but it is not renewed Christian mysticism. To make an absorbing occupation of gazing upon God may educate various vagrant emotions, but it will never edify the thoughts, not energize the will. We are to seek God not only as an indulgent father, but also as the Lord of life. Christ prayed the supreme mystical prayer when he cried, "I thank thee, O father, Lord of heaven—and earth—that thou dost reveal thyself unto the childlike in spirit. Come unto me, O my brothers, and I will give you my rest. Come and find rest in that yoke-fellowship with me which makes all burdens light." Any other attitude makes the school of devotion a finishing school and not a fitting school. We are to seek our liberal education in the experience of Christ's God, who is the Lord of all life.

We should have no interest in reviving the spirit of any cloistered cult, since what Christianity demands is vital culture for the courageous and creative life. Our watchword should be that on the corner-stone of an eastern Y. M. C. A., "To God: For Man." Unless we are ready to make God's altar also his throne, we cannot worship his saving will. To contemplate God's attributes is good, but to consider getting into action with his purpose is better—and it is always best of all to do both.

We may well turn to Isaiah as a bright example of balanced devotion. He adored Jehovah with consummate awe; he confessed his sin and that of his people with prostrate humility; he pled for healing and help with a sense of uttermost dependence upon God—and then he stood forth requisitioned and dauntless, protesting in the urgency of his high commission, "Here am I; send me!" Isaiah was a mighty mystic, for he felt the immediate touch of God, in a fresh and uncanonical experience—but it was an experience that knew no absorbing retirement at the altar; it was an experience that put him on the spiritual firing-line of his nation; it was an experience that made his closet and his church the power-station and the lighthouse of Jehovah's dynamic. Here was a prophet-priest who was a direct, and a live-wire from the throne. Little wonder that they named after him a second Isaiah who cried, "For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until her righteousness go forth as brightness, and her salvation as a lamp that burneth."

GETTING RIGHT WITH GOD

No priestly observance, however reverential, will put one right with God, unless it reconciles one to a righteous God and commissions him for human righteousness. We can worship in the light as God is in the light only as we get ready to walk in the light, and to have fellowship with men in organized good will. Then even humility and resignation will not set a man right with God. They will only bow him at the place of power; they will not empower him. A certian mystic has recently advised, "Learn the art of priestly self-effacement." Yet Christ's word was not effacement, but fulfilment. He enjoined repentance—but always repentance unto righteousness. His word was, "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." To get right with God was to get right in his kingdom of righteousness. And yet the mystic just quoted has said again, "The world is waiting for souls who are wholly detached from earthly considerations, and wholly attached to God"—as if such abstraction were ever possible in God's kingdom of relativity, to say nothing of righteousness. No individual soul can find salvation in an isolated reciprocity even with God; for a man cannot get right in love with the God whom he has not seen, unless by the same token he gets right with his brothers whom he has seen. This surely was the sentiment of the Christ who said that no gift could be acceptable at the altar of God's Fatherhood, unless the devotee enthroned thereon the reconciling grace of brotherhood. Only final defeat awaits the man who tries to capitulate to God in priestly surrender of his own soul, until he is ready to give his very life to help capitalize God's prophetic adventure for creating a friendly world. This indeed is capital and crowning mystical experience which finds God where he lives. It is the experience of God in the society of his other children,—a society which his saved sons and daughters must hasten to make Christian at whatever cost—not by self-effacement, but by self-giving.

"THE GREATEST SAYING"

So God seeks from the mystic soul both the priestly prayer of a contrite love and the prophetic promise of a loving faith, at once worshiping, and working out salvation in a world of growing brotherhood. He asks "no knotted scourge nor sacrificial knife," but rather humility and "a reasonable service of good deeds."

> Sweeter are comrade kindnesses to Him,
> Than the high harpings of the seraphim.

He asks no mortification, but the death to sin; and he recognizes no merit, but the faith that works by love. There is no value in any immolation, nor is there worth in any inspiration, unless they impel alike to the sacrifice of life unto life, as they lead to the serving of God in the service of men. But a special descent of the Spirit comes upon those who espouse high causes at the altar.

There is but one answer to the immemorial question, "Wherever shall I come before the Lord?" We can make that supreme answer only as we avow with Micah that greatest saying of the Old Testament, fulfilled in the Christ of the New, "He hath shown thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

Two Communion Services

By William J. Lhamon

A WEEK ago today I attended, in company with a niece and nephew, a Lutheran communion service. As a ritual service it was not elaborate, but it was stately and dignified and reverent. There were responsive readings, congregational singing, an anthem by the choir, the recitation of the Nicene creed and the Lord's prayer, a few words of interpretation by the pastor, including a fraternal invitation to visiting Christians to join with them in the "holy communion." The communicants arose and went forward and stood at the altar, as many as might at one time, and were served by the pastor and a helper, first with the wafer, then with the wine. Quite cordially my niece and nephew invited me to accompany them to the altar, and I did. Not to have done so would have been discourtesy, and discourtesy is unChristian.

To me that was a real communion service. It was none the less so because of the Lutheran doctrine of consubstantiation, which, as I suspect, the pastor and his people believe, but which I do not believe. They expressed their faith in the form of the Nicene creed. I cannot do that. As a fourth century dogma with its metaphysical niceties it does not appeal to me. I prefer the simple New Testament teachings about the Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

But I love and honor those who express their faith in such historic forms, even though they wear a name which I prefer not to wear. My heart is constrained to go with them when they surround me with an atmosphere of reverence, devotion, and Christliness. So I feel that if I am worthy to be their brother they shall be my brethren. If Luther were living today, and Calvin, surely they would commune together, for surely they would be touched by the larger, more generous spirit than that of their own age which prevails in our time.

Today I attended a communion service with brethren of my own body of believers. It, too, was devout, reverent and heart-felt. As a ritual it was not so elaborate and stately as the Lutheran service, but it was orderly, prayerful, and impressive. A simple, far-meaning symbol, a beautiful metaphor in bread and wine! As such and no more it spoke to us in its own silent way, through the silence of the assembly, of the life and love and heroism, the death and resurrection of our Lord! Back of it there were no medieval doctrines unacceptable to me and unbelievable by me.

But there came to the surface a form of teaching quite as unbelievable by me, and as unacceptable, as the Lutheran doctrine of consubstantiation. It jars even more, I think. A brother said, "We do not invite anyone; this is the Lord's table, and it is not for us to invite others." Such a pitiable fallacy! And to think that it goes unchallenged! A moment's thought should banish it forever. How could it be the Lord's table without being the table of his children? And have not his children a right to be courteous as my nephew and niece were to me on that other Sunday? You are a father. Your own little boys and girls bring their schoolmates and playmates to your home and your table. You love them for it and encourage them in it. Your home is the happier for it. No real father could forbid it. And the heavenly Father is a real Father, no cold, hard, legalistic, ritualistic, deistic, thirteenth century sort of God, keeping formal, ritualistic, debtor and creditor accounts on our worshipful acts.

So I communed with my Lutheran brethren and with my Disciple brethren. And I had my mental reservations both here and there. And I came away from this service and from that one feeling that I had been in the company of my brethren, and in the presence of my Lord. For I imagine that he, too, was there on both occasions, and that he, too, had mental reservations both here and there.

Three Typical Rural Surveys

When the Interchurch survey was abandoned a committee was formed under the direction of Dr. Edmund de S. Brunner to complete the survey of some thirty rural counties in as many typical sections of the country. The first three of these surveys are now issued by the committee from its headquarters at 111 Fifth avenue, New York. They cover a typical old eastern county in New Jersey, a new pioneer area in Washington, and a mid-west county in Kansas that lies between the other two in social history as it does geographically.

Salem county, New Jersey, has a history of nearly three centuries. Its industry is that of small farming and dairying. Here we find thirty Protestant churches, twenty-four of them with resident pastors. Only 29 per cent of the population are resident members of local churches and 71 per cent of these are active. There are not too many churches but there are too many in some communities and none in others. For instance, there are 3,098 people in one area of whom only 180 are resident church members. The average pastor's salary is $1,113, and one-half of the pastors change every two years. Only twelve of the thirty churches made any gains last year and the net increase of membership for the entire county was 1 per cent, the larger churches absorbing this increase.

In Pend, Oreille County, Washington, which is devoted largely to lumbering with farms following in as the land is cleared, there are only seven Protestant churches, with three ministers residing in the county. One-third of the communities are without churches, 7 per cent of the population are Catholic, only 5 per cent are members of the seven Protestant churches and 81 per cent of them are active. In other words, out of a population of 6,363 there are only 341 resident members in the Protestant churches. Out of 586 farmers only twenty are church members. The pastors in this county are supported partly by missionary funds. Local giving is generous, amounting to $36.00 per capita, but three pastors and 272 active church members cannot give religious administration to so large a pioneer community, even though one of the pastors does minister to eight different communities.

In Sedgwick county, Kansas, there are fifty-three rural churches. It is very remarkable to find twenty-six of them with resident pastors. Here was the scene of very active home missionary enterprise in the eighties. The enterprise, however, had more interest in planning denominational churches than in avoiding conflicts. The result is that there is one church to every 271 people in towns outside of Wichita and one to every 456 in the open country and only 22 per cent of the population are church members. Here 81 per cent of the church members are active. Pastors receive an average salary of $1,289. A 6 per cent gain was registered last year, but the average for nineteen years has been less than 2 per cent. Here again the gain was absorbed by the larger churches.

It is interesting to note in all three counties that giving to missions is generous, running from one-fourth to one-third of the budget, and it is rather striking to note that on the average the churches in the open country excel those of the towns in the proportion of the budget given to missions.

Out of all the surveys so far made perhaps the most striking new discovery is the fact that an average of only about one-fourth of the population will be found to hold membership in churches in the communities where they live. The most gratifying item recorded is that in the pioneer Washington county all missionary work is allocated to one home board. This should prevent that duplication of small, inefficient churches which is the religious scandal of most rural communities.

British Table Talk

London, July 3, 1922.

THE best that can be said of last week is that the government and the people of this country have not yielded to panic; they have taken the position that the Irish Free State must set its own house in order. But apart from this mercy, there is little in the story but tragedy and peril. Some years ago the suspicion of civil war would have filled us with shame and humiliation. Now, like Macbeth, we say

> "I have almost forgot the taste of fears:
> The time has been my senses would have cool'd
> To hear a night-shriek . . . .
> . . . . I have supp'd full with horrors;
> Direness, familiar to my slaughterous thought,
> Cannot once stir me."

It is not improbable that the worst penalty nations pay for war is found in the paralysis of feeling which creeps upon men grown too familiar with suffering and death.

St. Paul's in Danger

The "Parish church of the empire" is reported to be in danger, and one hundred thousand pounds must be raised to make the structure secure. It will be raised without doubt. St. Paul's is a treasure of which we are justly proud. It stands in the heart of the city, a reminder which can never be forgotten of the things which are unseen and eternal. Sir Christopher Wren has left behind him a work, which secures for him an immortality denied to many more prominent in his age, and if only his still greater plans had been carried out, the city would have been incomparably more splendid. We of the present day may easily forget how much more this sanctuary means to us than to our grandfathers. When Church came to be dean from his small Somerset pastorate, the revival was just beginning. For some years before that time Dean Church, it should be remembered, was a little junior to Newman, and St. Paul's had been to Londoners little more than a splendid remnant of the past. Since that time it has been a center of living worship and service. It will not be allowed to lack the means needed to make the fabric safe for all ages. During the air raids which London suffered there was always the fear that bombs might fall on St. Paul's. They came very near at times. The general post office is very near and that was hit, and when the Zeppelins bombed Wood street they were not far away. But nothing hit the cathedral.

Westminister Chapel

The Rev. Sidney M. Berry has elected to remain in Birmingham. Those who know how much Carr's Lane chapel means to Birmingham and how much Mr. Berry means to Carr's Lane will not be surprised at his decision. The Westminster pulpit will always be a preaching center. Whether we shall always have a relay of preachers with the gifts demanded by such a place, no one can tell. The church of England trusts for the most part to select preachers, the free churches to one select preacher. Where it has its Spurgeons or Jowetts, there is no difficulty. But sometimes the suspicion comes that they who built great houses of prayer for the ministry of some such giants were assuming more than they had a right to assume—an unfailing supply not of good preachers only, nor even of great preachers, but of preachers who have the very rare gift of holding thousands week by week, year after year. It is valuable to have a preaching center for visitors to the city and as a sounding board or broadcasting station; but I doubt altogether the value of the practice of drawing worshippers from all sides of a city, by bus, tram, or rail, to a central place. It does people much more good to stay in their own district on Sundays. Too often the vast miscellaneous congregation hides a host of worshippers, who ought to be bearing an active part in their own church. They want, as gardeners say, "bedding out."

The Theological Colleges

It is the season of the year when the colleges for training the ministry present their reports and review their position. At present all the colleges are feeling the after-effects of the war, but I think the worst is over. There are signs that the ministry will not fail to make its appeal to the heart of youth in the coming days. My own college, Mansfield, had a good year, and the same is true of all the other colleges, which have been celebrating their anniversary. Dr. Henderson, after twenty-nine years of service, is laying down his presidency of the Bristol Baptist college, and a great schoolmaster is stepping into his place. The Regents Park college, which means to remove to Cambridge, is to remain for the present in London. At each of the anniversaries some well-known preacher exhorts his younger brethren, the favorite exhorter, needless to say, among the Congregationalists being Dr. J. D. Jones, who everywhere exalts the greatness and dignity and glory of the Christian ministry. One interesting testimony is heard from a well-known layman who has filled great places in his church, in the cotton industry, and in the service of the state. Only once he said had he ever heard any appeal to youth from the pulpit to consider the Christian ministry as a possible life-service. I remember that the late Sir Alfred Dale made almost the same criticism. Is it true? And if so, is it right?

Honors in the State

Everybody here is tired of the honors lists, and there are suspicions abroad that some men, whom the state honors, by a curious coincidence have given substantial aid to party funds. Of course no one knows anything of this officially. The coincidence is purely a coincidence! Severe comments have been made upon the recent honors list, but the weakness of all criticism lies in the fact that this government is only carrying on the practice of other governments, and the men who criticise, many of them, have been members of other administrations which did precisely the same things when they had the chance. Party funds ought to be open to the world. No man or group of men is good enough to be entrusted with money, secretly raised and secretly expended. The same principle holds for all parties, even for the labor party. The citizens of this country ought to know whence come the sinews of war. Such a measure would go far to correct the manifest scandals of an "honors list," in which the real cause for the selection of A, and not B is that A had given generously and B has not to some fund unknown. That is what most men say, and if their suspicions are unfounded, they can easily be shown to be so. There is one city known as the "city of dreadful knights."

Prison Reform

Many things are compelling the nation to consider its prison system. One of the by-products of the war is to be found in the direct experience which many men of education now have of the prison system from within. The conscientious objector is able to speak of that which he has known and suffered. He can compel an attention which was not given to the former prisoners, who were mostly the inarticulate class. That is one factor. Another is the revelation of the fact that a prisoner in the Isle of Wight for attempting to escape was kept in irons. There have been revelations, too, by a doctor who was just released from prison. But most important of all these converging forces is the publication of the report of the Prison System Inquiry committee established by the executive of the labor research department (Longmans, 25 shillings). The committee had for its president Sir Sidney Olivier, a former governor of Jamaica, with these members, Lord Henry Bentinck, Mr. G. H. D. Cole, Mr. Laurence Housman, Dr. Morrison, Mr. G. Bernard Shaw, and Mrs. Sidney Webb. The picture given is a gloomy one, though there are some grounds for hope, and the official mind has not been quite impenetrable. "It is impossible," writes a review in The Manchester Guardian, "however cursory, to survey the whole field covered by this exhaustive treatise. It is hardly conceivable that anyone could read the vivid descriptions of life in our ordinary 'local' and 'convict' prisons—with their depressing bareness, their rule of perpetual silence, their monotonous uniformity, and their obtrusive and militarized discipline—without appreciating the fact that the physical filth and barbarity that characterized our gaols little more than a century ago have been replaced by a system that, in its mental and moral effects upon the prisoner, constitutes but a more refined form of cruelty. Yet, if we consider our penal system as a whole, there is, as the inquiry committee gladly recognizes, a lighter side to the picture."

An Ancient to Ancients

On the much-debated problem of youth and age, to which Sir J. M. Barrie has given a new run, there is a poem of strange dignity in Mr. Hardy's last volume. It is called "An Ancient to Ancients."

"Sophocles, Plato, Socrates,
Gentlemen
Pythagoras, Thucydides,
Herodotus, and Homer,
Clement, Augustine, Origen,
Burnt brightlier towards their setting day,
Gentlemen.

"And ye, red-lipped and smooth-browed; list,
Gentlemen;
Much is there waits you we have missed;
Much lore we leave you worth the knowing,
Much, much has lain outside our ken;
Nay, rush not; time serves; we are going,
Gentlemen."

That and much else in this volume has the ring of sure greatness. Thomas Hardy is now eighty-two. He belongs to an age, of which he is the last to go; and he burns brightly towards the close. He has seemed at times to many of us to single out unduly the dark and ironic mysteries but he has never ceased to have in his eyes the look of one who pitied men, and he has sought to teach "that the greatest of things is charity."

The Pilgrim Spirit

Here are words of singular beauty from one who is honored as a scholar and mystic in all the churches, Dr. J. Rendel Harris:

"The Mayflower celebrations of 1920 have been to myself personally (as well as to troops of my friends) an unexpected illumination. We had almost forgotten the pit out of which we were digged, and the hole of the rock out of which we were hewn. We had taken liberty for granted, without asking anything about the ancestry of the maiden: we had enjoyed a measure of spiritual progress, without recognizing the historical personalities that were involved in their attainment. And then suddenly we received a call from our ancestors, the men of the Mayflower were at the door, and the brave women of the Mayflower also. Our comforts were seen to be the result of their toils, our ease the product of their scars.

"They have come back to stay. We cannot afford to lose them again; their message is what the time requires—that God has more light to break forth from his word. If we can stand with them at Delftshaven we may with them look out hopefully over the broad seas that we also have to sail, and the bright lands that we have to discover. For we also are strangers and pilgrims in the earth, and are becoming aware that God has prepared for us somewhere a spiritual city. And as Plotinus once said, quoting from Homer, 'Let us flee to our dear fatherland.' And he explains that this does not mean a journey on foot, or in a ship, but the closing of the eyes to things outward, in order that we may use those other organs of visions, which all men possess but few employ. Our Mayflower men had the inner vision, and they walked by the inward light. That is why the Little One, in scripture language, became a thousand and grew into a strong nation."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Spiritual Power-House

DR. HARRY F. WARD calls the church "the spiritual power-house." He does not desire to have the church control the state but he does wish to have the church at the center of all activities, as the inspiration of all goodness. The modern preacher does not assume any superiority among men. He moves about as a peer of the best. On the golf links, at the reception, in literary clubs, at banquets, at lectures, on historical occasions, in community enterprises, at church he is a man among men. In the pews sit business men, teachers, experts in various fields, legislators, professional men and the preacher stands up as an expert in his field; he seeks to inspire them all. This is the function of the church, not to rule, but to encourage the best, to reveal God and to teach his will. Theology may or may not be the queen of the sciences, it all depends upon how much inspiration theology can employ. That is the test of the church, the preacher, theology, any individual Christian, any club or group in the church. In a dull, dusty, tired, worn, tempted world men are seeking for encouragement, for vitality, for guidance. Yes, and for the power to do what they feel to be right. Can the church supply this—the program and the power? The church can do this; program and power are forthcoming because the church has the Person. There you have it, the Person of the Master, his program, his power.

Coming back from captivity, the Jews set about making the temple the center of national life. This is evidence that the lesson had been learned. The false gods had been abandoned; idolatry had been put away. Now we are to see the great temple at Jerusalem and in every town the synagog. Religion is to be given the rightful place. The house of God is to be the spiritual power house of the people everywhere. In every village the synagog will be attended and every year a pilgrimage will be made to the great temple in the holy city. The exile had accomplished that much. Today we need such a lesson. It is easy to slam the church; it is hard to replace it. Any hack writer can dash off an article for some light magazine criticising the church and poking fun at the pastor, but who can offer a substitute for the church? Who can come forward with an institution that founds homes for the poor and sick, that sends missionaries to the ends of the earth on meager salaries, that pours out most of the money for all social service and for starving Armenians and Russians, that educates, no matter how poorly, the young in ethics, that meets men at the crises of birth, marriage and death, with uplifting and sanctifying attentions, that creates the profound change in human nature called "conversion." You recall William James's definition of conversion: "That process by which a soul, consciously inferior, divided and unhappy, becomes consciously superior, united and happy." You say Christ, not the church, brings all these things to pass. We grant your contention, but we are talking about Christ's church.

Journeying down the St. Lawrence river, one sees at almost every turn a beautiful picture. There is almost an old-world setting. A church with a tall spire and, clustered close about it, a group of red-roofed cottages. A hen with chickens, you think of. The church is the very center of that community life. The priest is the leader of those happy societies. All of life finds expression through the church. Moreover there is only one church in each community and not six or seven struggling fighting institutions each contending that it alone has "the faith once for all delivered." They tell me that the cathedral towns of England are the poorest and these pictures along the St. Lawrence may seem best from the boat; I do not know, but a true church, a good priest, at the heart of each community ought to be the ideal condition.

* Lesson for August 6. "The Temple Rebuilt and Dedicated." Ezra 3:10-13; 6:14-16.

Here we have one of the strongest pleas for a united church, so that there may be one voice. John A. Hutton is one of the truest voices now speaking and he calls for a united church with one voice. As it is now, the churches only make a noise in many communities, a jargon, a confusion of tongues worse confounded. We are centralizing the schools, we should the churches. Each community needs one great community centre. Dr. Jackson would put the church in this center and be done with all else. Education, recreation, and religion would then radiate from the common center which all the people would regard as their own. Some way must be found so that the church may speak for God to all the people of a given community.

CORRESPONDENCE

Corroborating Our Editorial

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your editorial in the issue of July 13 concerning the "Theological Seventeen" of Columbus, Ohio, is rather misleading in its statement of the case as it relates to the Methodist ministers of the city. In the first place these men were not "pilloried" by their brethren in the ministry. In fact few if any of the ministers had anything to say about the matter until two of the members of the Methodist minister's association who were also members of the "Theological Seventeen" demanded that they should be heard in the Methodist minister's meeting. The matter was presented to the Association and as a matter of courtesy, these men were permitted to present whatever matter they desired, the regular morning program being postponed in order to give them the time. It was understood that a free discussion should follow the addresses of the two members of the "Seventeen" and in as much as they took up the entire morning hour, the meeting adjourned to meet again in the afternoon for discussion.

At no time in the discussion was the question of evolution a matter of argument. In fact few if any, of the Methodist ministers reject the theory of evolution as a probable explanation of the method of creation, nor do they reject the findings of modern scholarship of standing and authority. Most of them are men who are fully as much in touch with "modern scholarship" as are the "Seventeen," but they have not made a fetish of it.

The point at issue in the discussion was the virgin birth and the deity of Christ, neither of which are "modern." In fact the entire matter was threshed out before the "Theological Seventeen" were! Two well defined camps have existed ever since—the Unitarians and the trinitarians! There is nothing either "modern" or new in the position taken by these two champions of the "Seventeen." Channing stated their position years ago with greater clearness than they seemed able to do. In fact they seemed to do anything but clear in what they did believe concerning the deity of Christ. Since this was true and since they seemed inclined to deny not only the virgin birth, but also the deity of Christ and since the Methodist Episcopal church includes both in her system of doctrine and requires all who enter the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church to answer the following questions affirmatively, namely, "Have you studied the doctrines of the Methodist Episcopal church? After full examination do you believe that our doctrines are in harmony with the holy scriptures? Will you preach and maintain them?" the sentiment was expressed by some and seemed to be generally endorsed, that if any minister after mature study and thought found himself no longer in harmony with the doctrines of the Methodist Episcopal church so that he could not "preach and maintain them," there was just one honorable course for him to pursue and that was to withdraw from the ministry of that church and transfer to some other with which he found himself in harmony.

Since that time the Methodist minister's association have put themselves on record as being in harmony with the doctrines of the church and as being in no way responsible for the utterances of the "Seventeen."

All that has been done by the Methodist minister's association has been done in self defense. The issue was forced by the "Theological Seventeen" and not by the ministers. There was no "hubbub" until the statements of the "Seventeen" were broad-casted by the newspapers, and there was a general demand on the part of the churches and public to know where the ministry stood regarding the deity of Christ and other doctrines that had been called in question by these articles and lectures. It was then that the ministry quite generally spoke out in defense of the trinitarian doctrines held by the Methodist and other evangelical churches.

It is doubtful if the Methodist minister's association would ever have seriously taken up the matter, had not the two brethren forced the issue upon them. However, when they did force the issue, they soon found where the Methodist ministers stood on the subject of the virgin birth and the deity of Christ, which were the main points in the discussion. Under the circumstances it ill becomes the members of the "Theological Seventeen" to pose as martyrs to modern scholarship and progressive thought.

"Allegory" and "Correspondence"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: As I lately subscribed for your journal, I have been reading its pages with deep interest. I find in your issue of June 15 an item in the department, "News of the Christian World," page 761, which necessarily interested me very much because I am a minister of the church of the New Jerusalem. I refer to the news item entitled, "Memory of Emanuel Swedenborg Honored." I am sure our church organization appreciates your kindness in printing the fact that photolithographed copies of Swedenborg's works have been gotten out by our church and presented to the leading libraries of England, but when you close the item with the following words, you do not correctly represent Swedenborg's method of handling scripture: "His allegorical method of handling the scripture was an anticipation of the Christian Science method."

Swedenborg's method of handling scripture was "correspondential" and not allegorical, for while it is no doubt true that the word "allegorical," in its most inclusive meaning, might take in Swedenborg's method, it is apt to give a wrong idea of the nature of his interpretation of scripture. This is especially true when you link him up with Christian Science and suggest to the uninformed that there is a definite kinship. On the contrary, Swedenborg's "Science of Correspondence" is a method of interpreting scripture which involves a created universe out of matter, and thus the relation between a natural world and a spiritual world. For "correspondence," in his writings, is the relation which obtains between cause and effect. Consequently, Swedenborg's system of theology is one that is based upon the reality of a material world, but a world created through the spiritual world and of which the Lord was the Creator. "Correspondence" is, therefore, the method according to which the universe has been created and according to it it is to be interpreted, and not according to what is "allegorical," which may mean many things and usually what is fictitious.

Even the first eleven chapters of Genesis, up to the life of Abram, which Swedenborg states in his work, "The Arcana Celestia," is purely correspondential, does not mean there is no historical truth therein portrayed, but it only means that the historical truth is not in the mere letter of the record, but in its "internal sense," which can be seen only in the light of the law ot correspondence. Scripture is written according to the law of correspondence, which includes representatives and significatives, the two last named being remote correspondences. As Swedenborg puts it: "Correspondence is such that what is spiritual is represented in what is natural." And again: "All things of the mind correspond to all things of the body." Swedenborg's method, therefore postulates a material universe and is not idealistic moonshine.

Shall we Discontinue?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have read your editorial, "Who is Guilty of the Murders?" While I am a recent subscriber to the Christian Century, I have become interested in its advanced thought. But if there is to be comfort and encouragement given to anarchists and murderers and traitors to country and to God, I want no more of it. At such a time as this when we are trying to teach Americanism, obedience to law, the sacredness of life, the liberty of every man to honestly work for his own and his family's support, for such an article to appear in a paper pretending to have a moral, not to say religious tone, seems blasphemy. It is from such sources as this that life and comfort is extended to these red handed and black hearted villians who would plunder and kill and destroy our land as has been the case in Russia. As I have already stated, if this is to be the course pursued by this paper, please erase my name from your mailing list and give the balance of my subscription money to some widow or orphan made so by these murderers.

The Path of Light

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: It is a stifling July afternoon; Even that slight energy required for the making of noises seems lacking. The usually fluttering leaves upon nearby trees are motionless, and the stars and stripes droop heavily from their exalted position. A long pavilion, filled with men, has long since quieted to silence.

Bed number three is occupied by a young man, twenty-seven, ordained, ambitious to rise through service. Eager to talk with men, eager to write about men, eager to preach to men—he is yet here.

Upon turning a page of The Christian Century his eye falls upon some verse by Thomas Curtis Clark. Curious, he reads:

"What though the testings irk,
Fret not: mar not his work.
Trust the Great Artist. . . ."

And gratitude fills his soul for the dedicated gift of the poet who can throw such light on a hard pathway.

"OUR BIBLE"

By Herbert L. Willett

One of the most popular volumes ever published by The Christian Century Press. This recent book by Dr. Willett has been received with real enthusiasm by the religious and educational press of the country. The following are a few of the estimates passed upon the volume:

"Just the book that has been needed for a long time for thoughtful adults and senior students, a plain statement of the sources and making of the books of the Bible, of their history, of methods of criticism and interpretation and of the place of the Bible in the life of today."—Religious Education.

"Every Sunday school teacher and religious worker should read this book as a beginning in the important task of becoming intelligently religious."—Biblical World.

"The book will do good service in the movement which is now rapidly discrediting the aristocratic theology of the past."—The Public.

"The man who by long study and wide investigation, aided by the requisite scholarship and prompted by the right motive—the love of truth, not only for truth's sake but for humanity's sake—can help us to a better understanding of the origin, history and value of the Bible, has earned the gratitude of his fellowmen. This we believe is what Dr. Willett has done in this volume."—Dr. J. H. Garrison in The Christian-Evangelist.

"Professor Willett has here told in a simple, graphic way what everybody ought to know about our Bible."—Jenkin Lloyd Jones in Unity.

"Dr. Willett has the rare gift of disclosing the mind of the scholar in the speech of the people."—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

"Interesting and illuminating, calculated to stimulate and satisfy the mind and to advance the devotional as well as the historical appreciation of the Bible."—Homiletic Review.

"One can recall a half-dozen volumes having to do with the origin and the formation of the Scriptures, all of them valuable, but not one so practical and usable as this book."—Dr. Edgar DeWitt Jones.

"This readable work distinctly illuminates both background and foreground of the most wonderful of books."—Chicago Herald.

"The book evinces an evangelical spirit, intellectual honesty and ripe scholarship."—Augsburg Teacher.

"Scholarly but thoroughly simple."—Presbyterian Advance.

"A brilliant and most interesting book."—Christian Endeavor World.

A new edition of this book, Dr. Willett's finest contribution toward a thoroughly reasonable study of the Bible, is just from the press.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Clergy of New York Have a Club

The liberal clergy of New York of the various denominations have a club in which modern religious problems are discussed. This year Dr. Walter Laidlaw is president of the club. Dr. Laidlaw is a Presbyterian of light and leading. Dr. Joseph Fort Newton is one of the governors of the club and Dr. Potterton is also a prominent member. This organization gives a platform on which ministers may air their views with none to make them afraid. Such organizations are to be found in a number of the cities of the land.

Great Baptist Layman Honored

Hon. George W. Coleman, president of Larson Institute, is one of the best known Christian laymen in the land. He has been twice honored with the degree of doctor of laws at the commencement season, the two institutions conferring degrees being Wake Forest College of North Carolina and Franklin college of Indiana. Dr. Coleman has been for years interested in the Christian Endeavor movement, being at one time publisher of the Christian Endeavor World. He also served as president of the Christian Endeavor Union of Boston. In more recent years he has made a name for himself in the practical working out of the forum idea. By means of the forum many churches and community groups have been led to consider the modern application of the gospel to the economic and industrial problems of the people.

G. Stanley Hall Thinks Unitarians are Old-fashioned

Prof. G. Stanley Hall of Clark University recently delivered a lecture on "Morale: the Supreme Standard of Life and Conduct." In the course of this lecture he described how one of the most radical denominations has in his judgment become conservative. He said: "The most liberal of all the Christian denominations still harks back to Channing, Emerson, and perhaps Parker, and in place of the earlier radical Protestantism which characterized it, tends to a mild aestheticism, and is declining because it is uneugenic and does not make good by adding proselytes to make up for its losses from race suicide. With the casting off of old forms it lost the saving sense of reality, and lives with a touch of Narcissusism in a beautiful dreamworld it has made for itself. It disapproves revivals, and its seminaries have not led, as they ought to have done, in the advancement of liberal Christian scholarship. It clings tenaciously to the dogma of a personal objective God and individual immortality, hopes for heaven, but has allowed the doctrine of hell, its vital counterpart, to lapse to innocuous desuetude; while even in the liberalty it has so long plumed itself upon, it is very often surpassed by individual leaders in other denominations commonly thought more conservative. In the most virile and promising movement Protesantism is without any kind of organized advance guard, but is led onward towards freedom by noble volunteers and stragglers."

Evolution of a Great Free-Thinker

No ruler in the world has a more interesting religious history than does Thomas Garrigue Masaryk of Czecho-Slovakia. Belonging in childhood to a small evangelical sect, he went over to the free-thinkers' point of view during early manhood. That he is back on religious ground again is one of the striking facts of the time, though he is a severe critic both of sterotyped Protestantism and of popery. In his writings are to be found some of the most beautiful tributes to Jesus Christ anywhere in current literature. In one of his documents he says: "Christ's whole life is truth. God's Son is the highest simplicity; he shows purity and sanctity in the true sense of the word. Nothing external attaches to him and his life, no formalism, no ritualism; everything comes from the inner being, everything is thoroughly true, thoroughly beautiful, thoroughly good." Masaryk is a total abstainer from liquor, though he allows it to be served on state occasions. His devotion to his American-born wife is one of the outstanding facts of his life. He is an ardent admirer of Tolstoi and during the lifetime of the great Russian paid him a visit on his estate. While his religious views are quite definite, he is an exponent of religious toleration as the national policy of Bohemia. As the Protestant faith organizes itself in Bohemia in various sects, there are several that would like to enroll the president in their membership.

Jews Honor a Protestant Bishop

The Hungarian Jews gave Bishop Dezso Baltazar a warm welcome when he came to America from Hungary recently. The reason for this is not religious agreement but the fact that the bishop in Hungary is one of the foremost opponents of anti-semitism, a man who "stands for scholarship and the brotherhood of man." The bishop presides over a college at Debreczin in Hungary, which is a Calvinistic institution, but the college is open to Jews. This is the only college in Hungary where Jews may enter on equal terms with Gentiles. The bishop was in this country seeking funds with which to meet the pressing needs of his institution which was in danger of being closed on account of war conditions.

Methodist Bishops Issue An Emergency Call

In every Methodist church in the land the emergency call of the bishops is being read this month. At the meeting of the Methodist bishops in Indianapolis recently the state of the centenary fund was reported to be alarming. The big fund of a hundred million dollars is not

Zionist Movement in Palestine Suffers Set-back

THE British occupation of Palestine was the signal to the Zionists to renew activity and they were able to secure from the British governments some very favorable concessions. A declaration was made through Mr. Balfour that the British government looked with great favor on the project of making Palestine a national home for the Jews. At the same time the declaration made it clear that no favors to the Jews should in any way prejudice the rights of any non-Jewish communities in Palestine. Following the declaration a good many Jews have gone to Palestine and the Arabian community which is the majority group in Palestine has protested most vigorously. Acting through Mohammedan groups in other sections, they have been able to secure a certain reversal of attitude on the part of the government. The house of lords voted recently to defer accepting a mandate for Palestine, but they were over-ruled by the House of Commons. Meanwhile the anti-Zionists among the Jews have seized upon the Mohammedan opposition as a signal to warn their foes in the Jewish household of the dangers of a political hope for Judaism. Of course the vast body of Judaism could never find room in Palestine anyway. Among the other difficulties faced by the British government has been the difficulty of getting on with the pope on this question. He did not want Palestine to be made over to the Jews. He made a protest to the British government, and it has been charged by the British Palestine committee that there has been an unnatural alliance between the Mohammedans and the Roman Catholics to embarrass a Protestant nation in administering the mandate in Palestine. It has also been charged that the ancient quarrel between the Roman Catholic church and the Greek church is a part of the motive in the aggressive attitude of the pope. He hopes to secure some advantage over his ancient enemies. Statesmen find always the matter of religious bigotry one of the most baffling things in the government of a country. The Jewish Zionists must be content to make haste slowly, and meanwhile the pope is likely to take anything in Palestine not nailed down for he has long needed the possession of the sacred places.

being paid in as promptly as it should, but in the meantime the benevolent boards have contracted obligations on the basis of expected receipts. The bishops have authorized the following statement of their dilemma: "From June 1, 1921, to June 1, 1922, there was a shrinkage in the payments of centenary subscriptions of approximately $2,000,000 over an already tragically declining income of the previous year. This serious diminishing of resources constitutes a direct blow at the heart of the missionary enterprise of Methodist. Already the crippling effects of loss in income are beginning to appear in the case of returned foreign missionaries who cannot be sent back to their fields for lack of funds; in the discouragement of life service recruits and in the half completed church, hospital and college buildings, both at home and abroad. We must not permit the spiritual life of the church to be menaced by a cooling missionary enthusiasm. So critical are the conditions now faced, that by special action of the bishops, and at the request of the corresponding secretary of the Committee on Conservation and Advance, Bishop Edwin H. Hughes and Bishop Fred B. Fisher have been assigned to special service to cooperate with Bishop Thomas Nicholson, chairman of the committee, in a most earnest endeavor to awaken the church to the appalling significance of the present emergency. Within the next few months the shrinkage of $2,000,000 must be raised. Every pastor and layman must be enlisted. Subscriptions due simply must be paid. It is the hour not only for heroic endeavor, but also for genuine sacrifice. In the words of one of the most far-sighted of our bishops, 'The future usefulness of the church for a generation depends just now upon its financial response during the next few months. In the name of the Christ we serve we call our people to immediate and decisive action that defeat may be turned into victory."

School of Religious Education in New England

The interest in religious education in New England has produced a summer school of religious education which held its seventh session this summer. It is held at Durham, N. H., in connection with the New Hampshire Agricultural college. It is a practical school for the aid of the Sunday school teachers of the section. They live in the dormitories of the school and do earnest work. In the faculty list one finds the names of prominent educators and ministers. The school is strictly undenominational and people of any sect may take advantage of its opportunities.

Nine Thousand Baptist Young People in Session

The national convention of the Baptist Young People's union was held in St. Paul recently. The enrolment reached the astounding figure of nine thousand. This is the largest convention of its kind for the year. The meetings were characterized with great enthusiasm and earnestness. Miss Jessie Burrall, director of religious education in Stephens College, spoke to the young people on issues of the day. She does not share the contemporary pessimism with regard to young people. She said: "Jazz is not a vital force in itself. It is only the noise of the flood of the youth power of our land sweeping over the country without the guidance of idealism. Our boys and girls are innately decent. They are as fine a lot as earth ever saw. Do not let the antics of the three per cent who are the froth on the waters blind you to the power of the 97 per cent who make up the body of the stream. But their innate idealism must be used in great tasks or it, too, will evaporate in jazz." The officers elected for the coming year are: "Rev. Mark F. Sanborn, president; vice presidents, Mr. Thomas Riches, Mr. T. G. Newbill, and Rev. C. A. Carman; recording secretary, John R. Glading; treasurer, Mr. Orlo G. Montague. James Asa White was unanimously reelected as general secretary. The contest over convention city for next year was vigorously contested, Denver, Omaha, Portland, Washington and Boston offering invitations. The invitation from Boston was accepted and the 1923 convention will be held there.

Fred B. Smith is Back from His World Tour

Mr. Fred B. Smith has returned from his world tour after visiting nineteen different nations, and making 260 public addresses. He particularly notes the paradoxical situation with regard to world peace. Large numbers of people in every nation deprecate the idea of more war, and yet nearly every frontier is armed on each side. He says: "There is an overwhelming sentiment everywhere throughout the world against the whole doctrine and theory of war. I have been tremendously impressed with this, and it is a matter of no small satisfaction to report that not in any city, in any place, or in any kind of an audience did I fail to find hearty, earnest approval of the appeal made that the world shall some day be free from war. The people, the common people, throughout all the world are sick and tired of war. But in this connection I am forced to say that in many places it seems as though they are deliberately going forward preparing for more war."

New England Pastors Will Get Together

Pastors of all denominations within easy reach of Hartford, Conn., and all alumni of the Hartford seminary will be invited to a pastor's conference to be held at the seminary September 18-19. The men will be housed without cost in the seminary dormitories and the meals will be served at cost. Dr. Cornelius Woelfkin of New York has been selected as the leading speaker for the conference, and he will speak on the theme: "Laws of Christian Life and Experience."

Have Successfully Organized the Young People

Squaring the circle is regarded by many ministers as easier than interesting young people in organizations about the church these days. In many churches the old forms of organization have perished and nothing has come to take their place. Rev. E. E. Morrill, pastor of First Congregational church of Millbury, Mass., has been at work on this problem during the past year, and his success will be suggestive to many other religious leaders. In a parish that was supposed to have but few young people, he made a list of 120 between the ages of 15 and 25. A Middle Teen club was organized for the young people from 15 to 17. A

Lloyd George Goes to Wesley's Chapel

METHODISTS could hardly wish a greater tribute to their leader, John Wesley, than was given by Lloyd George recently when he declared the great founder of Methodism "the greatest religious leader the Anglo-Saxon race ever produced, and the movement of which he was the head the greatest religious movement of the past two hundred and fifty years at least." Before speaking at Victoria Hotel in behalf of the restoration of Wesley's Chapel, he took the trouble to visit the chapel and to stand before the grave of Wesley. The influence of Methodism on politics was dealt with skilfully. The premier said: "I am not going to dwell, in the presence of so many experts, on the spiritual and religious effects of the Methodist movement. But I should like to say a word upon the influence it had in the realm of government. It was incalculable. It is inconceivable that a movement that changed the character of vast numbers of people should have been without some effect in the region of government. It is true that at first the movement was among the working-classes and the lower middle-class; but gradually it spread over the whole land. At first the upper class rather resented it. You remember the famous case of the Duchess of Buckingham, who in a letter to Lady Huntingdon protested against Whitefield's preaching, saying, 'The doctrines of the Methodist preachers are most repulsive, and strongly tinctured with impertinence and disrespect toward their betters, endeavoring to do away with all ranks. It is monstrous to be told that you have a heart as evil as the lowest creatures in the world.' But in spite of such examples, the movement had its influence upon the ranks of society and upon the politics of the land. No doubt it had a great restraining influence during the period of the French Revolution, an influence that is felt to this very day in restraining the savageries of bolshevism—a perpetuating influence. The fact that while progress was violent on the continent, it was steady and calm at home, is attributed to the movement of which John Wesley was the propelling force..

young people's organization was formed for those 18 to 25. The meetings of the two groups were held simultaneously on Sunday evenings, one group meeting at the parsonage and the other at the church. Mr. and Mrs. Merrill each took turns at leading the group meetings. Missionary biographies and the application of Christian ideals to the solution of public problems have been among the themes treated. A number of the young people have come into the church the past year.

Church Organists Now Organized as a Profession

Among the newly organized professions is that of church organists, who assemble in national convention during the first week in August at Chicago. The sessions will be held at Kimball Hall. Clarence Albert Tufts, a concert organist from Los Angeles, will play a recital. Dean Peter C. Lutkin of Northwestern University will be among the speakers. The profession seeks to standardize its work and to promote dignified relationships.

Bahai Temple Under Way Again

The lawsuit against the builders of the Bahai Temple at Wilmette, Ill., has been dismissed. The executive committee of the organization authorizes a public statement that the work was halted because of some defective foundations. New pilings have been put in at the demand of the committee, and the contractor is now proceeding with his work. On a recent Sunday afternoon the faithful members of the new cult gathered at the site of the temple and held a religious service, the first that has been held there since the erection of the temple was undertaken and actually begun. The Bahaists had their origin in Persia in a Mohammedan sect, but have long since renounced Mohammedanism.

Gets Up a Pilgrimage for Automobilists

In order to interest automobile owners in religious services, Rev. C. E. Kearns, pastor of First Presbyterian church at Mason City, Ia., recently held a special service for automobile owners. They were asked to notify the pastor of the number of guests whom they could take. After a basket dinner, the procession of machines drove 45 miles to the "little brown church in the vale," which has been made famous through a popular religious song. Here a special program of religious music and talks was given.

Colored Congregationalists Will Meet in Chicago

The ninth biennial convention of Congregational workers among colored people will assemble in Chicago August 23-27. Not only the white workers supported by the American Missionary Association will be present, but the delegates of the Negro churches as well. Speakers of note who will address the convention are Vice-President Calvin Coolidge, who is a Congregationalist; Mayor Thompson of Chicago, Dr. William E. Barton of the national council, and Charles E. Buton, secretary of the national council. Among the themes discussed will be the following: "Modern Labor Problems," "Race Relations," "Missions," "The Negro in Industry," "Evangelism," "Religious Education," "Church Extension," "The Christian College," "The Negro in the North," and "Social Service." A great concert will be given by Negro organizations of note on Friday evening of the convention sessions.

Will Hold Religious Meetings in Yellowstone Park

Estes Park has long since become famous as a center for religious meetings in the summer. Yellowstone will be opened up this summer by the Episcopalians. Dr. Roland Cotton Smith, rector of St. John's church in Washington, is to give a course of lectures to the clergy in August in the Yellowstone Park summer school, which is in session August 20-26 at the Mammoth Hot Springs, near Gardiner. The women are also to have a summer school of church work, led by Miss Emily C. Tillotson.

Episcopalians Push Church Publicity

The national department of church publicity of the Protestant Episcopal church has held conferences in a dozen different centers recently, finishing up at Chicago, where Bishop Anderson was present. A number of prominent laymen of the church participated in the conferences. The Episcopal church has only recently become conscious of this new avenue of church activity but it has already developed many useful forms of publicity. The idea is that church publicity shall be organized not only in a national office for the whole denomination, but also in each parish.

Maine Baptists Are Tired of Controversy

Maine Baptists recently held a convention in which the current issues of the denomination were considered. It seemed to be the opinion of the majority that the time for controversy has ceased. Two denominational newspapers were held responsible for the controversy, the naive assumption being that if the newspapers stopped talking church differences, they would disappear. The following resolution was passed: "Resolved, That it is the sense of the United Baptist Convention of Maine in convention assembled that the controversy, so long continued in both The Baptist and the Watchman Examiner should be discontinued."

Want Larger Liberty in Burial Service

Among the reforms being demanded by the progressive element in the Protestant Episcopal church is a larger liberty in the use of the burial office. Under present rules a minister of this church may not read the office over a suicide, an unbaptized person or one excommunicated by the church. The drunkard who drinks himself to death has better treatment by the church than the unfortunate victim of some temporary delusion. The modern publican who has lived by political graft may be buried with church honors, but a good Quaker who had never been baptized would be neglected. These are a few of the problems that Episcopalians face in the consideration of their most venerable document, the prayer book.

Bishop Gailor Wishes to Retire

Bishop Gailor has been so well advertised because of his wet utterances during the past year that nearly every Christian outside of the Episcopal church knows that he has been the head of the Church Council the past year. He will ask to be relieved from office at the General Convention in September and the filling of his place will be one of the interesting events of the convention. He assigns as one of his reasons fo retiring the misrepresentation of his views on prohibition by the public press. Though denying that he has ever advocated the violation of the law, he is not able to declare himself a prohi-

THE CRISIS OF THE CHURCHES

By LEIGHTON PARKS, D.D.

Rector of Saint Bartholomew's Church, New York

Dr. Parks derives a powerful text from which to plead the cause of church unity from the present crisis of world civilization —a condition, in the author's own words, "so dreadful that not a few serious-minded men are asking themselves if Western civilization is about to fail." The author sees Christian unity as the imperative need of the hour, and it is to point a way to that end that he has written this book.

FOUR NEW BOOKS

The Approach to the New Testament

By PROF. JAMES MOFFATT,
Author of "The New Testament: A New Translation," Etc.

"There are factors in the intellectual, religious and social world which involve a new estimate of the New Testament. Advances have been made in literary and historical criticism and methods of research. We are learning how to approach this great literature from the proper angle and thus to see it in its true perspective. My instructions were, not to offer any results of research such as might appeal only to experts, but to lay before the educated public an outline of the present position of the New Testament in the light of modern criticism—some brief statement of the general situation created by historical criticism which should also bring out the positive value of the New Testament literature for the world of today as a source of guidance in social reconstruction, so that readers might be enabled to recover or retain a sense of its lasting significance for personal faith and social ideals."—The Author.

Price $3.00, plus 12 cents postage.

The Universality of Christ

By WILLIAM TEMPLE,
Bishop of Manchester.

"Dr. Temple is not only a theologian and a philosopher who already ranks, but also an explosive personality afire with love of the church and the people. He escapes all classification. If he is a theorist, he has also proved that he has an amazing capacity for affairs. His latest book, a small one of great significance, consists of four lectures delivered to the recent Christian Student Conference. The notes of the book are simplicity and a certain originality in presentment. It is written with lucidity and force. It may be commended as an excellent and very sincere piece of apologetic, which minds, young minds especially, perplexed and harassed in regard to fundamentals, may peruse with great benefit."—The Guardian.

"These lectures were framed with a view to suggesting answers to problems specially prominent in the minds of Christian students at this time."—The Author.

Price $1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

The Divine Initiative

By PROFESSOR H. R. MACKINTOSH,
Author of "Immortality and the Future."

The lectures in this book when delivered in London made so deep an impression that the Student Christian Movement published them in book form that they might have a wider hearing. Dr. Mackintosh has here set forth the reasons for Christian faith in a fresh and trenchant way. His book is a notable addition to present-day apologetics. It will rekindle hope in many an address and sermon which its reading will inspire.

Price $1.25, plus 10 cents postage.

The Nature and Purpose of a Christian Society

By T. R. GLOVER, Author of "The Jesus of History," "Jesus in the Experience of Men," "The Pilgrim," Etc.

Through some strange oversight this remarkable contribution to the discussion of the character and nature of the Christian church has not heretofore been published in America. It is in its third edition in England and should find a large audience in the United States, where the author's "The Jesus of History" and "Jesus in the Experience of Men" have been so widely read.

bitionist. Meanwhile many of the other bishops of the church have issued declarations of a very different tenor from that of Bishop Gailor of Tennessee.

Will Modernists Bring Warring Factions Together?

Modernism is being conceived by some who hold to this point of view as a method of mediating religious differences. In a recent issue of the Modern Churchman is the following interesting statement: "Modernism is essentially a gospel of reconciliation. With the advance of the modernist spirit, the conflict between Catholic and Protestant within the English church will disappear and we shall get a form of the Christian religion which will unite both ideals."

Nashville the Center of Denominational Strategy

Southern Baptists went to Nashville June 20 and 28 to hold a council of war. The various church boards and commissions were represented. It has been called the most representative meeting in the history of the denomination, with all the great interests of the church participating. In addition to the plans for completing the collection of the $90,000,000 fund, the enrolment of 500,000 tithers and the securing of 500,000 new members on profession of faith during the coming year were included among the objectives. On June 27 the executive committee of the centenary fund of the southern Methodist church was also in session. This organization also considered the money question, and will try to secure the collection of the $22,000,000 that is yet outstanding on the centenary pledges. The Methodists have a program stressing prayer, life service, Christian stewardship and tithing, and the larger activity of the lay element in the church. Each of these great denominations tends to centralize its work at Nashville which may justly be called the religious capital of the southland.

Associated Press Announces New Turkish Aggression

The Associated Press has sent a despatch to this country which reads as follows: "The Turkish newspapers boldly advocate a policy of clearing out all Christians from Cilicia, so that the country may become purely Moslem, thus removing any basis for interested action here by the big Christian powers." It is stated that the Christians are to be formed into labor brigades to go to the front line and dig trenches for the Turks in their war against the Greeks. Meanwhile the urgency of international action in Armenia increases.

Newspaper Offers a Thousand Dollar Prize

The modern attitude toward the doctrine of immortality is so interesting to the publishers of the Churchman, an Episcopalian newspaper, that they are offering a prize of a thousand dollars for the best essay upon this subject. Harvard University has a foundation for the presentation of lectures on this subject and already a number of volumes are in print setting forth the attitude of a wide variety of scholars, ranging from skepticism to severe orthodoxy in their views.

Dr. Glover Criticizes Church Union Document

The statement of agreements reached by certain Episcopalian and free church leaders in England continues to arouse vigorous discussion both in church circles and among the evangelicals. The high churchmen oppose the statement as giving way too much. Dr. T. R. Glover, whose writings are now well known in the United States, says with regard to the statement on ordinances, creeds and ministry: "The issue is not Christian brotherhood or charity or tolerance. It is a question of sheer truthfulness. The document represents out-classed scholarship, sentimental, diplomatic. The whole tone about the 'Church,' the light-hearted acceptance of the old creeds without reconsideration, show the ecclesiastic's touch—not the mind of scholar or thinker. I know, of course, the contempt that practical churchmen—Anglican, Presbyterian or Baptist, it is all one—have for thinkers and students. But it is bad for a future church to rest deliberately on bad thinking and superannuated scholarship. The committee does not contain many who are really shaping the thought of the Christian world, or who can be said to lead in any section of the community where reflection and study sway judgment. Where, for instance, are Dean Inge and Principal Oman? I do not think the churches obsolete and insincere, but many earnest men and women do so think, and, if the churches accept this concordat of ecclesiastical politicians, I do not know how anybody is to commend the church to the sincere. I cannot conceive of the historical Jesus putting his name to the document. Perhaps we shall do better to be loyal to him outside the reconstructed church. But I still think there is some honesty and some straight thinking in our churches."

World Pilgrims Hold Another Meeting

The World Pilgrim's Association includes a unique group. They are those who have attended at least one of the various World Sunday school conventions. They met for a banquet at Kansas City in the course of the recent International Sunday school convention. Three were present who had attended the London convention of 1889. Dr. Marion Lawrence was elected president of the organization. Each convention group has its own secretary, and thus there is kept together an inner circle of Sunday school enthusiasts.

Ohio Baptists Have a Creed

While it is stated that three-fourths of the Baptist churches of the country have some time in their history adopted the New Hampshire confession as their creed, nevertheless the state and national organizations have usually refused to take such action. The Ohio convention of Baptists, however, is an exception. For three years now this convention has had a combination creed made up of the New Hampshire confession and the Philadelphia confession. This state had a majority for the fundamentalists at the Indianapolis convention. Many Baptist churches in Ohio have the following statement in their hymn book: "The Bible is the word of God—Jesus Christ is the Son of God—his birth supernatural, his death expiatory, his life at the throne mediatorial—till he come."

Does the End Justify the Means?

Protestants generally understand it has been Jesuit doctrine that the end justifies the means. Dr. Preserved Smith in a recent article in the Nation makes this statement. He is challenged by Rev. J. Harding Fisher, a Roman Catholic priest, to produce his proof. The Catholic priest cites a lawsuit that was tried in Cologne, Germany, which turned on this question, and in this action Hoensbroech is said to have failed to bring proof of such an assertion, though he was an apostate Jesuit and familiar with the history of the order. Abbe Dasbach once offered two thousand florins for proof of such teaching by a responsible Jesuit, and had no takers. Thus crumbles one more charge that has made bitterness between Catholic and Protestant, unless Dr. Smith proves himself an abler historian than predecessors in a similar predicament.

Federal Council May Send Deputation to Eastern Churches

The Roman Catholic church has been watching the east with characteristic interest ever since the collapse of Russia. The reigning pope was elected because of his success in Poland, and his supposed knowledge of the eastern question. At last the Protestants are aroused at the spread of Roman propaganda among the orthodox communions. Instead of proselytism, the best-informed Protestant leaders are now advising cooperation with the religious forces of the east and the Federal Council is considering sending a deputation to the eastern communions of the orthodox faith to offer cooperation in the work of extending the circulation of the holy scriptures among the common people. The Federal Council is also interested in securing for the orthodox church an educated and spiritual ministry, which would mean better theological seminaries. The relief of physical distress is also a present duty, and in this work the Protestant churches would seek closer cooperation with the historic churches of the countries where they go. Meanwhile a third approach is being made by the Anglican communion. A group of ministers in England have signed a document declaring that they accept seven sacraments, that they think it appropriate to pray to Mary and the saints and that they believe it wise to use images in the churches. The Anglican document gives everything and asks nothing save fellowship.

Monument Will Be Erected By Southern Baptists

A part of the monster fund raised by the southern Baptists in their recent campaign will be invested in buildings in Nashville, which is in a way the religious capital of the south, being a publishing and convention center for three large denominations. The Baptists have decided to erect two new buildings in Nashville at an expense of $350,000 to care for the growing work of the Sunday school board of the denomination. Thus long after most of the fund has been spent in Christian work there will remain some monuments of the great effort which was put forth by southern Baptists.

Episcopalians Getting Ready for General Convention

The General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal church is held triennially, and this year the sessions will be in Portland, Ore., beginning Sept. 6. This is only the second time in forty-seven years that the convention has gone west of the Rocky Mountains. The house of bishops has 139 members, and the house of deputies 552. All legislation must have the concurrent action of the two houses in order to be effective. The Woman's Auxiliary will meet in the same building with the house of deputies. The overshadowing issue this year seems to be the revision of the prayer-book, though without doubt the practical working out of the Lambeth proposals will also occupy much time. The reports at this triennial convention will be the best in the history of the organization, for the church in recent years has had a considerable missionary awakening.

Press Opinions of the Book

The Christian Advocate: "The preacher who reads this book will get many valuable pointers on how to do it; and it is hoped there will be many official members of the churches who will read the story and be profited thereby, coming away from the reading wiser, even though sadder, men."

The Continent: "In this remarkable story by a minister two college chums and a successful surgeon help a discouraged preacher to catch the vision that transformed an empty church into one crowded to overflowing—that changed a lifeless church into a living church."

The Churchman: "Dr. Douglas gives a realistic story of the transformation of a conventional ministerial career into a vital ministry. He tells the minister that he must be born again."

The Christian Endeavor World: "The story is cleverly told. Let us hope that it will put new courage into many a weary pastor."

The United Presbyterian: "The problem here presented for consideration is not how to get an audience, but how to get a congregation—a dependable body of Christian worshippers."

The Presbyterian Banner: "The book is very modern. It deals, not with the materials of preaching, but with methods."

The Christian Standard: "At the age of forty Rev. D. Preston Blue is discouraged; he does not know how to secure a large attendance at regular services. By accident he converses with a manufacturer, a physician and an editor. These conversations brace him up and remake the preacher in him. He at once becomes a man of authority and his officers and people respond quickly and with enthusiasm to the propositions he submits. A great and permanent audience materializes and the preacher is happy."

Unity: "The reading of this book is a stimulus and will cause the reader to arise in his own new strength."

Lutheran Church Herald: "No preacher, even the most successful, will waste the time he spends in reading the book. But thoughtful laymen also who desire to help their pastors and do their own share toward raising a congregation, will be stimulated by the reading."

The Intelligencer: "Dr. Douglas is to be heartily commended for presenting such a 'way out' to those who have felt the need of improvement but have hitherto been ignorant of a method of relief."

The Epworth Era: "The book is constructive. The story shows how the discouraged minister crowded his church merely by taking human nature as it is and appealing to it, just as Jesus did."

The Herald of Gospel Liberty: "We do not see how any minister can read the book without a genuine and conscientious inventory of himself and his methods."

If you are a minister you must have this book. If you are a layman, why not buy a copy for your minister and one for yourself?

The Reconstruction of Religon

By PROFESSOR CHARLES A. ELLWOOD, Department of Sociology, University of Missouri

"That our civilization is sick, and that it must turn to religion for healing, has been said many times recently. We are in danger, indeed, of making the remark into self-deluding cant. For the sickness is generally diagnosed in terms of the most superficial symptoms, such as the disturbance of our habitual complacence, and the remedy is looked for in a larger dose of the religion to which we are already habituated. Both a standard of health and a cure for our ills are looked for in the status quo ante. A prime merit of Professor Ellwood's book is that he goes behind social symptoms to causes, and behind religion as a tradition to religion as a force, with the result of denying the customary assumption and point of view altogether. Our disease is not due to a departure from accepted standards of mores, and the remedy is not to be found by returning to them. Our sickness inheres, rather, in the status quo itself, both of social organization and of religion, and the remedy lies, not in restoring religion, but in reconstructing it."

So speaks Professor George A. Coe, of Union Theological Seminary, in considering Professor Ellwood's book; and he adds, in noting the author's success in this work: "Professor Ellwood approaches this problem with the sociologist's insight into social conditions, but this insight is warmed by cordial appreciation of religious motives and even traditions. The result is clearness and objectivity in both directions. The book is thought-awakening, conscience-searching, uncompromisingly frank; yet, because it is profoundly religious, it is profoundly friendly. It will help to generate the good will which it regards as the first mark of reasonable religion."

WHAT OTHER LEADERS SAY OF THE BOOK:

This is a great book, profound, logical, lucid, good tempered, and wise. I do not see how any serious man—least of all a clergyman—can afford to neglect it. I predict that no less than 20,000 times the next four years the question will be asked: "Have you read Ellwood's 'Reconstruction of Religion?' "—PROF. E. A. ROSS, Department of Economics, University of Wisconsin.

It is a clear and fearless analysis of the present status of our civilization by a scholar amply qualified for the task. Its appearance at the present moment is especially timely. Its spirit throughout is not merely critical, but constructive. It will exert a wise influence because it is the work of an experienced sociologist who already has won a position of conspicuous leadership. In fearlessly declaring that the religion of Jesus contains a solution of our modern social problems he has voiced a conviction that is held by thousands of thoughtful men today. Professor Ellwood has given to the American people a valuable prolegomenon to the reconstruction of religion.—PROF. CHARLES FOSTER KENT, Yale University.

This is much more than a study, as the title might imply, of the changes taking place in theological thought; it is rather an analysis both of the significance of Christianity in society and the present stage of our civilization, and a statement of the characteristics of a positive religious faith that will function in our world. Here, then, is a book which no religious worker can afford to neglect, one of the most significant of recent works, because of the cogency of its reasoning, the richness of its background and the practical good sense of its ideal outlook."—H. F. COPE, Editor of "Religious Education."

This is a scholarly, able, and most timely book. In presenting the problem of the reconstruction of religion in terms of social idealism, the author speaks just the message which is most desperately needed by the churches at this moment. Particularly valuable is his application of the social principles of religion to various fields of modern life. The volume is one of the most important which has been issued in recent years and I hope that it will have a wide reading.—JOHN HAYNES HOLMES.

Perhaps in no other work will be found so well summarized the principles of what may be called "The New Reformation," the movement to bring about the establishment of a more rational and more socialized form of Christianity—a Christianity in harmony with modern science and with modern democracy. The book points the way to the revival of religion and to "the resurrection of faith" by bringing our religious beliefs into line with the accepted truths and the democratic social aspirations of the modern world.

The Belief in God and Immortality

By JAMES H. LEUBA

Professor of Psychology in Bryn Mawr College; author of "A Psychological Study of Religion."

This book consists of three parts. The first is a scholarly investigation of the origins of the idea of immortality and embodies an important contribution to our knowledge of that subject. The second part consists of statistics of the belief of a large group of prominent persons in personal immortality and in a God with whom one may hold personal relations. The figures are in many respects startling.

The author's opinion is that the cause of the present religious crisis cannot be remedied by the devices usually put forward, for it has a much deeper cause than those usually discussed. Part 3 treats of the Present Utility of the Belief in God and in Immortality.

"A book which every clergyman, as well as every one interested in the psychology of religion and in the future of religion, should read and ponder. For Professor Leuba has made a contribution to our knowledge of religious belief that is of very considerable significance."—Prof. James B. Pratt, in the American Journal of Theology.

Label Without Libel

Sometimes it's useful (as well as amusing) to try to classify your friends or compatriots, to sort and label them, and then survey the result.

You'll find that the pigeon holes your specimens fall into are more likely to reveal yourselves than your victims. Your own mind will be better displayed in selecting than your subject in being selected.

As, for instance, Mr. Chesterton, who divides humanity into fools, knaves and revolutionists. Or the prominent critic who classifies American authors broadly as either patriotic or unpatriotic. Or the man who groups his fellow-men into Americans and foreigners.

Here in The New Republic office we own to a habit of classifying our countrymen as either "New Republic sort of people" or other sort of people. That shows us up a bit, doesn't it? Particularly if you know what we mean by "a New Republic sort of a person." Here's a letter we just got from one of them—a professor in the University of Southern California:

> "It (the November 16th) is an issue to be proud of; paper, text, a prevailing attitude of fair-play along with a capable handling of particular problems, make the reading of its pages eminently satisfactory; moreover, it has the prime quality of readableness.
> "The New Republic has made a good reputation in the past few years for good sense and thoroughness in dealing with current problems; and this copy shows its qualities at the best."
> Faithfully yours,
> James Main Dixon,
> "Professor of Comparative Literature and the Higher Journalism."

That's what we call a "New Republic sort of person"—naturally, because he earnestly writes himself down as one. But there's more to it than that. A "New Republic sort of person" doesn't have to like The New Republic or even agree with it. He may be like the gentleman who "always reads The New Republic with interest because he is so rarely in accord with its reasoning or spirit." In fact, our "New Republic person" doesn't even have to read The New Republic. Broadly, he is anybody who finds thinking not only necessary but actually interesting; who finds impartial discussion not an impractical ideal but a most hard-headed, practical means of getting things done; a democrat who knows that votes may be counted but opinions must be weighed.

But if he's that kind, sooner or later he'll be reading The New Republic. And here are six attractive ways for him to begin:

piritual Oppression f American Labor

MORE heinous than skimp wages, and the deprivation of material comforts in his home, is the forced demand of our selfish indifference that the Amer- an workingman fight the battle of industrial justice. This not his business alone. It is not his business primarily. e can struggle on, watch his home sink in squalor and riftlessness, see his children doomed to an even deeper nd more hopeless drudgery than is his lot. He may even ome out of the ordeal with a refinement of spirit which ad- ersity often vouchsafes. But our civilization cannot en- ure such an ordeal. The working man is doing his utmost o save our civilization. He is condemning himself, con- emning himself in the interpretation of the current press f the country, condemning himself in the esteem of the ajority of the members of the American churches whose ssumed office is the mediation of the refinements of the pirit to civilization, condemning himself in the records of many of the authoritative historians of the future, con- emning himself in the spirit of bitterness which the con- est is engendering in him. He is fighting the battle of rogressive civilization and is loaded with the repute of a contestant for his own selfish interests; moreover, he is imself accepting that role to a lamentable degree. This is ur crime, that we force the workingmen into such an atti- ude. Can any thoughtful person question our civilization's njustice when he ponders the revelations of Professor Tay- or in his review, week by week, of the present-day social and industrial issues? To what limit would organized capital go in squeezing dividends from industry and pauperizing American labor if the protests and the reckless, despairing struggles of these workingmen citizens did not interpose to check in some degree its excesses? Relieving this injustice is the business of the strongest, not solely nor primarily that of the weakest element in our civilization. The struggle for their own existence and for the education of their children would seem a heavy enough burden to impose upon workingmen. To exact of them in addition the supreme, supernal responsibility for saving our civilization, out of their meager financial, vital and spiritual resources, is a crime for which the God of righteousness and justice will hold somebody painfully accountable in the day of reckoning. That day is not millenniums distant, either.

Ecclesiastical Deadlock

DOES it not disturb every thoughtful citizen to realize that affairs religious in our civilization are at the mercy of pugnacious and irreconcilable groups who may rule or ruin at will? The common challenge in certain ecclesiastical circles is, in effect, and often in so many words, "If you don't like it, you can get out!" The solemn duty is laid upon those who differ from the dominant, or the would-be dominant element in this, that and the other denomination, to relieve the ecclesiastical body from their unwelcome presence. The ground of this irreconcilable demand is a difference of opinion. And when the sensitive accept the challenge and get out, what then? Official religion passes into the unchallenged control of these self-assumed sponsors. What becomes of those driven out? What are they driven into? Into another organized group with power, and all too universally revealing a disposition, similar to those of the group whom they have just relieved of their unwelcome company. That, or into the great unfellowshiped fellowship, which is permitted no religious recognition under a system which stakes all upon sectarian regularity. A situation so monstrous in civil affairs would call for a revolution. With all of its blundering and corruption, due nobody can say how much to the intolerant indifference of those who are so zealous to dominate religious officialism, our civil order does still reveal a spark of democracy. The mechanism of civil government is not permanently and irrevocably in the hands of those sufficiently intolerant and high-handed to seize it. Citizens are not challenged to leave the country or remove from the face of the earth because they are presumptuous enough to entertain political opinions differing from those who assume to dominate political affairs. To be sure, we have recently passed through a period when something like this right has been arrogated by certain political groups, but the rising tide of civic conscience is sweeping away such anti-democratic assumptions. Will it be possible to relieve the ecclesiastical deadlock which periods like the present generate, without getting religious affairs out of the control of irresponsible sects, and giving them a basing in community interests where democratic forces may effect from time to time, or steadily, the needful renovation?

Popularizing Modern Bible Study

NOW and then a church, following a period of leadership by a modern minded minister, relapses for a season into fundamentalism or some other equally antiquated point of view in religion. There is always some dissatisfied layman in such a congregation who capitalizes the retiring pastor's faults or lacks, and insists that his successor must be a man of opposite theology. This insistence is frequently based upon the assumption that piety and spirituality are associated with old-fashioned teaching. Only by a masterful process does such a church become at last established in its modern convictions. The chief reason for this relapse of churches is doubtless to be found in the lack of proper teaching agencies in the churches for indoctrinating people in the more reasonable and vital view of religion. The pulpit must always take into account the presence of children, strangers and uneducated people. It is in the study class that a minister can give the systematic formulation of his thought which will give a church intelligent convictions with regard to its religious position. The church school often teaches the Bible in a different way from that in which the minister teaches it. Until the minister teaches the teachers this will continue to be true. In every church there exists a younger group whose thinking has not yet crystallized. Many in this group are quite at sea for they are unable to accept the interpretations of religion which they have inherited. This is the very soil in which the higher interpretations of the evangelical faith may take root. The modern minister owes this group the truth by which they will find new light breaking forth from holy scriptures. Once the church people find in the prophets something more than a few scattered messianic sayings, once that they learn to read the gospels to find something more than texts for rescue mission workers, they begin to find the Bible a great human document able to minister to all the ranks, grades and degrees of human experience. Many churches have taken up the study of Wells' "Outline of History," critically but sympathetically. To know the world and life is after all o of the duties of the Christian mind. But no study in th church can match in importance the quest of biblic truth.

Religion and Public Health

"NOR soul helps flesh more now than flesh helps soul." Turn the proposition around, twist it, turn it bac again, do anything one may be disposed to do with it, i caprice or in good conscience, yet does it remain mortall and immortally true that religion and the sane and wholesome physical life of man are an interwoven and inextricable concern. It would be a just and very embarrassin test of the churches' efficiency if their contribution to th common health of the community were rigorously appraised. Keeping people well physically, or healing thei ailments after they are afflicted, is the business of the doctors; the job of the minister is different. So? Public health has become very much the business of the community. I is to the credit of the medical profession that they are forward in bringing this about. The implications of the movement are far-reaching. Certain ministers and church agencies have caught glimmers of these implications, and have entered this field,—timidly, daintily, dilettantishly. Religion cannot fulfill its mission in this field of community life by "psychic healing," by morbid lecture courses for small church groups in psycho-analysis, by spasmodic appeals and contributions in support of the Red Cross or the local hospital. Here is a great issue. It is big enough for the sturdiest and most intelligent religious purpose. If the churches cannot endow it with religious intent and forcefulness, it will acquire the religious impulse elsewise, and religious officialism will find its office impoverished by another great issue of spiritual significance made elsewhere regnant.

Is the Modern Church Outside the Church?

TO one who has an eye for symbol and parable, the dedication of a Special Hall of Fame in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine in New York, is very significant. Nineteen statues, one for each century of the Christian era, representing saints, popes, statesmen, warriors, empire builders, men of letters, fit into separate panels on either side of the choir; one panel being left vacant for a latter day. Each statue sums up an age, beginning with St. Paul and ending with Lincoln, the list selected as follows: Paul, Justin the Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Athanasius, Augustine, Benedict, Gregory the Great, Charles Martel, Charlemagne, Alfred the Great, Godfrey de Bouillon, Bernard of Charvaux, Francis of Assisi, Wycliffe, Cranmer, Columbus, Shakespeare, Washington, Lincoln. It is a goodly list, a pageant of genius, power and nobility, but why should the church tradition be broken off at the fifteenth century? Has Christianity produced no supremely great figure since that far off time? Where is Wesley? Has America no saint so set in the calendar of the church universal? Why not John Woolman, who was a saint if ever there was one on earth? Lincoln is worthy of everlasting honor—Wells names him among the few eternal figures of the race—but he was not a member of any church. Are we to understand that we must henceforth look for our saints outside the church? Newman once reflected upon the church of his birth that it had produced no saints—is the same true of the church of our day? Is Dr. Glenn Frank right in thinking that the next revival of religion will not come through the church at all, but outside, finding its leader and prophet in a statesman, a business man, or a man of science?

The Increase of Jew-Baiting

JEWS have never yet found a land where they have not been discriminated against. From Pharaoh's day until the time of Henry Ford, there has always been some one to tell the wandering Jew to move on. History reveals the interesting fact that every war has resulted in an increase of racial hatred and following the world war we find in the United States for the first time something like an anti-Semitic movement. Henry Ford has issued four volumes showing the activity of the Jew in world affairs. There has been the recent hubbub about discrimination against the Jews in the great universities, and most people are willing to believe there is something in this charge. What is the offence of the Jew that he has been so universally disliked? The Assyrian tore down his temple walls, Roman emperors persecuted him on occasion, he was the victim of the Spanish inquisition and of the Russian pogroms. The tenaciousness with which the Jew has held to his own religion is undoubtedly the major offence. Religious minorities are never well liked. Protestants are not much loved in Austria or Catholics in Scotland. Mohammedans do not grow sentimental over Christians in Arabia. But it is not simply a matter of religion. Ninety per cent of the Jews in America are consistent pagans, just as good pagans as are fifty per cent of the Gentile population. Yet these fellow pagans do not love each other at all, though they are often related in business enterprises. There are racial characteristics which are unpleasant. The white man of western lands is proud and domineering. The Jew is equally proud and fond of power. A colony of Jews has lived in China for centuries in seeming peace and prosperity, but that is different. Liberal leaders in Judaism and Christianity cannot be well pleased with racial hatred. Jews often needlessly shock their Christian neighbors. Christians have but little consideration for the religious views of Jews. Good feeling can only arise when we all learn to appreciate every human group and to share its spiritual enthusiasms.

Bible and Spade

IT IS an encouragement to those who appreciate the values of archæological discoveries, particularly in regard to the Bible, that since the new adjustments which have been made in the near east, as a result of the war, Great Britain has been charged with responsibility for all matters connected with Palestine. That means that the spirit of inquiry which was largely stifled by the Turkish administration of affairs in that region is giving place to an attitude of hospitality toward all legitimate research in the interest of biblical science. Last year Prof. John C. Peters of the Southern Theological Seminary at Suwanee, Tennessee, gave an interesting series of lectures at Lake Forest University on "Recent Research in Bible Lands." His connection with excavations made at Nippur under the auspices of the University of Pennsylvania some years ago give him a measure of authority in this field so admirably covered by recent works on biblical archæology like those by Prof. James A. Barton and Prof. Camden M. Coburn. These lectures of Professor Peters have just appeared in book form under the title, "Bible and Spade," a contribution to the Bross Lectureship of the institution where they were given. They summarize in a popular way the knowledge which has accumulated during the past few years as a result of archæological research. They exhibit here and there the usual suspicion on the part of the archæologist that the literary and historical critic of the Bible makes too much of the facts at his disposal. But there is also ground to question whether the archæologist is prepared to make as broad claims as Professor Peters does at several points on the basis of the actual facts which the spade has disclosed. Admirable justice is done to the Babylonian influence upon Palestine. One of the surprises of the volume is the acceptance of the traditional view of the Greek and Latin churches that the Church of the Holy Sepulchre actually covers the site of both Calvary and the burial place of Jesus. It is encouraging to believe with the author of this readable book that biblical research in Palestine and other lands is only in its infancy, and that the next few years under the impulse of excavation directed by such institutions as the American Schools of Research in Jerusalem and Bagdad will see remarkable advance in biblical science.

Make it Short!

OUR fathers were not accustomed to short sermons. Visitors to the old church at Bethany, West Virginia, where Alexander Campbell once preached, are shown a peculiar rectangular room with the two exits on either side of the pulpit. This unusual arrangement was said to have been dictated by the great pioneer preacher as a device to keep weary auditors from leaving before the two hour sermon was finished. It is a part of the spirit of this age to want to make everything brief. The college dean whispers to the minister who gets up to pray in chapel, "Make it short." The young man who comes to get married inquires for the short forms of that ceremony, even though the bride prefers a church wedding with full ritual. In no matter has there been greater demand for brevity than in preaching. Many city pulpits are using only twenty minutes this summer for the sermon. How long a sermon should be depends upon what is in it. A good many sermons are not long. They only seem so. Some sermons of forty minutes are called too short by the auditors. Such addresses lift us up above such mundane things as watches and dinner schedules. It is an unfortunate fact that a good many ministers are going into their pulpits these days unprepared for the large ministry that ought to be given to an intelligent and educated congregation. The minister of today has to preach to college graduates in most churches. To do this successfully means honest preparation. The man who has been turned into a pack horse for all sorts of "causes" can hardly speak like a prophet. He is always taking a collection or preparing for one. When he tries to preach the gospel, it makes no contacts with the mind of the age. Truth may be timeless, but sermons never are. The great preaching has always arisen out of concrete human situations. If sermons are big enough, we never clamor to have them shorter.

Objections to Public Religious Education

THE Christian Century has of late presented some of the arguments in favor of including religion and ethics in the courses of the public schools and state universities, from which in large degree they are excluded at the present time. The contention in this series of utterances has been that the effort to deprive the students of the tax-supported institutions of the values of religious and moral training is neither in harmony with sound public policy nor with the ideals of the fathers of the republic. It was never the purpose of the founders of the nation to interdict the teaching of the spiritual disciplines in the institutions of learning provided by the community and the state, but only to prevent the control of public policies and especially of education by an established church. This was the only meaning possessed by the phrase "separation of church and state." In the process of time, with the misfortune of a perverted interpretation, it has come to signify the exclusion of religion and morals from public instruction. And to that unfortunate misuse of the term there has been a large measure of public assent up to recent days. This acquiescence in a mutilated and inadequate conception of public education is becoming less and less possible. The serious study of the entire problem by those who have at heart the safety and competence of the republic in the future is the task of the hour.

There are several objections to the plan of including the teaching of morals and religion in the public schools and state universities. It is only just that these objections should have frank and serious consideration. In the first place there is the average placid belief on the part of the community that the traditional procedure regarding such matters is probably proper and adequate. The American citizen is generally so well pleased with the national institutions, including those of education, that he is quite content to let others do the thinking required to keep them in efficient form, while he proceeds with his ordinary vocation. If he takes thought at all for the ethical and religious welfare of his young people, he probably reasons that there are excellent teachers in the public schools who will not permit themselves to be wholly inhibited from the impartation of such truth, even though the technical rules of the program discourage or forbid it; that there are some courses in ethics now provided in the curriculum, and one must not expect too much; that there are certain general features of a more or less religious character, such as many of the songs employed, and the seasonal observances which mark the significant periods of the year, such as Christmas, Easter, and the Thanksgiving time; that it is probably just as well to leave any special emphasis upon themes of this nature to the home and church, quite oblivious of the fact that the first has almost completely abdicated its responsibility for such direction, and that the second reaches at most only a small proportion of the children, and is far from competent at the best to supply the needed culture; that some effort is now being made to supply week-day religious instruction under church auspices to the children of the public schools, and that no doubt his young people will get their share by some special providence with which it is no part of such a citizen's business to concern himself; and that so far as the state university is concerned, some of the courses do deal in a mild form with religious interests, and denominational agencies are attempting to supply in an extra-mural manner, with or without credit from the institution, such courses as will meet the most urgent needs of students who insist upon some studies of this character. Such a citizen is likely to say that probably the ends of moral and religious education are being met in a fairly satisfactory manner under present conditions, and he is quite content that the communities shall muddle along with the opportunistic and disconnected efforts now being made to reach the actual need. One may rejoice in every experiment now in progress. Some of the work attempted is inspiring in its contrast with the entire lack of attention to such fundamental interests in the recent past. But no one can be satisfied who perceives the appalling need of the higher disciplines, and the very partial manner in which the demand is met at the present time.

The second objection to any earnest effort to incorporate such studies in the public institutions of education comes from those who are genuinely solicitious regarding present conditions, but who believe that everything that is needed is the introduction of the Bible into the public schools either as a lectionary unit in the day's work or as a required course of study. It is curious that many intelligent people appear to think that all the ends of public welfare might be served by such an inadequate procedure. Doubtless there would be great value in the use of the Bible in the general exercises of the public schools where public opinion demanded or approved of such a plan. There would be the advantage of having the students made acquainted with some portions of the Scriptures. No doubt also there would be some benefit in the creation of a religious atmosphere for the few moments of such exercises. But to imagine that such a plan, even if adhered to daily, would serve the purposes of religious education is to exhibit a naive and diverting lack of acquaintance with the most primary laws of education. By all means let us have the reading of the Bible in schools where the sentiment of the community approves of the plan, and it does not cause division of feeling and religious animosities. But even under the most favorable and unanimous conditions let nobody suppose that the true purposes of moral and spiritual culture are conserved. Something far more constructive and purposeful is required.

The argument that is supposed to be the most formidable against the inclusion of such courses in the public schools and state universities has to do with the attitude of Roman Catholics toward public education. And this is worthy of the most careful attention. The opinion of a group of people so numerous and significant as this should be of importance in the consideration of any public question. The Roman Catholic church has come into American life chiefly by processes of immigration from lands where it was in large measure in control of the machinery of education. In countries like Spain and Italy education assumed the Catholic interpretation of religion as fundamental in the entire process, much as the Koran is the foundation and norm of education in Moslem lands. In Italy today church tradition struggles with the modern spirit, and the rejection of ecclesiastical dogma by large sections of the population has resulted in much radical, anti-Christian propaganda. In France the protest against church control of education issued in the secularization of a large proportion of the religious and educational equipment of the nation. In Great Britain the Catholic movement has striven to secure as much influence as possible in a predominently Protestant but still churchly atmosphere. It has been the contest of one sort of establishment with another, and outside of Ireland the claims of the Roman church to dominance in religious and educational matters have been held in check.

In America the efforts of the priesthood have been bolder and more ambitious, aided as they have been by a constant and dependable immigrational expansion. The two great problems which that church confronted and still confronts here are those of democracy and education. The first is hostile, and ultimately will be fatal, to the entire policy of Romanism. The second has compelled a series of adjustments to meet the popular demand for sound learning on the part of its own people as well as among all progressive citizens of the republic. The result has been the successive phases of the compromise which the church has been compelled to make with public sentiment. The theory was that all education of Catholic children should be administered by the church in its parochial schools. But two difficulties were confronted. The inability of the parochial schools to meet the tests of public education resulted in the increasing demand of Roman Catholic parents that their children should have the benefit of the public schools. This, with or without the consent of the local priests, depending on their personal attitude and the disposition of their immediate ecclesiastical superiors, has been the rapidly growing solution of the question. At the same time an earnest effort has been made to improve the parochial schools, so that they may command the more ready approval of Catholic parents. In spite of all such efforts, however, and even with an increasing registration of Catholic young people in these schools, it is evident that the future of education for the Roman Catholic public lies largely with the regular tax-supported schools, and not with those of the church.

Perceiving this fact, the Catholic leaders have employed their influence to keep all types of religious instruction out of the public educational institutions. They have been rightly conscious of the fact that with the traditional Protestant sentiments of the nation it would be difficult to secure in the schools an unbiased, much less a Roman Catholic interpretation of the facts of religion. In so far as this disquiet is based on facts, Catholics have a perfect right to insist that the schools shall be conducted in a manner which places the Roman church at no disadvantage in its contacts with its youth. The strategy of the Catholic leaders has been to prevent all religious instruction in public institutions since they cannot secure the privilege of providing it after the Roman Catholic manner. Strangely enough the Protestant section of the country, which comprises by far the larger proportion of the patrons of the public schools and state universities, has patiently acquiesced in this inequitable arrangement. Committed by conviction to the principle that no education is complete which omits morals and religion from its program, the majority of the people have permitted this vicious system of secularism to persist through a misinterpretation of the principle of the separation of church and state, and because of vigorous advantage taken of the situation by the Roman Catholic church.

The simple fact is that the inclusion of these disciplines in public education is essential to the best interests of the community, and is desired by a majority of the people. The only objections that the Roman Catholic can suggest are that he ought not to be taxed to support instruction which he does not want his children to receive. To this two answers should be made. One is that there are studies in every public school which are not approved by all members of the community, and yet are given at public expense because there are some patrons of the schools who desire them. What proportion of the parents in a community desire their children to study Greek? Yet in a large number of the schools it is taught because a few wish to have it included. This is entirely proper. Many other illustrations could be given of the fact that studies are included in the curriculum of the public schools at public expense which are appropriated by only a small number of the patrons. But ethical and religious instruction is desired for their children by a very considerable majority of the patrons of the schools. Have a minority of the members of the community the right to protest the inclusion of such courses, merely because they do not wish them taken by their children?

The second answer is even more to the point. If religious instruction were provided in a manner thoroughly competent in its nature, above the line of any partisanship, and in a spirit of scientific study of the great facts of religion, would not such studies be as desirable from the standpoint of the informed Roman Catholic as from that of the Protestant, and would he not desire his children to take advantage of the opportunity in the same manner as others? It is only natural that the members of the Catholic church, who are by training solicitous for the religious instruction of their children, should be anxious only that such teaching should be true to the facts, and not in any manner sectarian or hostile to their particular interpretation of Christianity. In this they are quite within their rights.

Furthermore, it is conceded without argument that Roman Catholics, like all other members of the community, have the entire right to withdraw their children from any courses in the public institutions which do not meet their approval. No child is required to take any study which conflicts with the convictions of his parents or guardians. By this privilege every right of Roman Catholics is safeguarded completely. It is quite in accord with the liberties of citizenship to decline particular types of instruction for one's own children. But it is wholly inconsistent with the rights of communities for a minority of the citizens to prevent the inclusion of desirable studies as the result of a vicious tradition or a sectarian prejudice.

One more class of objectors may be spoken of. These are the secularists. There are people in most communities who object to all forms of ethical or religious instruction on the ground that they are opposed to such personally, and wish their children to make their own choice of beliefs and behavior without any bias from the education they receive at the hands of the public. Whatever one may think of this bent of mind, it is quite within the rights of any citizen to affirm it for himself or any group to which he may belong. Yet as in the case of the Roman Catholic, though from a wholly different point of view, the personal convictions or prejudices of individuals or groups ought not to be permitted to control the wishes of a majority of the citizenship of any locality. The secularist, like the Roman Catholic and many other sorts of people, pays taxes for the public school system as a whole, and this probably includes many features which have been proved of value, but for which particular individuals have no use. No injustice is done any one by this method. The argument that one should not be obliged to support studies of which he does not approve has long since been decided in favor of a system that provides the desirable disciplines for the greatest number. And here once more, the secularist, like the Roman Catholic and every other possible objector, has the definite remedy of withdrawing his children from the particular studies to which he objects.

Such are some of the more common and obvious obstacles that are cited as arguments in favor of the present incomplete and unsatisfactory program of the public schools and state universities. The entire trend of events at the present time is in the direction of a correction of the error long made in the interest of a false tradition of secularism and sectarianism.

To Thomas Curtis Clark

If now no more along the leafy ways
We see a little Grecian temple white,
Nor any altar smoking on the height;
Nor hear a sound of pipes throughout the days;
Nor see a shepherd lead his flock to graze
On upland pastures green, then, ere 'tis night,
See him return; if now we have no sight
Of nymphs and satyrs, much is ours to praise.
Still, still, O friend, we have immortal verse,
Health, love, imagination, fancy, too;
Still, still the countryside and all its lure
Remains. Yea, 'tis our pleasure to rehearse
Our dreams, and when doth fall the hour of dew,
Sweet sleep is ours, for every wound a cure.

The Robin and the Worm

A Parable of Safed the Sage

EVERY Spring do I digg in the Garden. And so did my fathers, back to Adam; but he got to flirting with Eve and loafing on the job, and was fired. But when I digg, Keturah is with me, and I loaf not.

Now as I digged, behold there came a Robin that liveth hard by, and he followed me as I digged. And he pulled out now and again a fat Worm.

And he came not too nigh unto me, yet did he not shun me utterly nor fear me greatly. And he looked at me curiously, and I think gratefully. And this is what I think he said:

Behold, here is the owner of the Garden, and he diggeth up this ground for my sake, so that I eat Worms and toil not.

And he knew not that I had other plans for the Garden, and that the Garden itself was a Side-Issue with me; for he thought that I wrought for his sake. And perchance he blamed me, and wondered that on certain mornings I slept, although he perched in the Mulberry Tree outside my window and prayed for me to arise and digg for him that he might eat Worms without toil.

Now he was more than welcome to the Worms that I digged up; for one Robin is of more value to me than many Worms. And he is welcome to the opinion that I have nothing else to do than to digg for him; and I cannot very well explain to him that he is partially in error.

But I considered as I digged how like that Robin is to men and women; and how his ideas of Providence are about like theirs.

But this I admired in the Robin, that however little he understood the larger purposes of the owner of the Garden, the Robin did not fail to make use of such blessings as came his way; and I think that in his small way he was thankful; which is not true of all men.

For I suppose that the Lord of earth's Garden hath much larger purposes than any that I can discover; and what I am able to get out of it may be one of His minor purposes. But I will remember gladly that even the Robins and the Sparrows have value in His sight, and I am also under His care.

Progressive Christianity

By Harry Emerson Fosdick

Is Christianity static or dynamic, stationary or progressive, a statement or a movement? Some one has said that the great achievement of the modern mind is "the substitution of the category of becoming for being, of the conception of relativity for that of the absolute, of movement for immobility." Can a static and immobile Christianity triumph in a dynamic and advancing world? Dr. Fosdick, of the First Presbyterian Church, New York City, dealt with this question in the Cole lectures for 1922, taking as his theme, "Christianity and Progress." There is no need to say that he deals with the issues involved in a forthright and stimulating manner, vital insight matching felicity of phrase, seeking, as a wise teacher, to make the past glide into the future without loss of the precious inheritance of faith. Such discussions are fundamental to the future of Christianity, if the church is not to lose the loyalty and enthusiasm of a generation of educated young people. No one is better fitted for such a task of interpretation than Dr. Fosdick, as witness the fourth lecture on "Progressive Christianity," excerpts from which we have pleasure in presenting in advance of the forthcoming volume which will contain the full discussion.—The Editor.

NO one can long ponder the significance of our generation's progressive ways of thinking without running straight upon this question: is not Christianity itself progressive? In the midst of a changing world does not it also change, so that, reacting upon the new ideas of progress, it not only assimilates and uses them, but is itself an illustration of them? Where everything else in man's life in its origin and growth is conceived, not in terms of static and final creation or revelation, but in terms of development, can religion be left out? Instead of being a pond around which once for all a man can walk and take its measure, a final and completed whole, is not Christianity a river which, maintaining still reliance upon the historic springs from which it flows, gathers in new tributaries on its course and is itself a changing, growing and progressive movement? The question is inevitable in any study of the relationship between the gospel and progress, and its implications are so far reaching that it deserves our careful thought.

This idea that Christianity is itself a progressive movement instead of a static finality involves some serious alterations in the historic conceptions of the faith, as soon as it is applied to theology. Very early in Christian history the presence of conflicting heresies led the church to define its faith in creeds and then to regard these as final formulations of Christian doctrine, incapable of amendment or addition. Tertullian, about 204 A. D., spoke of the creedal standard of his day as "a rule of faith changeless and incapable of reformation." From that day until our own, when a Roman Catholic Council has decreed that "the definitions of the Roman Pontiff are unchangeable," an unalterable character has been ascribed to the dogmas of the Church of Rome. Indeed, Pius IX, in his Syllabus of Errors, specifically condemned the modern idea that "Divine revelation is imperfect, and, therefore, subject to continual and indefinite progress, which corresponds with the progress of human reason." Nor did Protestantism, with all the reformation which it wrought, attack this central Catholic conception of a changeless content and formulation of faith. Not what the pope said, but what the Bible said, was by Protestants unalterably to be received. Change there might be in the sense that unrealized potentialities involved in the original deposit might be brought to light—a kind of development which not only Protestants but Catholics like Cardinal Newman have willingly allowed—but whatever had once been stated as the content of faith by the received authorities was by both Catholics and Protestants regarded as unalterably so. In the one case, if the pope had once defined a dogma, it was changeless; in the other, if the Bible had once formulated a pre-scientific cosmology, or used demoniacal possession as an explanation of disease, or personified evil in a devil, all such mental categories were changelessly to be received. In its popular forms this conception of Christianity assumes extreme rigidity. Christianity is a static system finally formulated, a deposit to be accepted in toto if at all, not to be added to, not to be subtracted from, not to be changed, its i's all dotted and its t's all crossed.

UNIVERSAL GROWTH

The most crucial problem which we face in our religious thinking is created by the fact that Christianity thus statically conceived now goes out into a generation where no other aspect of life is conceived in static terms at all. The earth itself on which we live, not by fiat suddenly enacted, but by long and gradual processes, became habitable, and man upon it through uncounted ages grew out of an unknown past into his present estate. Everything within man's life has grown, is growing, and apparently will grow. Music developed from crude forms of rhythmic noise until now, by way of Bach, Beethoven and Wagner, our modern music, still developing, has grown to forms of harmony at first undreamed. Painting developed from the rough outlines of the cavemen until now possibilities of expression in line and color have been achieved whose full expansion we cannot guess. Architecture evolved from the crude huts of primitive man until now our cathedrals and our new business buildings alike mark an incalculable advance and prophesy an unimaginable future. One may refuse to call all development real progress, may insist upon degeneration as well as betterment through change, but, even so, the basic fact remains that all the elements which go to make man's life come into being, are what they are, and pass out of what they are into something different, through processes of continual growth. Our business methods change until the commercial wisdom of a few years ago may be the folly of today; our moral ideals change until actions once respectable become reprobate, and the heroes of one generation would be the convicts of another; our science changes until ideas that men once were burned at the stake for entertaining are now the commonplace axioms of every school boy's thought; our economics change until schools of thought shaped to old industrial conditions are as outmoded as a one-horse shay beside an automobile; our philosophy changes like our science when Kant, for example, starts a revolution in man's thinking, worthy, as he claimed, to be called Copernican; our cultural habits change until marooned communities in the Kentucky mountains, "our contemporary ancestors," having let the stream of human life flow around and past them, seem as strange to us as a belated whatnot in a modern parlor. The perception of this fact of progressive change is one of the regnant influences in our modern life and, strangely enough, so far from disliking it, we glory in it; in our expectancy we count on changes; with our control of life we seek to direct it.

ATTITUDE TOWARD CHANGE

Indeed no more remarkable difference distinguishes the modern world from all that went before than its attitude toward change itself. The medieval world idealized changelessness. Its very astronomy was the apotheosis of the unalterable. The earth, a globe full of mutation and decay; around it eight transparent spheres carrying the heavenly bodies, each outer sphere moving more slowly than its inner neighbor while the ninth, moving most slowly of all, moved all the rest; last of all, the empyrean, blessed with changeless, motionless perfection, the abode of God—such was the Ptolemaic astronomy as Dante knew it. This idealization of changelessness was the common property of all that by-gone world. The Holy Roman Empire was the endeavor to perpetuate a changeless idea of political theory and organization; the Holy Catholic Church was the endeavor to perpetuate a changeless formulation of religious dogma and hierarchy; the Summa of St. Thomas Aquinas was the endeavor to settle forever changeless paths for the human mind to walk in. To that ancient world as a whole the perfect was the finished, and therefore it was immutable.

How different our modern attitude toward change has come to be! We believe in change, rely on it, hope for it, rejoice in it, are determined to achieve it and control it. Nowhere is this more evident than in our thought of the meaning of knowledge. In the medieval age knowledge was spun as a spider spins his web. Thinking simply made evident what already was involved in an accepted proposition. A premise was drawn out into its filaments and then woven into a fabric of new form but of the same old material. Knowledge did not start from actual things; it did not intend to change actual things; and the shelves of the libraries groan with the burden of that endless and largely futile cogitation. Then the new knowledge began from the observation of things as they really are and from the use of that observation for the purposes of human life. Once a lad, seventeen years old, went into the cathedral at Pisa to worship. Soon he forgot the service and watched the chandeliers, swaying from the lofty roof. He wondered whether, no matter how various the length of their chains, they all took the same time to make their swing, and because he had no other means he timed their motion by the beating of his pulse. That was one time when a boy went to church and did well to forget the service. He soon began to wonder whether he could not make a pendulum which, swinging like the chandeliers, would do useful business for men. He soon began to discover, in what he had seen that day, new light on the laws of planetary motion. That was one of the turning points in human history—the boy was Galileo. The consequences of this new method are all around us now. The test of knowledge in modern life is capacity to cause change. He can illumine cities and drive cars. If a man really knows engineering, he can cause change; he can tunnel rivers and bridge gulfs. It is for that purpose we wish knowledge. Instead of being dreaded, controlled change has become the chief desire of modern life.

When, therefore, in this generation with its perception of growth as the universal law and with its dependence upon controlled change as the hope of man, Christianity endeavors to glorify changelessness and to maintain itself in unalterable formulations, it has outlawed itself from its own age. An Indian punkah-puller, urged by his mistress to better his condition, replied: "Mem Sahib, my father pulled a punkah, my grandfather pulled a punkah, all my ancestors for four million ages pulled punkahs, and, before that, the god who founded our caste pulled a punkah over Vishnu." How utterly lost such a man would be in the dynamic movements of our modern western life!—yet not more lost than is a Christianity which tries to remain static in a progressive world.

GOD'S PROGRESSIVE REVELATION

God's revelation of himself is just as real when it is conceived in progressive as when it is conceived in static terms. Men once thought of God's creation of the world in terms of fiat—it was done on the instant; and when evolution was propounded men cried that the progressive method shut God out. We see now how false that fear was. The creative activity of God never was so nobly conceived as it has been since we have known the story of his slow unfolding of the universe. We have a grander picture in our minds than even the psalmist had, when we say after him, "The heavens declare the glory of God." So men who have been accustomed to think of revelation in static terms, now that the long leisureliness of man's developing spiritual insight is apparent, fear that this does away with revelation. But in God's unfolding education of his people recorded in the Scriptures revelation is at its noblest. No man ever found God except when God was seeking to be found. Discovery is the under side of the process; the upper side is revelation.

Indeed, this conception of progressive revelation does not shut out finality. In scientific thought, which continually moves and grows, expands and changes, truths are discovered once for all. The work of Copernicus is in a real sense final. This earth does move; it is not stationary; and the universe is not geo-centric. That discovery is final. Many developments start from that, but the truth itself is settled once for all. So, in the spiritual history of many, final revelations come. They will not have to be made over again and they will not have to be given up. Progress does not shut out finality; it only makes each new finality a point of departure for a new adventure, not a terminus ad quem for a conclusive stop. That God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself is for the Christian a finality, but, from the day the first disciples saw its truth until now, the intellectual formulations in which it has been set and the mental categories by which it has been interpreted have changed with the changes of each age's thought.

While at first, then, a progressive Christianity may seem to plunge us into unsettlement, the more one studies it the less he would wish it otherwise. Who would accept a snapshot taken at any point on the road of Christian development as the final and perfect form of Christianity? Robert Louis Stevenson has drawn for us a picture of a man tying with cords and pegs to stake out the shadow of an oak tree, expecting that when he had marked its boundaries the shadow would stay within the limits of the pegs. Yet all the while the mighty globe was turning around in space. He could not keep a tree's shadow static on a moving earth. Nevertheless, multitudes of people in their endeavor to build up an infallibly settled creed have tried just such a hopeless task. They forget that while a revelation from God might conceivably be final and complete, religion deals with a revelation of God. God, the infinite and eternal, from everlasting to everlasting, the source and crown and destiny of all the universe —shall a man whose days are as grass rise up to say that he has made a statement about him which will not need to be revised? Rather, our prayer should be that the thought of God, the meaning of God, the glory of God, the plans and purposes of God may expand in our comprehension until we, who now see in a mirror, darkly, may see face to face. "Le Dieu défini est le Dieu fini."

AUTHORITY IN RELIGION

Obviously, the point where this progressive conception of Christianity comes into conflict with many widely accepted ideas is the abandonment which it involves of an external and inerrant authority in matters of religion. The marvel is that that idea of authority, which is one of the historic curses of religion, should be regarded by so many as one of the vital necessities of the faith. The fact is that religion by its very nature is one of the realms to which external authority is least applicable. In science people commonly suppose that they do not take truth on any one's authority; they prove it. In business they do not accept methods on authority; they work them out. In statesmanship they no longer believe in the divine right of kings nor do they accept infallible dicta handed down from above. But they think that religion is delivered to them by authority and that they believe what they do believe because a divine church or a divine book or a divine man told them.

In this common mode of thinking, popular ideas have the truth turned upside down. The fact is that science, not religion, is the realm where most of all we use external authority. They tell us that there are millions of solar systems scattered through the fields of space. Is that true? How do we know? We never counted them. We know only what the authorities say. They tell us that the next great problem in science is breaking up the atom to discover the incalculable resources of power there waiting to be harnessed by our skill. Is that true? Most of us do not understand what an atom is, and what it means to break one up passes the farthest reach of our imaginations; all we know is what the authorities say. They tell us that electricity is a mode of motion in ether. Is that true? Most of us have no first hand knowledge about electricity. The motorman calls it "juice" and that means as much to us as to call it a mode of motion in ether; we must rely on the authorities. They tell us that some time we are going to talk through wireless telephones across thousands of miles, so that no man need ever be out of vocal communication with his family and friends. Is that true? It seems to us an incredible miracle, but we suppose that it is so, as the authorities say. In a word, the idea that we do not use authority in science is absurd. Science is precisely the place where nine hundred and ninety-nine men out of a thousand use authority the most. The chemistry, biology, geology, astronomy which the authorities teach is the only science which most of us possess.

REALM OF EXPERIENCE

There is another realm, however, where we never think of taking such an attitude. They tell us that friendship is beautiful. Is that true? Would we ever think of saying that we do not know, ourselves, but that we rely on the authorities? Far better to say that our experience with friendship has been unhappy and that we personally question its utility! That, at least, would have an accent of personal, original experience in it. For here we are facing a realm where we never can enter at all until we enter, each man for himself.

Two realms exist, therefore, in each of which first-hand experience is desirable, but in only one of which it is absolutely indispensable. We can live on what the authorities in physics say, but there are no proxies for the soul. Love, friendship, delight in music and in nature, parental affection—these things are like eating and breathing; no one can do them for us; we must enter the experience for ourselves. Religion, too, belongs in this last realm. The one vital thing in religion is first-hand, personal experience. Religion is the most intimate, inward, incommunicable fellowship of the human soul. In the words of Plotinus, religion is "the flight of the alone to the Alone." You never know God at all until you know him for yourself. The only God you ever will know is the God you do know for yourself.

This does not mean, of course, that there are no authorities in religion. There are authorities in everything, but the function of an authority in religion, as in every other vital realm, is not to take the place of our eyes, seeing in our stead and inerrantly declaring to us what it sees; the function of an authority is to bring to us the insight of the world's accumulated wisdom and the revelations of God's seers, and so to open our eyes that we may see, each man for himself. So an authority in literature does not say to his students: The Merchant of Venice is a great drama; you may accept my judgment on that—I know. Upon the contrary, he opens their eyes; he makes them see; he makes their hearts sensitive so that the genius which made Shylock and Portia live captivates and subdues them, until like the Samaritans they say, "Now we believe, not because of thy speaking: for we have heard for ourselves, and know." That is the only use of authority in a vital realm. It can lead us up to the threshold of a great experience where we must enter, each man for himself, and that service to the spiritual life is the Bible's inestimable gift.

If, however, Christianity is thus a life, we cannot stereotype its expressions in set and final forms. If it is a life in fellowship with the living God, it will think new thoughts, build new organizations, expand into new symbolic expressions. We cannot at any given time write "finis" after its development. We can no more "keep the faith" by stopping its growth than we can keep a son by insisting on his being forever a child. The progressiveness of Christianity is not simply its response to a progressive age; the progressiveness of Christianity springs from its own inherent vitality. So far is this from being regrettable, that a modern Christian rejoices in it and gladly recognizes not only that he is thinking thoughts and undertaking enterprises which his fathers would not have understood, but also that his children after him will differ quite as much in teaching and practice from the modernity of today. It has been the fashion to regard this changeableness with wistful regret. So Wordsworth sings in his sonnet on Mutability:

> Truth fails not; but her outward forms that bear
> The longest date do melt like frosty rime,
> That in the morning whitened hill and plain
> And is no more; drop like the tower sublime
> Of yesterday, which royally did wear
> Its crown of weeds, but could not even sustain
> Some casual shout that broke the silent air,
> Or the unimaginable touch of Time.

Such wistfulness, however, while a natural sentiment, is not true to the best Christian thought of our day. He who believes in the living God, while he will be far from calling all change progress, and while he will, according to his judgment, withstand perverse changes with all his might, will also regard the cessation of change as the greatest calamity that could befall religion. Stagnation in thought or enterprise means death for Christianity as certainly as it does for any other vital movement. Stagnation, not change, is Christianity's most deadly enemy, for this is a progressive world, and in a progressive world no doom is more certain than that which awaits whatever is belated, obscurantist and reactionary.

Church Intelligence

By George Lawrence Parker

(Speaking to Horatio—Layman and Deacon.)

'TIS a vast subject, Horatio, and one to frighten children with. A microscopic laboratory subject with large bespectacled eyes and deep furrows upon the brow! But no, again, it is not such! It is a side-splitting topic that sends up laughter to the skies!

For if there be one thing funnier in this world than another, it is the quirk that most people get in their brains when you ask them to express themselves on church matters; and not only on "church matters," but on religious problems of the simplest, most practical and personal sort. It's a wonder to me that some reverent Cervantes or Rabelais has not given us "The Funniest Book in the World," made up of, say, the reasons why men don't go to church, or of the skidding of men's minds when they come to these subjects.

Now, Horatio, with these swift and well-chosen words, let me introduce to you three living persons, with myself as the actual interlocutor in each true incident. And perhaps, Horatio, when you have digested these incidents you will understand that our recent army tests spoke the literal truth when they reported that the American mind is exactly thirteen years old! And likewise, as a deacon, you may rejoice that these same tests were not carried on among church folks! Alas, I fear the age would have fallen to seven or eight!

But I delay too long, Horatio! Let me present to you Person Number One!

She is a clergyman's daughter, and is at present a member of my church—no, she is not my daughter! To proceed—she is the wife of a business man; they reside in one of Boston's(!) most desired suburbs; they have a charming little daughter of twelve. And the mother, too, is charming! But more important still, she comes to church regularly, and with the rearing given her by her good preacher-father—I met her in the train that morning with some anticipation of an "otherwise to what I got!" Excuse my rough-shod grammar, Horatio.

"Thank you so much for your good sermon of last Sunday, Mr. P.," she said.

"I appreciate your presence in church," I replied; that's always a safety-first formula I use when my sermons are mentioned.

"And you know," she went on, "I just can't understand why more men don't come to church."

"Well," I said, "a good many do come, after all. Life is complex these days; and I am not inclined to be too critical of our men."

"Anyhow, I think it's queer," she insisted; "but then, of course, if the Bible isn't true any longer, maybe there's no use in coming."

SERMONS ON THE BIBLE

O, ye Angels! I had been giving a series of sermons on the Bible, urging its more insistent use, on the basis that modern scholarship has made it a more usable book than ever before; and that it now stood in a place of respect where its deep spiritual lessons are clearer than ever.

And here was my result—"if the Bible isn't true any longer"!

"Besides," she continued before I could catch my astonished breath, "there is something different about men who go to church and men who don't."

"Yes," I assented. Daylight at last, I thought; I will be patient.

"You know, I've watched the men whom I've seen in church ever since I began to grow up—(note the time limit, Horatio)—"and," she looked very serious, "and they always seemed to me so soft and narrow." Now soft things have a way of spreading out, and so I did not catch the connection of these two adjectives. I waited further developments, only interjecting—

"The men in our church just now, Mrs. Arbuthnot, seem to me quite a strong group. Take, for example, Mr. Thompson, chairman of our rebuilding committee."

I had exploded a bomb!

"Well, I know he's deeply interested and a great help in the church, but he's not a man who—well, he doesn't appeal to me at all. I certainly could not ever have thought of marrying him!"

I quoted to myself, "Nobody asked you, Ma'am," with variations. Then I waited again, breathless.

"That's what I mean; they aren't strong; not men whom I could think of as ever courting me. I couldn't fall in love with any of them; you see what I mean! No, Mr. Arbuthnot doesn't go to church, and I suppose you blame him; but really he appeals to me so much more than any other man in our church! I don't know why, but I noticed that same thing about all the men I saw in father's church as I grew up; and I've noticed it ever since. It seems to me that it is the unattractive men who go to church! Anyhow, they don't appeal to me. I couldn't think of marrying them. I wish Mr. Arbuthnot did go to church; I really do. But maybe his kind really weren't intended to go. Maybe they're strong enough without it. And I guess that's one reason why the churches don't grow, don't you think so? But I must get off here; this is my station. Goodbye! I've enjoyed your talk so much!"

STRANDED

Before I could recover she was gone; gone, smiling, charming, contented, convinced of her logic, and leaving poor me stranded on a lonely beach like a fish washed up by the waves.

A lonely beach, I say, Horatio, for I had never before roamed through that region of reasons for men not coming to church!

Now, remember, Horatio, this was a real conversation; remember, too, that she was an intelligent woman; a graduate of one of our best schools. She reads books. She has a preacher-father who is a student. She is rearing a daughter. And, mark you, she lives in a world where even the comic sheets of the day are telling us that we must learn how to think! Sad, sad are my tears, Horatio; for sooner can the church save sinners, it seems to me, than make intelligence intelligent when it doesn't want to be!

Now, allow me to present Person Number Two.

"I have a good deal of trouble with Priscilla," said Mrs. Thornton, as I sat in her handsome drawing room.

"How old is she?" I asked.

"Just beyond thirteen; our only child. She wants to do things I never dreamed of doing."

"Children of today live in a different world from the one we grew up in," I replied.

"I told her the other day how many advantages she had," continued Mrs. Thornton, as if I had said nothing very important. "She was cross and unhappy, and I described to her, for instance, how splendid it was to have the telephone and the automobile. I never had them at her age. And what do you think she said, Mr. P.? Well, this is what she said, 'Mother, I don't call the auto wonderful; I've ridden in it since I was born. And the crazy telephone—everybody's got one, so it can't be so great after all!' That's what she said! And I used to think the telephone a perfect miracle. I can recall the first day we had it, as if it were yesterday!"

"But, you see, Mrs. Thornton," I suggested, "there was no 'first day' of the telephone for Priscilla; the very doctor who ushered her into the world was summoned by telephone. It's as common and necessary to Priscilla as food and clothes. It was wonderful to you and me, especially if we lived in the country. But in a world completely covered with telephones since she entered it, it is not likely that Priscilla will consider the phone a miracle or even much of a privilege. It can't be expected that she will think it adds much to her personal happiness, not at least until she has to test it in some real crisis. Your miracle and mine is to her just one more convenience and necessity; this convenience and necessity she did not create, nor did she have any original desire for them."

"Now, that's true; but I declare I never thought of it before. I see what you mean. Strange, isn't it?"

"Do you get a chance to talk much with Priscilla," I asked, "on subjects that seem to worry her?"

THE WHY OF THINGS

"Not much. She asked me the other day just why we ought to go to church; and why Christians started churches anyhow. And, really, I did not know what to say to her. I hadn't ever thought about it. And when I asked Mr. Thornton he said he hadn't ever thought of it that way, either. And then, it's queer, when she asked me why I didn't want her to dance in the vulgar way that the other girls do, I couldn't answer that either; at least I couldn't tell her! You see, I don't get a chance to talk with her often, and maybe that makes me shy about it; I am not very strong, and I have to rest nearly every afternoon. I think we'll have to send Priscilla to a girl's school where she can get the Bible and all of these other things taught to her. O, dear, it's an awful problem!"

"I will be glad to know Priscilla better," I said, "and maybe I can help her."

"I would be so grateful; and I'm so glad you called. Goodbye, and do come again." And just then Priscilla came in; as pretty a bit of joyous young girlhood as was ever given to a mother to rear for God and humanity. But

Mrs. Thornton was going to send her away to school; leave her own house empty, and her heart idle, yearning for a companionship that now stood at her elbow and smiled up into her mother's and my face!!

Now, Horatio, mark you—I think the church of the Christ who loved children must wake up Mrs. Thorton before it blames Priscilla. And if it's just plain dynamite that's needed, let it be used to get the soil broken up for the Priscillas to grow in! As I left that house I was sure that our educational system had left Mrs. Thornton just thirteen years old; and the church had not added much to her wisdom. But, though I did not hold the church guiltless, she was the least guilty of all concerned.

KEEP OFF THE GRASS

And now let me present to you Person Number Three. He is calling me by phone.

"O, yes"—that's my "Hello."

"Is this Mr. P.?"

"Yes, it is," politely. "Who is speaking, please?"

"You don't know me. My name is Thorpe."

"Good morning, Mr. Thorpe."

"Mr. P., are you going up to your church in the village today?"

"I go most every day, but today I can't be sure. Can I do anything for you?"

"You are rebuilding there?"

"Yes."

"Well, yesterday at lunch time I saw a lot of your workmen sprawled out on the grass in front of our church; and our lawn has cost us a lot of money, I want to tell you, and I don't like those men ruining it; not one bit do I like it."

"Have they hurt it?" I asked in surprise.

"No, but they will if they keep on. And I don't think it should be allowed. I hope you'll take the matter up at once." While he caught his breath, and I mine, I quoted to myself, "And Jesus made the men sit down on the grass."

"Well, Mr. Thorpe, perhaps some day we can let your workmen sit on our grass. Over at our church we thought all the grass belonged to the Lord, but maybe it doesn't." I confess that my sense of humor got the best of me. "I'll do my utmost to see that no harm is done, but after all—"

"O, well, if you are not interested in this trespassing, I'll look after it myself; guess I can keep 'em off." And the telephone was sharply hung up.

Now, mark you, Horatio, he was a real leader in a large church; in a world where all of us are wondering how we can get the laborer back into the church, and how we can preach brotherhood between capital and labor. And, mark you, all of this took place in a village that Bostonians point to with pride as the home of Christian culture! In a village where there are five Protestant churches close to one another, all preaching the same Christ, and all of whose folk share a common social life; and in whose pulpits the words, "Church Unity," are often announced as a sermon topic. What shall we do, Horatio? Are we really living in 1922 or are we not? Do we mean anything we say about Christianity or not? And as for intelligence in religion, do men lay aside their minds when we ask them "to think on these things"?

Sad, sad are my tears, Horatio; for I love the church and I cannot give up my intelligence!

To Our Subscribers

It requires two weeks to make a change of address. It is necessary that our wrappers be addressed a full week ahead, and time is required to handle accurately the large volume of requests for change that come to us at this season of the year. Unless your vacation period is somewhat extended, we advise that you leave a few one-cent stamps with your postmaster or postman, and ask to have your Christian Century forwarded to you. You thus avoid the risk of missing a copy both at the beginning and at the end of your vacation.

We desire that our readers shall not miss a single issue, and while we will gladly make any change of address requested, we are sure the risk of irregularity is greatly reduced by the plan we suggest.

Experience proves that it is highly unsatisfactory to handle a change and a change back in one order. Our subscribers on vacation will therefore please take note that in their own interest we are disregarding all deferred "change back" orders and will wait for specific instructions at the time the subscriber wishes the "change back" to be made.

Two good rules to remember:

1) One change at a time;
2) Give present as well as new address.

What's Happening in Germany?

IN AN article on Dr. Rathenau in The Christian Century of June 15th we said "his great talents, his transparent honesty, and his sincere democracy make him the man of the hour in Germany, both for the new republic at home and before those of other nations who honestly desire a new world, based on justice, peace and constructive ideals." The week before we had said "it is quite likely that the way Germany, the heart of Europe goes, so will all Europe that is in revolution go." Dr. Rathenau stood, not only against the militarist junkers and the communists, but between the socialists and the monarchists of the milder type (those who desire a king after England's model), as the leader of the democratic party, so when the militarists assassinated him the radical communists did not weep. He was made the mark of the same murderous gang that slew Erzberger and has killed more than three hundred republicans since the revolution. Every person assassinated, says Maxmillian Harden, has been a republican and the killer has been a monarchist and military officer in the old army.

The blow at Rathenau was a blow at the republic. Only a day or two before the tragedy a monarchist member of the reichstag had exclaimed "we have sanctified Eisner and Erzberger. Rathenau should be sanctified." At the time of Erzberger's assassination Munich was reading editorials boldly advocating killing. The other day the president of the Bavarian state publicly wished for the return of the monarchy. Ludendorf and his type have not ceased to campaign with the cry that democracy is weak, that the republican government is cowardly to agree to any treaty demands and that only by the restoration of the powers that made Germany great and strong can it be saved now.

On the other side the public's reply to the ghastly deed was a great popular demonstration on behalf of the republic, and at present there seems to be a reaction that strengthens the hands of the government. Even the "people's party," the party of Stinnes, which we were told last summer was overwhelmingly, in its rank and file, in favor of a monarchy after England's model, has, through its executive declared in favor of the republic as the only possible means of reconstruction.

Will Germany Go Monarchist?

Those who were in our group in Germany last summer have unceasingly preached, since returning home, that there was grave danger of a monarchist coup with bloody internal war, that such a turn of events would be the most deplorable that Europe could face, and that the first requisite of safety was the stabilizing and strengthening of the republican government.

Now comes Premier Poincare of France with a like declaration—the very man who has been doing more to make the present chaos possible than any other in the world. England and Italy have steadfastly for the past year sought to give the republic a chance to live by reducing its burdens to a level where there was a working program possible for it, and their every move has been checked by Poincare—at Cannes, Genoa and the Hague; saber rattling has been his only answer. Now come the guarantee committee of the commission on reparations warning that Germany is in grave danger of being "engulfed by a social and economic catastrophe which will shake Europe to its very foundations."

Dr. Rathenau gave our party a long interview one afternoon last August and later three of us obtained another for more intimate questions. One of them was "will the monarchy come back?" His reply was that it would not unless the country was reduced to economic chaos. "Then," he said, "as so often in the history of revolutions, the 'man on horseback' may appear, promising strong leadership, and the distracted people will follow him." He told how the working people had laid down their tools until Kapp's Putsch had failed and said they would do it again but that economic ruin might destroy their front. That same evening the great labor leaders declared they would never tolerate the return of the monarchy. "We will strike as a mass and starve before we will submit to it." In a striking article in the June number of "Our World," William G. Shepard, who has spent several months there, tells why he believes they will do exactly that thing. But that fact may not prevent a bloody attempt to overcome the government.

We had two long sessions with ex-chancellor Michaelis, who was non-committal on the subject, preferring to give us a scholarly analysis on why there might be a swing to monarchy in time. He thinks it will be of the British type if it does come and that the question will not be settled for a generation perhaps. It took France seventy-five years to settle it, swinging back and forth from republic to king. He pointed out the success of the monarchy in developing scores of feudal and warring principalities into a strong nation, frankly warned that the old class education leaves the majority of the educated men in the land trained to monarchical, class, and bureaucratic ideas of government, and told us that the romance of their history was all of the lord and peasant type. He does not want blood and reaction, but favored leaving the whole matter to the suffrages of the people after reconstruction and experience in democratic ways had given reflection and poise. One gathered that he personally had little choice between a strong federal republic and a monarchy like England's.

Danger Lies in the Extremists

One night we listened to a scholarly address on the philosophy of communism by one of its leaders, a highly educated young man, who boldly declared he was ready to take his rifle and help bring in a dictatorship of the proletariat whenever the hour was favorable for action. When asked about the return of a monarchy he said a bloody reaction on its behalf was possible, and added significantly that his party would welcome it. "Then," he said, "four or five millions of the working classes who now follow this mongrel government will join us and we will have a real revolution." What he would welcome without disguise is a very real danger. First there would be a monarchist coup through a fanatical group of militarists and ex-army officers charging the reichstag perhaps and seizing the government, then a bloody street rising of millions in a guerilla warfare that would reenact the scenes of Paris and Moscow. Finally Poincare could march his legions across the Rhine and seize the Ruhr and all that, but he would collect no reparation, make no peace, nor even save himself from a reflexion of Sparticide fever from within France.

The present German government is a coalition of Rathenau democrats, social democrats, i. e., moderate socialists who put the bringing in of a republic before any schemes of economic revolution and whose social program is that of a progressive socialization, and the Centrists, or Catholic party in which the Christian labor union (so-called to distinguish from the socialist union) is now in the ascendant, under the leadership of Premier Wirth. If the attempt at a reactionary uprising through the assassination of Dr. Rathenau results in the people's, or business man's party, joining in the coalition the government will be strong against internal enemies, but that will not bring strength to overcome the ever present and more ponderous danger that lies in the economic situation.

The Economic Danger

The fundamental danger lies where Dr. Rathenau put it. He stood for a sincere and energetic effort to keep faith and refused to accept the place of foreign minister unless the cabinet agreed to go the limit in living up to the reparation demands. He told us he saw no hope except through so great and sincere an effort to keep the verdict of the victors as would convince the world of their good faith and the extent of their ability to do or not do. He was willing to make enemies at home if necessary for the sake of making friends abroad simply because he saw in that the sole hope for a new world with Germany in it. He pictured to us vividly the handicaps under which they are working. They must have raw materials to manufacture and food to eat. Of neither do they have enough at home. They must pay gold but have so little that there is no hope of a guaranteed paper currency. To get gold or raw materials they must export goods but this cannot be done until they are made. To pay bills the government must print paper marks; they are worth no more than a promise to pay and the more remote that promise becomes the less they are worth; thus more and ever more must be printed. This sends prices up, makes buying abroad more difficult, leaves wages always behind prices and increases the difficulties of living for the masses. It matters less what the mark is worth than it does that one never knows what it will be worth tomorrow. Business becomes a speculation; a few grow enormously rich off the speculative nature of business and the government and the masses get poorer and poorer.

Last year Germany produced only 57 per cent of her normal food supply, exports rose to only one-third pre-war heights, industrial production was only about 60 per cent normal, and profits, after taxes, averaged less than 3 per cent. Prices are ever on the rise until now even the exchange rate makes things little cheaper than in lands with good money. Wage income equals less than one-half pre-war purchasing power and the salaried classes are much worse hit. The London News and the New York Journal of Commerce both set forth in detailed figures the proof that the German people pay the highest taxes of any in the world. They work, but without reward, and every pressure by the victors sends the mark down, thus making the government weaker and the ultimate hope of reparations smaller, with the possibility of reaction and then radicalism greater. There is no peace attainable through war methods.

British Table Talk

London, July 11, 1922.

IT IS hard to explain why, but the fact remains that we are more hopeful for Ireland today than we were a week ago. The publication of the numbers voting for the treaty at the recent election is very significant. It is as clear as daylight that the majority is overwhelming. Under the method of proportionate representation, which is the system in Ireland, it is possible for the unskilled reader to miss the meaning of the figures. This system is one which makes generous provision for minorities. That is its virtue, but it may obscure the fact which closer analysis of the figures reveals that Ireland at the election was undoubtedly behind the free state government, and it only remains now for that government to rally to its aid all its supporters, and then—. But why is one so foolish as to look ahead in the history of Ireland! "Ireland" for the moment has been supplanted in the general mind by the excitements of the lawn tennis championships. It is a chastening, but salutary experience for this nation to look on while championships are competed for by representatives from other lands. The little French lady, Mademoisselle Lenglen, who has attained the honor of being named by the crowd as "Suzanne," has left the spectators spellbound by her skill. The papers say that a certain section of the crowd at Wimbledon has been anything but chivalrous, but these spectators are very few and probably mere sensation-hunters, who have never played a game in their lives. It can be said with confidence that the British sportsman, and most of our race come under that head, plays "the game" himself and recognizes and applauds "the game" when he sees it in others.

Church Reunion

We are not to have a summer vacation from ecclesiastical debates. The document to which I have referred before, signed by the leading churchmen and free churchmen, is still warmly discussed. Dr. Garvie, Dr. J. D. Jones, and Dr. Carnegie Simpson have all taken up the defence of their action in signing the reply to Lambeth. They clearly show that it was never meant to be a final agreement; it must be submitted to other councils; and they claim with some justice that their critics from the free church side have not understood how far the Anglicans have moved. If it is urged that in matters of truth or falsehood there is no compromise to be made, the answer must be—are we prepared to treat questions of church order as matters of truth or falsehood Is it possible for any of us to say, for example, that "Episcopacy" is false and "Presbyterianism" is sure? In such questions either something like a comprehensive system is possible in which both sides must yield something, or church reunion must be indefinitely postponed. And meanwhile for some of us the problem is not a western one at all. It is always of the church of India and China we are thinking. Here is the position as the Chinese see it; the quotation is from the third of the magnificent reports presented at the Shanghai National Christian conference and deals with "The Message of the Church." Its significance is due to the fact that it is the work of Chinese Christians alone. "The church in China as introduced from the west has a great deal of western coloring. Its denominational differences and various forms of church government follow closely, as yet, those of the churches in the west. Since, however, we have not the same historical background in China, there is no need for us to perpetuate these divisions. There is, therefore, a strong desire on the part of the Christians in this land to bring about a much closer union of these various church bodies, so that the prayer of Christ for unity may be more speedily fulfilled." This is courteously stated, but no one reading these documents can be under any mistake about them. They show that the Chinese church is now in being, and proposes to hold itself free to take its own way of service. But what a splendid church it promises to be! We in Europe may be once more at some future time stretching out our hands to Asia, crying "Come over and help us!"

Conferences

The Wesleyan Methodists are about to be, the Anglo-Catholics have been, in assembly. The latter are full of energy and zeal, and they are clearly seeking to rally under one banner various groups within the Anglican church. They seem to look, less than they did, Romewards, though they claim their right to many practices which their fathers would have rejected. They talk freely of "mass," yet at the same time they show a great zeal for "evangelical preaching," and they will not allow themselves to be classed with the obscurantists. This is how one of their number put their position in a recent sermon at Cambridge. It will be admitted that the words are vague and general, but they show a generous spirit.

"We look back, and claim continuity with the church of the earliest and later ages. We look back, over the amazing history of the church and we must feel that only the supernatural character of its life has preserved it in its all too feeble struggle against the forces of evil without and within. We look back, and in spite of much that shocks and pains us we are proud that we are able to claim continuity with the supernatural society of the church of Christ.

"But if there is continuity of life there is also development of apprehension and expression of the implications of the faith, a development in which human experience of spiritual things and the struggles of the human intellect play their part. There is experience, and there is thought interpreting experience. It may be the experience of a St. John or a Teresa; but it is a human experience, though of a spiritual thing. The intellectual expression may be that of some dominating master intellect, some illuminated saint, an Athanasius, an Augustine, or a Thomas Aquinas; but it is a human experience. It may be, we believe it is true, that the thing expressed is supernatural, but the intellect that wrestles to express it is human, and speaks in terms of its own age."

The Centenary of Shelley's Death

It is our bounden duty and our joy to celebrate the fame of Shelley, the noblest of our lyrical poets and one of the seers, who loved liberty and justice, not tepidly, as most men do, but with a passion which consumed him. Yet when we read the praises which are bestowed upon him dead, we wonder if he were living now with the same spirit would he be praised? It is always safe to make eulogies upon the dead, who of the past are "all that cannot pass away," and this praise is in itself a witness to our underlying recognition of the great causes, but it is a pity that we are slow to recognize the seers while they live. I always remember, when the name of Shelley is mentioned, two things: the essay of Francis Thompson and some lines written by William Watson:

> "Impatient of the world's fixed way,
> He ne'er could suffer God's delay,
> But all the future in a day
> Would build divine
> And the whole past in ruins lay
> An emptied shrine."

To these references I should now like to add another. The words are from Mr. Clutton Brock:

"The tragedy of this world, as Shelley saw it, is not that Jerusalem stones the prophets, but that the very nature of things is against them when they come before their time; and it is a real tragedy. The philosopher can live at ease in this world thinking about another—Plato, even, seems to have accommodated himself to life as well as most men; but Shelley had seen that other world, was haunted by hints and whispers of it always. That which is a problem abstract and almost mathematical to the thinker was practical to him; he was like an angel who has lost his way back to heaven; and in his poetry, as in the music of Mozart, we hear the wailing, the questioning, the beating of wings in the void."

A Significant Question

In the quarterly which he edits, The Pilgrim, the bishop of Manchester, Dr. Temple, asks a question and leaves it unanswered. The article is entitled, "Has Europe a Future?" He speaks of the guilt of the war as the guilt of all Christendom. All European nations are interdependent, and we must make Europe a unit in our thinking. "From the European point of view the war was civil war." For the future our chief hope, he declares, is in the league of nations, and he asks how long will America hold aloof? But what is the duty of the church? Here comes the question: "Should the church take the decisive step of calling upon all Christian citizens to refuse to serve in the armies of their nations, except where these armies are fighting under the direction of the league and in defense of its authority? At present I ask the question only." But it is an important question, and others might begin to ask it.

A True Tale from China

A certain military officer was approached by reformers, anxious that opium growing should be checked in his district.

"Leave it to me," he replied. "I will see that it is stopped."

So he issued a decree forbidding the growing of opium, but at the same time he let it be known that the decree was not to be taken seriously. For such an indulgence he received no little money. This he sent to a bank. But the curious learned of this money and reported it. The military man was asked by what means he had in his possession such treasure.

"The governor of the province," he replied, "trusted it to me for the purchase of rice."

They wrote thereupon to the governor, who replied: "Yes, it is true. The money is mine. Let the rice be bought." So it came to pass that the governor got his rice and the villain lost his money.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Honey or Poison?*

IN the elegant office of the late Mr. Heinz this motto, among others, was painted on the wall: "The bee gets his honey from the same blossom from which the spider gets his poison." What shall we get from this book of Esther—a book which Martin Luther hated? God is not mentioned in the book, there is no lofty ethical appeal, while on the other hand revenge, pride, cruelty and hatred are sanctioned. The sword is bloody in this book. We may rightly study Esther in this quarter, for it seems to belong to that series of writings intended to keep up the patriotism and national spirit of the Jews in a trying and depressing time. As a drama in five acts the piece takes high rank, as religious literature it is of little value. The spider-mind could find plenty to feed upon in this book and could fill his pouch with rare poison—hatred, brutality, lust, and revenge. Going as a bee, can we find something to feed our souls; is there any honey in this red-flower? There is one idea which ought to inspire us—the willingness for social sacrifice on the part of the beautiful heroine, "I go and if I perish, I perish." Thus the queen risked her life for her people. She did this only after the pressing argument of her uncle Mordecai; relief was bound to come from some source, if not from her it meant the end of her father's house. He added in fine phrase: "And who knoweth whether thou art not come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" The only weakness in this argument is the very fact that one does not know whether one is born for this hour and task or not, but it sounds good, and it encourages one to make the adventure.

However, there need be no doubt but that one should invest his life in some altruistic enterprise; the social appeal is, after all, the most powerful. Once convince Arnold Toynbee that he ought to bury his life in Whitechapel and nothing can hold him back; once lead Judson to believe that India calls him, and he will go; young men could not resist the patriotic call of the world war; trained nurses responded to the needs in danger zones, without a thought of personal welfare. This is one of the noblest traits in human nature—this response to social need. "Your country needs you," "China needs you," "Your family needs you"—these are the calls that bring out the most unselfish elements in our natures. If Queen Esther had failed to obey this summons she would have been despised as a vain, shallow and selfish person, and the story would present another angle.

Oliver Wendell Holmes used to say: "Faith in something, enthusiasm for something makes life worth living." Have you not noticed that with people of large capacity it is just one enthusiasm after another? Now it is building a hospital, now endowing a college, now backing the athletics of the "Alma Mater," now buying and stocking a farm, now finding and reading a new author, now religious education in the church, now a trip to the Orient; but always some new thing, some new object of interest, some enterprise into which life and money can be poured with joy. Men and women of such capacities can be won for the church when the appeal is social and generous. One of the things which most makes me admire human nature is this enthusiastic response of large calibered people to such unselfish objectives. If the church is only alive, if the objective presented is only large enough, if the need is sane and strong, men and women of the noblest parts will cheerfully, generously hurl themselves into the work. I had the honor once of being the president of a social settlement board, and, will you believe me, the richest people of that city, the social leaders, served on that board, gave generously of their money, and more than that, gave time and talent without stint, to the unselfish work among the foreigners of that community. You have only to convince them that the work is worth while. Saving life is fascinating business. Jane Addams is a modern Queen Esther; Mary McDowell at the Packingtown settlement is another. Graham Taylor, George Bellemy and a host of others have been pouring out their richest talents for years in the service of all who need. Good Samaritans of the present are these good people.

*Lesson for August 13, "Esther Saves Her People." Scripture, Esther 4:10-17; 5:1-3.

This much we can depend upon, God has not given us an endowment or opportunity for nothing. Whether we have come to the kingdom for such an hour as this or not, we know that it is this hour or none so far as we are concerned. What we have we must invest, while we live we must serve, nor can we wait for a fairer field or a happier hour; the call is urgent and imperative.

CORRESPONDENCE

An Error of Detail

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Will you permit me to correct one or two misleading statements made in an editorial entitled, "A Million Cans of Milk for Russian Children," in the July 20 issue? The editorial states that the committee's "overhead expense is entirely provided for by other than publicly subscribed funds. Every dollar given actually reaches Russia where it is distributed by Rev. George Stewart, a Presbyterian minister of New York, and Mr. Frank Connes, interpreter of the supreme court of New York." It is true that some of the overhead expense is provided for, in this way, but not all. No overhead is charged for distribution in Russia. A small, unusually small overhead for the raising of funds does come out of general contributions. This is of necessity true of practically all relief and charitable organizations. Mr. Stewart, of the Madison Avenue Presbyterian church, and Mr. Connes are our representatives in Russia, but they do not have charge of distribution. They are making an investigation of our stations and will bring back to the American people a report of what they find.

Permit me also to take this opportunity to thank you as editor of The Christian Century for the aid you have given us, through this editorial, in bringing to the attention of your readers the need of babies of Russia, for whom the need will continue to exist even after the harvests are in. May we hope that they will, in response to your appeal, answer this cry of the helpless little children who will look to us for life.

New York City.

PAXTON HIBBEN,
Executive Secretary, American Committee for Relief of Russian Children.

The Miners' View

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: A. W. Taylor's article, "Putting an End to Strikes," is great. There is a great deal said about peace in industry. There will have to be justice before there is peace. There is considerable assertion about the rights of the public. When did the public ever care how a coal miner has to live? The New Republic recently pointed out that the miner has always suffered more than this dear fellow they call the "public." And how has the miner rid himself of such evils of the past, as grafting company stores, long hours, miserable wages, unsanitary conditions and all such? By the initiative and sympathetic action of the "public"? No. Whatever advances the coal miner has made in bettering his conditions of employment he has done by the strength of his organization.

I have been out on two strikes. The first one was in a large "unorganized" factory. We lost. The company forced us to sign contracts which held back 10 per cent of our wages until July 1, at which time we received this reserve "not as wages earned, but as a gift from the company." And if we should quit before July 1, Santa Claus would not even notice us. Now, that is "freedom." How men would stand by it is explained only by their love for wife and babies at home.

The other strike was in a mine where we refused longer to work in a thick powder smoke that was frightful to the eyes and lungs. Formerly the boss would have manifested his interest in our welfare by inviting us to go to Halifax or some other resort. But as we had a large local of the U. M. W. A. which deprived us of the sacred right to work in poisonous air we "resigned temporarily." When we returned there was a fan large enough to furnish sufficient atmosphere to blow the Mormon pipe organ in Salt Lake at long range.

The general public does not know that the Herrin riot was started by the shooting of two strikers by hired gunmen. Apparently, the massacre which later occurred was one of revenge by the strikers, whose minds had been inflamed by the outrage on the part of the gunmen. Here is the account given by the mayor of the town. "On Wednesday, June 21, some of our boys started to the Southern Illinois strip mine to undertake to talk with the strike-breakers who were herded in the mine and guarded by Chicago gunmen. The moment they approached the mine they were fired on by the gunmen and two fell mortally wounded and the crowd retreated to a place of safety and as news spread men from all the surrounding towns began to arm themselves and the entire night was taken up by firing from both guards and the infuriated crowd. I have talked to the men who were in the conflict, men who know all about what happened. They were in the hospital and their story is 'that on the morning of June 22, they surrendered and the men who started to town with them really meant to take them to the train, but the mob which gathered as they marched along the fatal road, completely overwhelmed them and took charge and the brutal slaughter took place.' "

Truth and Labels

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: An editorial paragraph in The Christian Century of July 13th concerning the "Theological Seventeen" of Columbus, Ohio, raises a question that has often occurred to me. Which is the better way to present any new or unusual view of old doctrines, by a challenge to discussion or by a straight-forward statement without reference to any other view. Sometimes the label aligns people for or against, without regard to merit. Departures from the traditional view would many times be unrecognized as new if not so labeled. The average church member knows little and cares less about the questions at issue between the traditionalist and the modernist. He would not know one from the other withthe label. I believe the modern view of the Bible may be taught and gain general acceptance if dormant prejudices are not aroused by antagonism or challenged to resistance.

I have felt that such a suggestion to preachers might be worth while. And I know no one who can say it better than you and certainly no journal that is read by more aggressive, forward looking preachers. This is not to denounce all public discussion. There may be times and occasions that demand such discussion, but the pulpit is not the place. Truth needs no label to secure acceptance. The label is often the occasion of division. There are people who like the Athenians of Paul's day are eager for something new. There are others who are equally partial to the "old paths" and the "traditions of the elders" if they are so labeled. Otherwise, that is without the label, neither would know one from the other.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Automobile Dealers and Others Claim Their Rest Day

The tendency is for business to respect the Christian rest day. The automobile business is new, and in many cities the sales rooms of the various car agencies are open. Recently the Pittsburgh Automobile Dealers' association took a large space in the local papers to tell the public that they would in the future close up their places of business on Sunday. This action has aroused much favorable comment in church circles. The real estate business is developing organization in various cities, and in Evanston and Wilmette, Illinois, these dealers announce that they will not do business on Sunday. Most lines of business find that just as much can be done in six days as in seven, and perhaps more.

Veteran Bible Scholar Making Fresh Study of the Prophets

Sir George Adam Smith, who is one of the best known of living old testament scholars, has recently been delivering a series of lectures on the prophet Jeremiah. These lectures are to be put in book form shortly. The Christian world is deeply in his debt for many books of significance in old testament study, particularly of the prophets. Though advanced in years, the virility of the great scholar is in no measure abated.

Growth of Superstition Following the War

The war has not been the signal of advancement in religious thinking, but rather the beginning of reaction. The United States is familiar with the revival of premillennialism and other out-grown forms of religious thinking. In other countries of the world reaction takes even more violent forms. In Africa there has recently been a prophet movement which has seriously compromised the Protestant Christians in the eyes of the government. In New Zealand the ministers have in many cases gone over to a belief in demonology. Certain forms of mental disease among the Maoris are being explained upon this basis. There ought to be a place in the world for the burning of witches in order to make the catalogue of revived religious superstitions complete.

Christian Union Coming to a Section of Africa

Only the conservatism of the home boards prevents the missionaries from forming native churches in many mission fields of the world. One reads of the ardent desire of many Chinese for a church embracing all the Christians of China. In Africa recently the Kikuyu conference devoted its sessions to the study of Christian unity. The missionaries voted in favor of establishing a native church and of ordaining a clergy for it. The various supporting boards will be asked to give their consent to this practice. If the union of the various denominational missions is achieved, the resulting organization will be called the African Church of Christ.

Publicity for Bible Verses Reaches Millions

The Bible may be found in most homes, but the average man is lost in this great volume for the lack of someone to guide him to the passages he needs. The shorter Bible was issued to meet his need, but one of the most significant movements of the time is that of some Cincinnati business men who are now sending Bible selections to 871 newspapers in various parts of the United States. The circulation of the journals taking these Bible selections is said to be ten millions. Through this means many millions of people are brought into daily touch with the holy scriptures.

Business Men in Church Every Morning

While the pessimist bewails the increasing wickedness of the world one can find here and there some signs of increasing piety. Trinity church in New York is in the heart of the business district. Its doors are always open and people are always welcome to come in and rest and pray. It has been noted by the sexton that an ever-increasing group of business men come into the church of a morning before starting the business of the day. Their dress marks them as men of large affairs. They come without newspapers and engage in devotions each morning. No invitation has ever been given by the church, but the open door and the general invitation to use the church at any time has brought this result.

Methodist Church Comes Into the Union

For ten years a federated church has been operating at Somerset, Mass., in which the Baptists and Congregationalists have correlated their work. Recently the Methodists voted to unite with them as well and the pastor of the Federated church has been appointed a Methodist preacher by the district superintendent. Rev. Edward A. Mason is the pastor and henceforth he will carry the complete responsibility for the religious care of Somerset.

Fifteen Thousand Become Baptists in a Single Winter

Russia has always had as many sects as the United States, but because of government restrictions, they had to operate in many cases in secret or maintain a nominal connection with the state church. Now that the church in Russia is disestablished, dissent is making very large gains. The Baptists have recently received word of a mass movement in the west of Siberia. Here in a single winter fifteen thousand pressed into their churches, insisting that the ice be cut in the rivers for their baptism. The Baptists were for a time out of favor in Russia because of the fact that Baptist workers had so often come from Germany. Negotiations for union between the Baptists and the Evangelical Christian churches continues. This would make a very large communion were it consummated.

Advent Christians Hold National Conventions

Not all Adventists keep Saturday as their day of rest. The Advent Christian church is not much different from other evangelical churches save in the matter of its teaching on the second coming. The national convention of this denomination was held in Plainville, Conn., recently which was the largest in the history of the denomination. Gains have been made in church membership, Sunday school enrolment and in receipts for benevolent work. Rev. L. P. Reynolds was continued as general director with headquarters in Boston.

Soldiers Are Becoming Ministers

Even though ex-soldiers are not numerous in the audiences of the churches in many cities, nevertheless the theological seminaries are reporting a large number of ex-soldiers in their classes. It is now known that there are 1,100 legion men in the enrolment this year, and in the graduating classes there were 475. At Nashotah House, which is a school of the high church party of the Episcopal church there were five former soldiers in the graduating class this year. Some of these men during the war saw the significance of religious work in the services which were rendered to them by the religious workers, and in consequence have devoted themselves to the cause of religion.

Ministers Are Quoted Against Union Document

The document recently issued by bishops and leaders of the free churches is getting its share of criticism from religious leaders in England these days. Not only do the high church leaders oppose the plan for unity, but many of the most prominent free churchmen as well. Several of the latter have joined their criticisms in the following manner: "Principal Blomfield (Rawdon), president-elect of the Baptist Union, points out that "the new concordat leaves open the mode, the subjects, and the spiritual meaning of baptism," and exclaims, "What a foundation for a united church!" "The harm done already is considerable," he concludes; "let there be no more of it!" Principal Grieve (Lancashire College) says "the document is dominated throughout by the notion of authority rather than that of the freedom of the spirit, by the conception (thinly disguised) of uniformity rather than of unity, by the mechanism of officialism rather than the spontaneous play of brotherhood and cooperation. Dr. Horton asks, "Is not the one thing necessary, if Christianity is to win our expanding and developing race, to emancipate it from the deadening theory that its essence lies in its ministry, its hierarchy, its papacy, or any other accidental externalism of its development?" Dr. Griffith-Jones considers that the committee started at the wrong end by approaching the question of reunion from the point of view of organization instead of that of spiritual faith."

Federation Secretaries Form Plan for Joint Action

Three state federation secretaries while in attendance at the Chicago meeting recently formed a plan by which there would be joint action in New England this coming autumn, when the Massachusetts and Connecticut federations will hold their annual meetings on Nov. 2 and 3, respectively, and there will be a conference of all state and local federations in New England on Nov. 1. These leaders in New England look to the west for light and leading. They have invited as special speakers for these meetings Rev. B. F. Lamb, executive secretary of the Ohio federation, and Rev. Arthur H. Armstrong, executive secretary of the St. Louis federation. The Massachusetts federation will meet in Boston and the Connecticut federation in Hartford.

Wesleyan Methodists Oppose Methodist Reunion

There are three leading Methodist denominations in England, Wesleyan Methodist, Primitive Methodist and United Methodist, the first of which is larger than the other two. Ministers of the two smaller bodies commonly favor reunion, but recently six hundred ministers of the Wesleyan church signed a manifesto in which they declare themselves opposed to any sort of union with the other kinds of Methodists. It has been rumored that these ministers would look with more favor upon union with the Church of England than with the Methodists of the other denominations.

Will Build Rescue Home in Japan

With more than a million young women in Japan now at work in factories, the historic isolation of women in that country has come to an end, and these social changes have created grave moral dangers. The United Lutheran church recently sent a cablegram to Japan announcing to Lutheran workers there that a rescue home for girls will be built. Half of the five thousand dollars necessary to make the beginning of the work has been cabled to Japan, and the remainder will be forthcoming at an early date.

Quiet Talks Will Be Given Out of Doors This Summer

Mr. S. D. Gordon, who has achieved fame as an author, will give a series of quiet talks this month at his summer home in Ridge, N. H., where he will hold simple out-door services at the twilight hour on the green in front of the old Congregational church. Those attending will bring their own stools or rugs and dispose themselves comfortably. The following topics of quiet talks have been announced for a period early in August: "Sunday, Aug. 6, 'Tight corners, blind alleys, and how to get out'; Monday, Aug. 7, 'Is it God's will to heal our bodies today?' Tuesday, Aug. 8, 'Those who have died, what can we know positively about them?' Wednesday, Aug. 9, 'Can we have communication with our loved dead?' Thursday, Aug. 10, 'What is the sane poised truth about Jesus' personal return?' Friday, Aug. 11, 'Is there another chance after death?' "

Pennsylvania Has Competitive Lutheranism

In no state in America is Lutheranism more competitive than in Pennsylvania. Were creeds and confessions efficacious in uniting people, the Lutherans would all be one, for both creed and catechism come from the hands of Luther and his companions. But the journal of the United Lutheran church in this country expresses the following rather gloomy judgment with regard to the situation in Pennsylvania: "In our capacity of unprejudiced observer, we feel constrained to state to our readers that a regrouping of the congregations that constitute the ministerium of Pennsylvania, the east Pennsylvania synod, the Susquehanna synod and the central Pennsylvania synod is at present impossible. We do not expect the present divisions to remain forever. We are confident, however, that they cannot be overcome, until the present reasons for division are overcome. We expect that to occur, and in the interest of much better Christianity and much more effective Lutheranism in a part of the church from which God expects great service in the next decade, we report the agreement of a committee representing these four synods to meet next October to consider ways and means of workers together in departments where they now work apart. We have hinted at evils of reduplication, evils of overlapping, evils of unchurchly rivalry in past issues. But the positive demands of neglected portions of our responsibility are even stronger reasons for closer unity."

New Kind of Sisterhood Is Formed

The Roman Catholic church has formed a new sisterhood in Canada with headquarters in Toronto. This society is called the Sisters of Service. It will be the first Roman Catholic sisterhood in the world to decide to dispense with any distinctive dress. The sisters will work in the great British northwest from Winnipeg to the Pacific ocean and their service will be with Roman Catholic mothers. They will seek to have the children of these mothers instructed in the Christian faith and the sisters will be the forerunners of the church in many cities where there is at present no Roman Catholic church.

English Dean Remarks Upon American Traits

There is no better fun for an American than reading or listening to what the English think of us. From the days of Charles Dickens until now our English cousins have been trying to assist us in mending our ways, but they feel gloomy all the time about inducing any

Dr. Conrad Arraigns Modernists

Dr. A. Z. Conrad, pastor of Park Street Congregational church of Boston and fundamentalist leader, who spoke before a group of fundamentalists at Moody Institute recently, arraigned the modernists for seventeen detailed errors. As he proceeded he grew more severe, and the following were some of the counts against his brethren of the liberal persuasion:

"Its tenth mistake is that a creedless church and a creedless personality make for liberality and self-expression. The truth is the creedless church is a spineless church, a jelly fish church. It is never fighting human misery, it never produces great missionaries, nor develops in its members people of convictions so strong that they are willing if need be to die for them.

Modernism's eleventh mistake is that prayer is merely a wholesome subjective exercise, with no power as a procuring cause. This runs squarely in the face of the practice and teaching of Jesus.

Its twelfth mistake is that sincerity, independent of reality, is sufficient to procure divine approval. But God says, "There is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof is the way of death."

Its thirteenth mistake is that the teachings of Jesus are subject to human revision and correction, and hence are not vital and authoritative. If this is true we have no gospel, no assurance of salvation or eternal life.

Its fourteenth mistake is that traditional Christian beliefs are discredited by the discoveries of modern science and archæology. This is simply untrue in every feature and phase of it. One of the most astounding facts is the corroborative support modern science and archæology alike afford revealed religion.

Its fifteenth mistake is that belief in an authoritative Bible is obstructional and non-progressive. This is positively contradicted by the balance of testimony of Christian history, and especially Christian missions.

Its sixteenth mistake is that scholarship is incredulous and skeptical as to the experiences and beliefs of Christian people and hence radical. On the contrary the highest and holiest thinking of this time and every time is done by men who are under the sacred spell of the spirit of the eternal God. The very highest scholars of today accept without hesitation the great fundamental beliefs of the Bible and Christian people.

Its seventeenth mistake is that the final court of appeal in all matters of faith is human experience rather than Jesus Christ."

New Books on

Christ in Today's Life

In the amazingly puzzling times in which men find themselves today, there is no fact of greater significance, or more hope-radiating, than that thoughtful men are turning for guidance to the great Teacher and Master. New book catalogs bristle with striking titles which point to Him who alone can lead men out of darkness into light. The Christian Century Press has selected the following as really great books. All of them endeavor to see Jesus, not merely as a hero of the first century, but as the true leader for men and nations in this twentieth century.

Jesus and Life

By Joseph F. McFadyen, D.D.

A fresh and searching interpretation of the Gospel of Jesus in its social implications. The author, who is professor of New Testament in Queen's University, Kingston, Canada, says in his preface: "We are realizing as never before that the christianizing of men, of all men, in their relations is not so much a matter of interest to the church as a matter of life and death for the world." ($2.00).

The Guidance of Jesus for Today

By Cecil John Cadoux, D.D.

This book is an account of the teaching of Jesus from the standpoint of modern personal and social need. Says Canon James Adderley: "It recalls by a shock to the bewildering problem of applied Christianity and makes us once more suitably uncomfortable. I want everybody to read it." ($2.00).

The Open Light

By Nathaniel Micklem, M.A.

This interpretation of Christianity by one of England's younger Christian thinkers takes its title from William Morris's lines, "Looking up, at last we see the glimmer of the open light, from o'er the place where we would be." The author says: "I hope this book may help to make Christianity appear more reasonable and more beautiful." ($2.00).

Christianity and Christ

By William Scott Palmer.

"Twelve years ago," says Dr. Palmer in his introductory note, "I was profoundly influenced by the critical examination of Christian documents and of Christian origins, by science generally and by the new movement in philosophy. I felt impelled to revise my religious beliefs. It was a kind of stock-taking, and took the form of a diary, now long out of print. Many trials have come upon the Christian religion and the church since then. It seems to be time for a new stock-takng on my part; and I propose to write a new diary and in it ask my new questions and find, perhaps, new answers." Dr. Palmer is author of "Where Science and Religion Meet." ($2.00).

Studies in the Inner Life of Jesus

By Principal A. E. Garvie, D.D.

This is not a new book, but a new edition of a very great book by the noted head of New College, London. The Congregationalist says of the book: "Its chief value is in its emphatic insistence upon the genuineness of the human experience of Jesus, coupled with the constant acceptance of the uniqueness of his nature as the only-begotten and well-loved Son of God." ($3.00).

reformation. Recently Dean Inge of St. Paul's Cathedral, called "the gloomy dean," but known as one of the cleverest writers of the English church, spoke on the Americans and the necessity of the British understanding them. He said: "For all their cleverness, they are a simple people, much simpler than we are. Superficially, they seem boastful and arrogant; and then something is said which reveals a real modesty, not only about themselves, but about their country, which takes us by surprise." It does not seem to occur to these genial and patronizing critics from across the waters that it is much easier to characterize the English with a thousand years of continuous history on a little island than to characterize a nation of a hundred million drawn from the four corners of the earth and not yet amalgamated by the mythical melting pot which so many think will produce a typical American.

Disciples and Christians Hold Union Meeting

There is no quarrel like a family quarrel. Disciples often have spoken patronizingly of the smaller organization known as the Christian Connection, and the latter once sued the Disciples in Ohio for exclusive use of the name Christian. This foolishness of other days is passing for ministers now pass from one fold to the other occasionally, and talk of union is sometimes heard. In Dayton recently there was a union meeting of three Disciples churches and three "Christian" churches in the Central Disciples church where Rev. C. O. Hawley is pastor. Dr. W. H. Denison was the speaker. It is thought that this union service may become an annual event.

Fundamentalist Preachers in Chicago Have a Separate Organization

The process of schism in many large cities between the fundamentalists and the other ministers has gone to considerable length. In Chicago there is a fundamentalist preacher's union which holds stated meetings, the purpose of which may only be conjectured. Rev. Paul Riley Allen, pastor of North Shore Congregational church, has been president of this organization during the past year. By virtue of this position he was invited some time since to address a meeting of religious liberals composed of Unitarians, Universalists and liberal Jews to tell them what fundamentalism is. On the same program was Horace J. Bridges, leader of the Chicago Ethical society. In some cases denominational groups form separate organizations and of this sort of fellowship there is at least one in Chicago and perhaps more.

Episcopalian Social Workers Gather

The Episcopalians for a second time have met with the National Conference of Social Work. The secular social workers met at Providence, and the Episcopalians held sessions at Wickford, R. I. This year the church workers organized permanently to carry the social gospel to the whole church. The relationship between the church organization and the secular organization was defined by Mrs. John M. Glenn, her subject being "What has the church to add to secular social service?" Rev. Charles N. Lathrop was re-elected president of the conference, and Rev. Charles K. Gilbert, secretary. The Jewish Community Center secretaries also met at the time of the meeting of the National Conference on Social Work, and discussed their relation to the National Conference.

Ancient Church Uncovered at Rome

Archæology has much to give the Christian church yet. Excavators recently broke through a vaulting into an ancient hypogeum, or burial vault in Rome. The room was once occupied by a Christian church. The frescoes on the walls are in the style of the frescoes at Pompeii. Some of the foremost authorities insist that the hypogeum dates back to the first century of the Christian church. The Italian government has taken charge of the place, but has allowed some photographs to be made. Rumor has it that portraits of Peter and Paul are to be found in the burying place.

Universalists Enlarge their Annual Publications

The Universalists formerly issued the Universalist Register as a record of the various organizations of the denomination and as a report of the general convention. This year it will be called "the year-book," and will incorporate much new material of interest to those who wish to know about the Universalist denomination. Dr. McCollester is editor of the volume.

Label Without Libel

Sometimes it's useful (as well as amusing) to try to classify your friends or compatriots, to sort and label them, and then survey the result.

You'll find that the pigeon holes your specimens fall into are more likely to reveal yourselves than your victims. Your own mind will be better displayed in selecting than your subject in being selected.

As, for instance, Mr. Chesterton, who divides humanity into fools, knaves and revolutionists. Or the prominent critic who classifies American authors broadly as either patriotic or unpatriotic. Or the man who groups his fellowmen into Americans and foreigners.

Here in The New Republic office we own to a habit of classifying our countrymen as either "New Republic sort of people" or other sort of people. That shows us up a bit, doesn't it? Particularly if you know what we mean by "a New Republic sort of a person." Here's a letter we just got from one of them—a professor in the University of Southern California:

> "It (the November 16th) is an issue to be proud of; paper, text, a prevailing attitude of fair-play along with a capable handling of particular problems, make the reading of its pages eminently satisfactory; moreover, it has the prime quality of readableness.
> "The New Republic has made a good reputation in the past few years for good sense and thoroughness in dealing with current problems; and this copy shows its qualities at the best."
> Faithfully yours,
> JAMES MAIN DIXON,
> "Professor of Comparative Literature and the Higher Journalism."

That's what we call a "New Republic sort of person"—naturally, because he earnestly writes himself down as one. But there's more to it than that. A "New Republic sort of person" doesn't have to like The New Republic or even agree with it. He may be like the gentleman who "always reads The New Republic with interest because he is so rarely in accord with its reasoning or spirit." In fact, our "New Republic person" doesn't even have to read The New Republic. Broadly, he is anybody who finds thinking not only necessary but actually interesting; who finds impartial discussion not an impractical ideal but a most hard-headed, practical means of getting things done; a democrat who knows that votes may be counted but opinions must be weighed.

But if he's that kind, sooner or later he'll be reading The New Republic. And here are six attractive ways for him to begin:

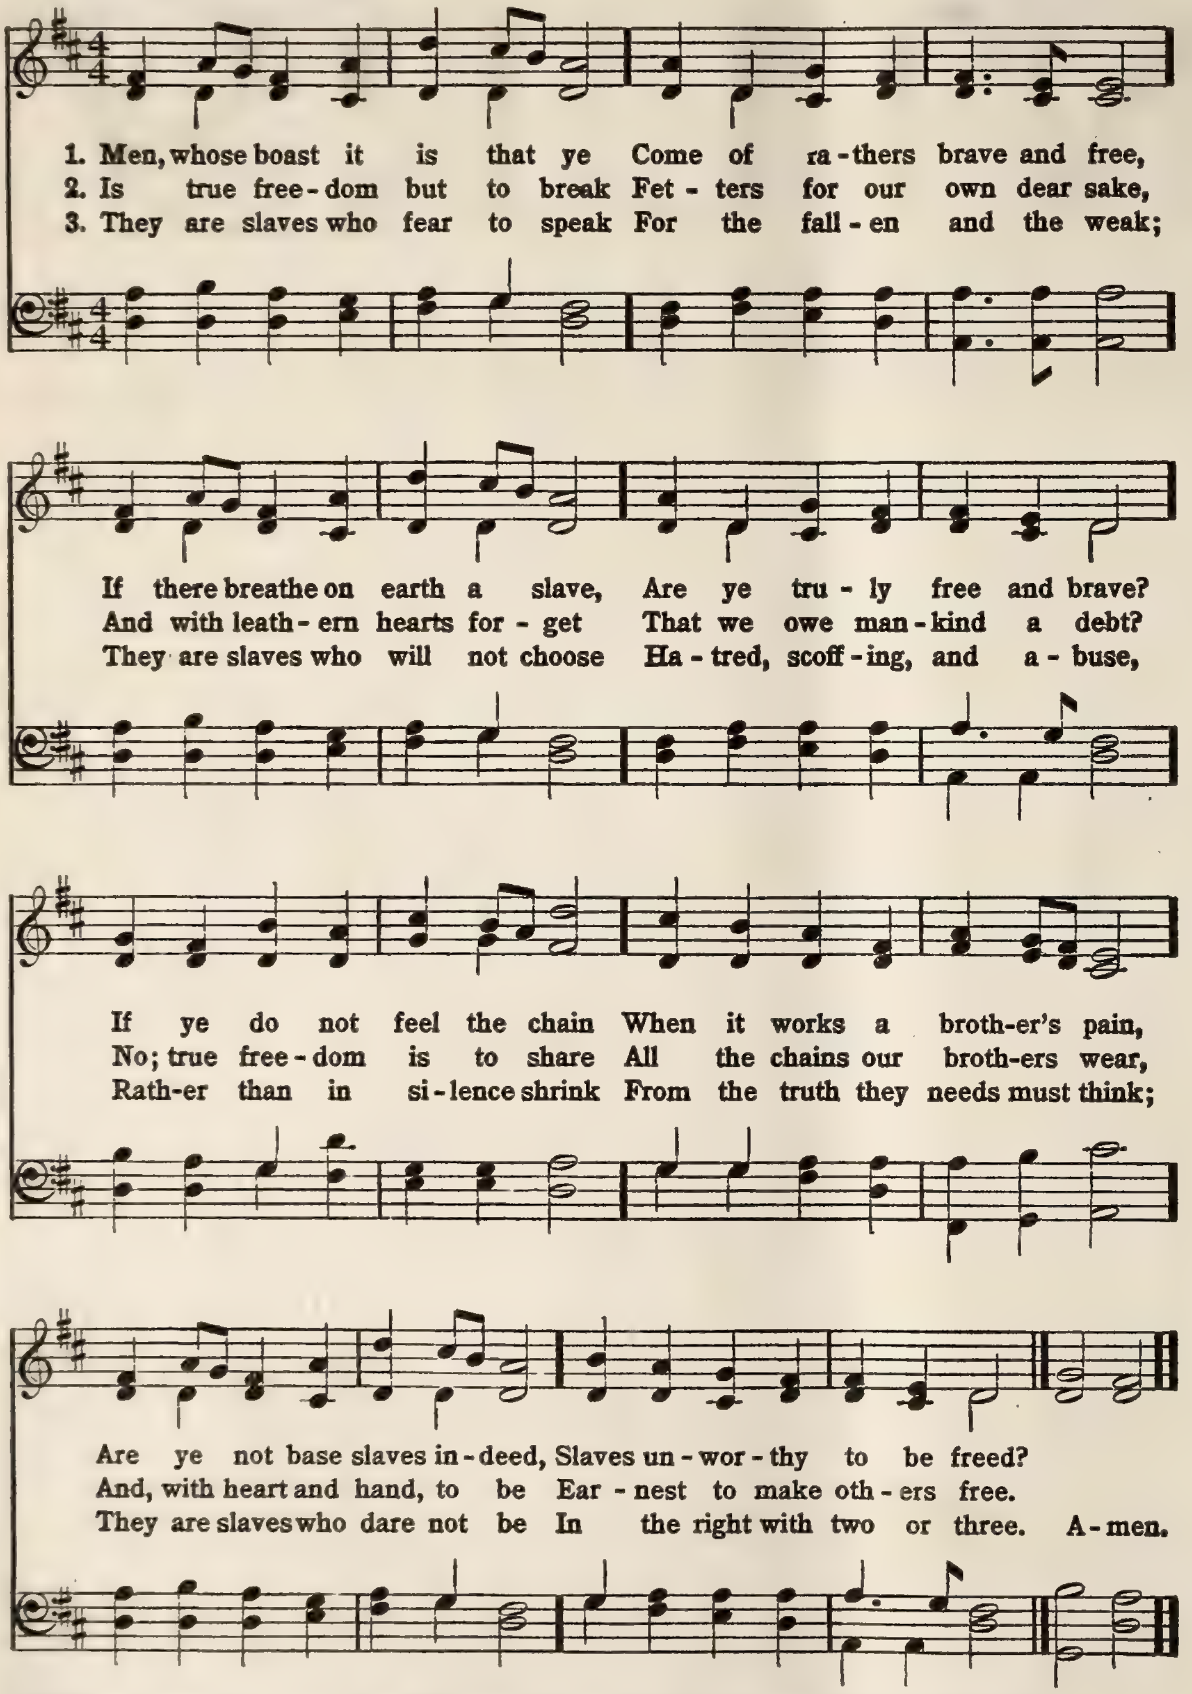
JOHN RICHARDSON, 1853



1. Men, whose boast it is that ye Come of fa-thers brave and free,
2. Is true free-dom but to break Fet-ters for our own dear sake,
3. They are slaves who fear to speak For the fall-en and the weak;
If there breathe on earth a slave, Are ye tru-ly free and brave?
And with leath-ern hearts for-get That we owe man-kind a debt?
They are slaves who will not choose Ha-tred, scoff-ing, and a-buse,
If ye do not feel the chain When it works a broth-er's pain,
No; true free-dom is to share All the chains our broth-ers wear,
Rath-er than in si-lence shrink From the truth they needs must think;
Are ye not base slaves in-deed, Slaves un-wor-thy to be freed?
And, with heart and hand, to be Ear-nest to make oth-ers free.
They are slaves who dare not be In the right with two or three. A-men.

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

is the most inspiring and beautiful hymnal in the American church. All the best loved hymns of Christian faith are included and, in addition, the book is distinguished by three outstanding features:

Hymns of Social Service,

Hymns of Christian Unity,

Hymns of the Inner Life.

Think of being able to sing the Social Gospel as well as to preach it! The Social Gospel will never seem to be truly religious until the church begins to sing it.

A New Interpretation of the Human Struggle

IN the first century, B. C., three Rhodean sculptors produced a masterpiece called the Laocoön Group, of which a marble copy has been preserved in the Vatican Gallery at Rome. It is one of the great works of ancient art. It represents the death struggle of Laocoön and his two sons with the serpents that came up out of the Ægean Sea to punish the priest for his efforts to warn the people of Troy of the dangers of admitting into their city the offered Greek present of the wooden horse. In the sculptured figures the artists have portrayed the supreme moment of suffering when the victims have become conscious of their impending fate and are gradually relaxing their efforts against the twining folds of the twin monsters. Lessing regards this as the world's greatest masterpiece of sculpture, and John G. Holland, an American poet of some distinction, has given in his "Marble Prophecy" a sympathetic interpretation of this work of art as a voice from out the world's experience, speaking from all the generations that are past to all the generations yet to come, of the long struggle, the sublime despair, the wild and weary agony of man, crushed in the folds of the twin serpents, sin and suffering. But a Swedish artist, working on American soil, has given a new interpretation to the ancient theme. In his studio at the Art Center in Washington, David Edstrom is exhibiting a model of his masterpiece, "Man Triumphant," which he has finished after twenty years of study. It is the disclosure of his unfaltering conviction of man's invincible power through spiritual endowment over the forces that would drag him down. In this piece of sculpture, as in the other, it is the struggle of three human figures with a serpent enemy. But the struggle is successful, and the issue is victory rather than defeat. On the four sides of the pedestal as the work is described and illustrated in a recent number of "Art and Archæology," there are figures that represent the achievements of mankind through physical power, through the cultivation of the intellect, through the refinement of the emotional nature, and through religion. "Man Triumphant" is the Christian answer to the paganism and despair of the Rhodean sculptors at the moment when Christianity was emerging into the world.

The Chicago Street Car and Elevated Strike

AT midnight preceding Tuesday, August 1st, a street car strike went into effect in Chicago. At the last moment the workers on the elevated railroad decided to join with the surface men, the total number of strikers running to about twenty thousand. It has been evident for a number of weeks that the tension between the officials of the car lines and their employees has been growing, but there was a certain optimism which forbade the public in general from believing that the narrow margin of difference between the two groups in controversy could permit an actual rupture of relations. The necessary reduction in wages due to the change from an eight-cent to a seven-cent fare under the direction of the State Utilities Commission led the officials of the surface lines to propose a change from eighty cents an hour to sixty-five, together with an increase of regular working hours from eight to nine, after which wages for time-and-a-half should be paid. The labor union demurred to this arrangement, placing seventy-two cents as the minimum of their demands, and declining to accept the nine-hour schedule. Both professed willingness to submit matter in dispute to arbitration, but each eliminated certain of the points at issue from the attempted plan of conference. Gradually, therefore, in spite of earnest efforts made by the many outside groups, the strike has started. The city government appears to be inactive or inefficient in any effort to meet the crisis. The city hall administration is discredited in the opinion of both groups to the controversy. For years it has made the gesture of attempting to secure a five-cent fare and used it as a political issue in the face of clear evidence that such a fare could not maintain the traction companies in solvency. At the present moment the labor people involved in the strike are enjoying a holiday and are apparently in high spirits over their freedom. Later on if the strike should last will come more serious moments. The public is taking quietly and courageously the inevitable inconvenience and dislocation of public interests. This, however, cannot last indefinitely. If the strike should run into weeks the effort of the companies to resume traffic can hardly fail to breed contention and violence. In the incapacity of the city administration to meet the situation, groups of public-minded citizens are attempting to mediate between the two contesting groups. It is to be hoped that their efforts may meet with early success; for, as in all such cases, the losses suffered by the managing companies and by the labor unions, great as they are, are insignificant in comparison with the loss and inconvenience to the public, which is the innocent bystander.

The Place of Athletics in Education

SIGNS are increasing that the responsible heads of universities, colleges and other educational institutions are troubled by the tendencies in college and high school athletics. Contests between the students of different schools are valuable in developing the physical well being of student personnel, stimulating loyalty to one's college, and promoting good sportsmanship. But these excellent features have almost been lost to sight in the present passion for athletic prestige, and the methods employed to secure it. Among the unhappy results of the athletic programs of many of the schools today are the special training, and often the dangerous overtraining, of a particular group of students, rather than the uniform physical culture of the entire number; the extraordinary efforts made to secure promising athletes for the teams, in which attempts the alumni take an active, and sometimes an undue part, indicating their feeling that winning teams are more important to the institution than a properly equipped and adequately paid faculty; the practice of securing a coach who is successful in developing victorious teams, no matter what his moral influence may be upon the student body, and a willingness to pay such a man a salary quite out of proportion to those received by the other instructors; and the stimulation of fierce rivalry between the competing schools, resulting in mass attendance of students at the games, and a growing tendency to gamble on their results. These and other considerations are leading to serious study of the problem by college and high school heads, and the development of plans to limit the area of competition and the importance of coaches. In some such ways alone can athletics be kept from absorbing an undue proportion of student interest, and becoming a menace to educational efficiency.

Are We Socially and Morally Bankrupt?

WINGFIELD-STRATFORD, a distinguished Englishman, has written a book to prove that the world is socially and morally bankrupt. He calls it "Facing Reality," and his thesis is that the failure to face facts is the cause of all the ills that affect us, twisting our minds into every kind of "complex," and that our first duty is to untangle our thoughts. The fact that we refuse to face is that the old order of things, in statecraft, in industry, in religion, is a wreck, and we go on make-believing that it is as good as ever. Unfortunately, we have not the wit of the County Council in the west of England when it resolved, first, to build a new jail; second, to use the material of the old jail to build the new one; third, to keep the old one going until the new one was ready. Instead, we live in a world of chimeras, inverted by advertising, by journalism, by political and social catch-phrases, refusing to see realities and think straight. At times we bethink ourselves to be serious, till the first toy balloon floats by, and we go after that. One more war will wipe out humanity; yet we have not time to bother about it. Truly, it is a stinging indictment of the careless, thoughtless, jazz temper of the times; but like so many such arraignments, it leaves us well nigh where it found us, without any real solution or any way out—except to say that only a change in the basic attitude of the minds of men can save the present civilization.

The Ministry and Church Going

RECRUITING the ministry is not, after all, so important as recruiting the laity. There are thousands more ministers now without adequate audiences than ministers with adequate audiences. Nor is it true that every minister of ability has a hearing. Nearly every city exhibits the scandal of a church where a scholar and Christian gentleman ministers to meager congregations. Interviews with ministers who have left their profession since the war—and they are pathetically numerous—indicate that one of the chief factors in the discouragement of these ministers has been their inability to secure a hearing. In many liberal churches the laity have come to the conclusion that they can worship God on the golf course quite as well as in the church. In conservative churches there are thousands of laymen who insist on the same old sermons concerning primary obedience to Christ being preached over and over, but they are unwilling to go and hear them with any degree of regularity. The Unitarian laymen's league, in raising the slogan "Recruit the Laity," has touched the tender spot in our sick denominations. With the best educated ministry in the United States the Unitarian churches have marked time for a generation when they have not actually lost in numbers. The Laymen's league believes the trouble is not with the ministers but with the laity. That is a new note to sound in a time when all the responsibility for church welfare has been placed upon the bowed shoulders of an over worked profession. Save in the most exceptional circumstances a church is no stronger than its morning congregation. While the modern church has many enterprises including education, recreation, and socialization, none of these good tasks can go forward with energy except they be backed by a congregation of people who love the altars of God. In social worship is to be found the dynamic by which our idealistic impulses are both enriched and sustained.

Racial Prejudice on the Increase

UGLY antagonisms are appearing in the American life. While most European nations have had at one time or another an anti-semitic party, there has been none in this country. The articles in the Dearborn Independent and the widely heralded newspaper reports of discriminations against Jews in educational institutions have helped us to become conscious of the fact that a large section of the Jewish race now lives in the United States. As the children of the ghetto press into the educational institutions, into the leadership of political parties, into journalistic enterprises and into great financial institutions, there is the usual reaction to these encroachments. The friction between white and yellow races on the Pacific coast is an undiminished fact. The most serious racial problem of America is that in the northern cities. Here white and black labor compete in a variety of enterprises. The resentment of the white man is directed against a race which starts with nothing and through industry and thrift acquires some degree of leadership in the community. A wrong-headed leadership in the labor unions bars out black membership. This compels the Negro to be a "scab." The white labor union man refuses to allow the black man to cooperate, and then starts a riot against him when he competes. This fact transfers to the north the center of interest in the working out of the problem of the negro. The riots in Texas recently show that the south has not found a solution, but unless Christian statesmanship meets the problem more serious things will develop in the north. Meanwhile the gospel of racial toleration and universal brotherhood waits upon the ministry of the church. How many pulpits dare to give forth this fundamental doctrine?

A Theatre School to Teach Preachers

INGERSOLL used to say that on the stage they pretend to be natural, and in the pulpit it is natural to pretend. It was a wicked saying when printed without the winning smile; but what would he have said had he heard of a theatre school organized to teach preachers, not how to act, but how to use their voices to the best advantage? Such an enterprise is now afoot in New York city, conducted by Evelyn Hall, an actress, under Theatre School auspices—which proves that the melancholy Preacher of Jerusalem was wrong when he said there is nothing new under the sun. Nor is it a thing to be laughed at. Many a good sermon is spoiled because the preacher does not know how to deliver it. Surely, if the preacher has the best of good news to tell, he ought to use every aid of art to tell it. Joseph Parker learned much from his friend Sir Henry Irving, and Beecher used to study Edwin Booth—asking him to repeat the Lord's prayer, that he might hear it in a manner worthy of its depth and beauty. As between an untaught voice and an artificial elocution there is little to choose; but without going to either extreme there is an art of using the voice which brings out its natural quality and power, and it should be employed in the service of the gospel. The ministers who have joined the class at the Theatre School are to be commended, if thereby they learn to tell the old story in tones of haunting loveliness.

"Old Gospel Tent" and Columbia University

AT 110th Street and Amsterdam Avenue, New York City, not far from the gates of Columbia University, stands the Old Gospel Tent, where revival services are supposed to be conducted. Nowhere is real evangelism more needed than in New York—where America may be seen at its brilliant best and worst—but the men of the Old Gospel Tent think it much more important to denounce Darwin and defy the university—challenging its professors to debate, describing them as "baboon boosters," "monkey-lovers," and the like. What a spectacle for men and angels, an ignorant religion yelping at the gates of a great university! To such depth has the noble office of Christian evangelism fallen that it must play at clap-trap to attract a crowd, belittling philosophy, ridiculing science, the while a wandering evangelist announces himself "as a great authority on evolution!" How one longs for the tender, human appeal of Gipsy Smith, the spiritual common sense of Moody, or the winsomeness of George Truett! Truly Erasmus was right: "By identifying the new learning with heresy you make orthodoxy synonymous with ignorance."

Bernard Shaw on the Church

ASKED "What effect do you think it would have on the country if every church were shut and every parson unfrocked? Do you think a religion is a necessity for the development of a nation? And if so, must it not have some organization for its development? or do you believe that nothing can be organized in the realm of the spirit in this present existence?" Bernard Shaw replied: "A very salutary effect indeed. It would soon provoke an irresistible demand for the re-establishment of the church, which would then start again without the superstitions that make it so impossible today. At present the church has to make itself cheap in all sorts of ways to induce people to attend its services; and the cheaper it makes itself the less people attend. Its articles are out of date; its services are out of date; and its ministers are men to whom such things do not matter because they are out of date themselves. The marriage service and the burial service are unbearable to people who take them seriously—and please do not conclude that I am thinking now of the current foolish and prudish objections to the sensible and true part of the marriage service. Your main point is what would happen if the people suddenly found themselves without churches and rituals. So many of them would find that they had been deprived of a necessity of life that the want would have to be supplied; and there would presently be more churches than ever, and fuller ones. The only people who can do without churches are the simple materialists on the one hand, and on the other those who have no use for institutional worship because their churches are their own souls. That is the Quaker position; but you find such people in all circles. They are sometimes artists, sometimes philosophers; and the irony of circumstance has landed one of them in the extraordinary predicament of being a dean." Again: "Do you think Christ is still a living influence in the present day?" "Yes; but there are, as he expected there would be, a good many very un-Christ-like people trading under his name: for instance, St. Paul. The wholesale rebellion against his influence which culminated in the war has turned out so very badly that just at present there are probably more people who feel that in Christ is the only hope for the world than there ever were before in the lifetime of men now living."

The New Objectives

IT is growing clear beyond all misreading that the important religious bodies are becoming weary of the lesser things that have held a dominant place in their agenda of late, and are desirous of digging down to the deeper and richer veins of spiritual ore that lie as yet untapped in the rocky depths of our age. They are quite convinced that for some time past they have been engaged in surface activities of a more or less secondary importance, and they are not content that such shall continue to be the case.

Some of them have been disturbed by a type of literalism that mistakes minor elements of biblical doctrine for fundamentals, and sometimes goes quite astray as to whether the items so regarded are even matters of biblical teaching at all. Much dust has been thrown in the air by people of this sort, who have imagined that the time had come to turn back the clock of religious scholarship, and return to conceptions of truth that began to fade into obscurity a half century ago. In some of the religious bodies there had been no little disquietude as to whether such reactionary teachings might not be forced into the schools supported by church money ,and even formulated into creeds that might bind the mind and conscience of the coming generation with the dead hand of the past.

In the face of such a movement, which at times looked rather formidable, men of educated spirit, who supposed that certain great milestones in the history of Christian truth had been passed forever, began to search their souls to discover whether they were willing to go on with organizations that appeared ready to commit themselves to the leadership of men of the mediæval mind. It is not to be doubted that some men who should have been of braver fibre have actually left the ministry, finding little to give them heart in the reactionary tendency of recent days. Happily that time is passing, and the tokens are more encouraging than for many months past. One by one the leading religious bodies are putting themselves on record as unwilling to be led into by-paths of conservative dogmatism. The desperate efforts now being made to galvanize the dying cause of fundamentalism now that it has been driven from its opportunity to dominate some of the communions on which it had its designs, are proof that it is soon to take its place among the minor matters that lurk in the borderlands of Christian thinking, ready to come forth again when a suitably lamentable period recurs in human affairs. As the gospel reasserts its power over the lives of men and nations, literalism and apocalypticism of all kinds find themselves of small moment in the program of the church. Of that type of thinking the aware and alert souls who are concerned for the progress of the kingdom of God have had enough and quite enough. They want a vital and progressive faith.

Nor are the devoted people in the churches to be satisfied with the so-called "forward movements" which have been launched by the various denominations during recent years. For a time, under the stimulus of the Inter-church World Movement, and then to make up its arrearages, such work was taken up with earnestness and success. But every promotional leader in the different religious bodies knows that the spell of the "drive" idea has been broken. Most of the members in the churches are weary to desperation with the incessant repetition of the financial shibboleths of their denomination. The business of the promoter has been pushed with the relentless urgency of the professional real estate or insurance salesman, and most of the religious enthusiasm which was at first aroused has subsided.

Furthermore it has gradually dawned upon the thoughtful members of the various churches that the money raised in such spasms of promotional zeal hardly exceeds the amounts which would come into the treasuries of the different missionary and benevolent boards in the regular process of their work, and by the far more constructive efforts of systematic instruction on the great theme of world evangelism and philanthropy. And the pathetic spectacle of the churches using their enormous energies, so needed in the more effective ministries of the salvation of the social order of this and every other land, in drives for the raising of money to build up denominational, often actually sectarian, institutions, is sufficient to make men and women of the serious and reflective sort question whether there is not some more effectual activity in which the ecclesiastical machinery of the present time could be employed.

And it is this note of denominational pride and solicitude which make still more futile the message of the church today. There are religious bodies whose members appear to be drilled in the habit of losing no moment of opportunity to magnify the denomination as an end in itself. It has reached the point where experienced attendants upon religious gatherings, even of a cooperative and interdenominational character, know perfectly well that when the representatives of certain denominations get upon their feet they will not be able to resist the impulse, or the explicit direction, to pronounce somewhere in their speech the name of their sect. They can be counted on with the certainty of gravitation. And the emergence of the denominational label never fails to bring an amused smile to the faces of those who know the psychology of the closed denominational mind.

A foreign missionary magazine came to hand a short time ago dealing with a most important and interesting field. But the editors of that publication appeared to have exhausted themselves in encomiums upon and promotion of the particular "forward movement" of their own church. One would have supposed that the "movement" mentioned was the principal theme of the New Testament, and that the apostles had spent their lives in its creation and furtherance.

The church will not come to its own as long as it is cursed with literalism and reaction in its leadership, or depends on drives, movements, and spasms of evangelistic or financial promotion, or wastes its efforts on the divisive, unconvincing and sinful arts of denominational self-exaltation. Nor while such features have the right of way in any portion of the great brotherhood of Jesus will men and women of light and learning take up the Christian cause with passion and joy.

What is needed in the church today is a new body of objectives. These ought not to be of a dogmatic or doctrinal sort, for the day of such things has passed away. Christian truth is as precious and convincing as ever in the past. But it must be the truth of Jesus and not the creeds of dialectitians. These objectives will not be of the texture of campaigns after numbers of church members or large sums of money. These are useful and indeed necessary in their way. But when they become the objectives of Christian effort they fail of the values they might otherwise possess. The new objectives will not magnify denominational importance or prestige. If the churches are to save their lives it will be by losing them in the divine service of God and humanity.

It is time there was a new and mighty impulse to carry Christianity to the entire non-Christian world. The day has come for a fresh arousal of enthusiasm in behalf of a world evangel. The preaching of the great pioneers of missionary adventure was a compelling challenge to the church. Everywhere today the opportunity is given to interpret in fresh and stimulating terms the message of the faith. The story of the cross is enriched with a score of practical and essential features which the early missionaries had not faced as great opportunties. Education, medical and surgical efficiency, industrial skill, home culture, are all forms of missionary service which help to make Christianity a vital and compelling power in the non-Christian world.

It is time there was a new missionary evangel. The church is waiting for it and the world is prepared. If the churches were to throw themselves into such an effort, through the diffusion of missionary information and earnest emphasis upon the supreme missionary motives which have always thrilled the hearts of the church, a new and marvelous era might be inaugurated in all the lands where the faith of Jesus is still on terms of mere tolerance and suspicion. If Christianity could be preached in forms adapted to the intellectual life of orient and occident alike, and not in the self-annihilating and unscientific terms of many missionary propagandists, there would be a welcome for it everywhere. If its program of expansion could be made so natural a part of the church activities, that without the stress and storm of financial appeal the opportunity were given the church to offer the message of the gospel as quietly and urgently as the home communities provide instruction for their children in the schools, and if most of all the sectarian note could be taken out of the message, so that what is now the weakness and scandal of missions might be changed into the glory of their unifying power in the church, the new objective might be attained.

And most of all, and best, the mind of the church in the home land would be lifted above the pitiful controversies now projected by literalists, and millenarians. If they were given less consideration by the church that had a really great task upon its heart, they would soon cease to disturb. Nor would it be necessary to institute drives and movements to take care of the imperial interests of Christianity. When something of vital and convincing character is in hand, funds are to be found without the employment of methods which lower the dignity of the church, and give the impression of her totally reluctant and unpersuaded spirit. Then too will the great lesson of the foreign mission field become effective in the home area, that the message of Christ is never likely to be taken seriously as long as those who bear it are divided.

Law and Justice

THERE are some subjects concerning which Americans have done an extraordinarily small amount of thinking. Most of them accept their form of government with a delightful simplicity which never indulges in comparison with other forms and never analyzes the sanctions which lie at the basis of all organized life. And although we live in a land which surrounds us by a vast machinery of law few of our people ever stop to think seriously about law or their relation to it. There come times, however, when we are fairly startled into thought. Perhaps it suddenly appears that this vast and intricate system which has been constructed to further the ends of justice can defeat those very purposes. Perhaps we come to see that a series of sanctions evolved in relation to one type of life may work deep and lasting injury when life itself changes its form in definite and far reaching ways. Then we wonder if we are caught in a legal blind alley. We wonder if law is to become the foe of civilization.

At such a time there is one book for us to read. It is a volume not very large in size though it will require close and careful reading. And it is a volume whose great importance will dawn upon us as we read and will be increasingly apparent as we think with careful honesty regarding what we have read. This volume is "The Spirit of the Common Law," by Dean Roscoe Pound of the Harvard Law School. It is published by the Marshall Jones Company of Boston and the lectures which compose it make up the first volume of the Dartmouth Alumni Lectureship, given on the Guernsey Center Moore Foundation in 1921.

The trained reader will observe at once that the book is characterized by the most extraordinary erudition applied with sure and easy mastery to the task in hand. He will move along paths of history covering great distances guided by a mind familiar with all the way. He will have a constant sense of clear and daring thought in a field where it is particularly easy to be content with the expression of rubber stamp opinions. But most of all he will discover that the great and fundamental problems as to the relation of law to human welfare are quite frankly and quite candidly faced. And he will see a great light falling upon the future as he is led to think of the fashion in which we are entering upon a period in which law is to be socialized and so to be made capable of functioning fruitfully and productively in the new civilization of which we are a part.

That phrase "the socialization of law" expressed the position taken by the author of the book which will have most significance to the reader whose fundamental interest is related to the fashion in which men and women and little children are to be enabled to live together helpfully in the difficult days which lie ahead. It is a matter of the deepest encouragement that from the tower of law should come this frank recognition of the terribly urgent nature of the problem of harmonizing law and social justice and the clear declaration as to the fashion in which it can be worked out. It is not too much to say that every American citizen who takes his citizenship seriously should read this learned volume which with all its closely wrought argument deals with matters which have the nearest relation to every individual who has a share in the life of our republic. It may seem a far call from the industrial worker who finds that by some curious twist of interpretation which he does not understand the law defeats him in relation to that justice which is his greatest need and this highly articulated piece of thinking about the very philosophy of law. But the connection is indeed most intimate. Dean Pound shows us how what may seem very sinister had an origin which was not sinister at all. And he also shows us the fashion in which it is to be saved from becoming a very terrible menace indeed. His book should be read by lawyers who would substitute realities for passwords. It should be read by all social workers that they may see the relation of law to the matters nearest their heart. It should be read by all employers and all laborers for reasons which will very definitely appear as they read. It should be read by all preachers who desire to speak intelligently about the relation of law to our social and economic problems. And of course it will be read by the man with a trained mind who knows when philosophy and history meet you always are very close to new insight. In this case you not only approach new insight. You achieve it. And so Dean Pound has put us all into his debt.

The Hand-car and the Limited

A Parable of Safed the Sage

WHEN I was a lad, I rode now and then upon the Hand Car with the Section Gang. And the men of the Section Gang were Wild Irishmen, who wore Red Shirts in Summer.

And as the days went by, the Irishmen went into Politicks, and their places were taken by men of Italy. And these went into the Banking Business, or returned home to spend their Fortunes, and their places were taken by men of Ethiopia.

But I have never forgotten the Hand Car, nor the hard work of pumping it to make it go; nor yet have I forgotten the lessons which I learned from Pat Nagle and Dennis Calihan; and most that they taught me was good. For there is no man too wise to learn from men of humble station; and these were among my teachers.

Now it came to pass about the space of ten days ago, that I rode upon a Fast Train, even the Limited. And we halted for a Signal Block. And just where we halted, there was an Hand Car, drawn up beside the Track. And I spake unto the men who operated it.

And I said, Where are the Pump Handles of Yesteryear?

And the men of Ethiopia spake unto me, saying, This old Shebang runneth by Gasoline; for it is sufficient for us that we work upon the track, and tamp in the Ties, and Bolt in the Rails, and it is up to the Company to see that we get to the job and back again.

And I beheld in them a spirit that was not in the men whom I knew in my boyhood; for since their work at the pump handles came out of the time for which they were paid, they should worry. But it is not so now. And I looked that there should have been a Gasoline Tamper and a Gasoline Bolter and a Gasoline Light for their Cigars.

But one of the men spake unto me, saying:

You-all kin ride all you-all pleases upon de Limited, but ef it hadn't been for de ole Hand Car, dere wouldn't be no Track for de Limited to travel on.

And I considered the matter, and I resolved never to despise the Hand Car. For the great things of this world need the constant help of the things that be humble; and none of us can get on without the others.

At the Day's Beginning

NOT for the eyes of men
May this day's work be done,
But unto Thee, Oh God,
That, with the setting sun,
My heart may know the matchless prize
Of sure approval in Thine eyes.

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK.

The Ku Klux Klan

By Sherwood Eddy

THE writer has returned from an extended tour of the south and the southwest much impressed by the fresh activities of the Ku Klux Klan. He desires to state simply and fairly the facts regarding the recent developments of the klan. The first part of the article deals with the movement as found in the southwest. This portion was submitted to a member of the klan in Texas who approved of it as a fair and impartial statement of the case. He is a man of high moral character who apparently is already growing ashamed of some of the recent activities of the organization. In the second part the writer deals with the movement in the eastern states of the south where it is much more disreputable.

To begin with, I found that many of the best people in the southwest belong to it. I found ministers, Christian workers, and leading citizens among its members. It has grown rapidly since the investigation in Washington was so suddenly and significantly dropped, when the demand was made that the Knights of Columbus and other secret orders be investigated as well. It is the boast of the ku klux members that the administration "got hold of something hot" and had to drop it because they were afraid. In one city that I visited in Texas two thousand men had joined in a day; in another, fifteen hundred. Large processions of masked men have been parading the streets.

We should be fair also to acknowledge that in this section the klan and its members have accomplished some good things. In one city they distributed Christmas presents to needy families, both white and black. In one or two places they have put down bootlegging. In some cities they have endeavored to stand for good citizenship, for the suppression of immorality, especially all clandestine living between members of the white and black race.

AVOWED OBJECTIVES

Let us notice their avowed objectives. These can be seen most readily if we look for a moment at their card of membership. This was given me by three different men who knew that I had no intention of joining; the first time by a lay member, the second time by a minister who is a member, the third time by a non-member who was permitted to have cards in his possession. I was given the card without conditions or reservation and I think it is in the interest of the public that all should know the facts. The card reads as follows:

"NON SILBA SED ANTHAR"
(Not for self but for others)

"Your friends state you are a 'Native Born' American Citizen, having the best interest of your Community, City, State and Nation at heart, owing no allegiance to any foreign Government, political party, sect, creed or ruler, and engaged in a Legitimate occupation, and believe in:—viz.:

The Tenets of the Christian Religion.
White Supremacy.
Protection of our pure womanhood.
Just laws and Liberty.
Closer relationship of Pure Americanism.
The upholding of the Constitution of these United States.
The Sovereignty of our State Rights.
The Separation of Church and State.
Freedom of Speech and Press.
Closer relationship between Capital and American Labor.
Preventing the causes of mob violence and lynchings.
Preventing unwarranted strikes by foreign labor agitators.
Prevention of fires and destruction of property by lawless elements.
The limitation of foreign immigration.
The much needed local reforms.
Law and Order.

"REAL MEN whose oaths are inviolate are needed. Upon these beliefs and the recommendation of your friends you are given an opportunity to become a member of the most powerful secret, non-political organization in existence, one that has the 'Most Sublime Lineage in History,' one that was 'Here Yesterday,' 'Here Today,' 'Here Forever.'

"Present this card at door for admittance with your name, occupation and address. Discuss this with no one. If you wish to learn more, address Ti-Bo-Tim—'Duty without fear and without reproach.'"

By way of explanation, I understand from certain members that "The Tenets of the Christian Religion" means Protestantism and that they regard themselves as a protection against the supposed "menace" of the Jew, the Catholic, the Negro, and the foreigner. Apparently, many of them accept the distorted, foolish, and vicious propaganda that has recently been circulated against the Jews. One is constrained to ask, however, whether the corrective of any dangers, real or imaginary, will be found in sectarian Protestant groups working upon such lines, and what will become of our republic if we are to be broken up into sects and cliques and warring divisions of race and creed. Already anti-ku klux societies are organizing in the southwest. Are we to "Ulsterize" the United States?

While freely granting the well-meaning efforts of good men who belong to the organization and some of the good things that they have done, let us ask whether this movement does not present four great dangers and the menace of four evils, some of them greater than the perils they desire to avert.

THE KLAN AND DEMOCRACY

Does it not constitute a peril to true democracy? One member told the writer that they could no longer trust the government or the courts to make or keep the laws necessary for the public welfare. He stated that the money power was now dominating the country and that the klan must come to the rescue. Let us pause a moment for thought. Supposing that some good people despair of our present government and the courts, and undertake direct action for good ends. What is to prevent other people doing the same? Suppose that twenty million men in labor follow their example and, despairing of justice at the hands of the government and the courts, turn to direct action to settle their industrial grievances. What kind of example is the Ku Klux Klan setting in democracy, in law and order?

In a morning paper of February 22, District Judge Turner of Texarkana, Texas, asserts that the klan activity cripples the law. During the investigation of a recent lynching, "four armed and masked men visited two local newspaper offices last night, asserted they had committed the Norman lynching and defied any one to get them." In Wichita Falls it was charged "that a majority of the members of the grand jury are members of the local chapter of the Ku Klux Klan under dispensation." Before the shades of George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, and Abraham Lincoln, let us ask if this is democracy and does it make for law and order? Witness the proclamation made by the governor of Texas against the alarming growth of lawlessness in the state.

SECRECY AND PUBLIC WELFARE

Let us ask, is the secrecy of the klan healthy or safe in matters pertaining to public welfare? When public questions are kept secret it is usually because of shame, cowardice, ignorance, or selfish privilege. What is the cause of the secrecy of the klan? Jesus said, "In secret did I nothing. I spake openly before the world." Secrecy was not his method. Have we in America lost the courage to stand on our own two feet and speak out, or to combine publicly for social action? Granted that secrecy and mystery appeal powerfully to a certain type of mind, is it healthy, is it safe, is it according to "the tenets of the Christian religion?"

Does the klan imply or involve the dictatorship of a minority by coercive force or fear? "Invisible government" is dangerous. In free America we do not wish to be under the dictatorship of czarist, bolshevist, proletariat, klan or any other minority. We wish a government of all the people, by all the people, for all the people.

Is the klan based on the false premise of race prejudice and race superiority? Mr. H. G. Wells warns us that race prejudice is the most pernicious and most dangerous thing in the world today. He says, "I am convinced myself that there is no more evil thing in this present world than race prejudice; none at all! I write deliberately—it is the worst thing in life now. It justifies and holds together more baseness, cruelty, and abomination than any other sort of error in the world." Let us remember that the race problem is not sectional, but national and world-wide. What does the klan mean by "White Supremacy?" They have told the writer that they cannot give the Negro the vote, though it is provided for in the constitution, because that would mean being placed at the mercy of an ignorant mass of Negro voters. They have constantly reiterated the statement, "We must keep them in their place." But let us ask why should there be an ignorant mass of Negroes or any other native and indigenous section of our population? If school funds were justly appropriated, we could wipe out the illiteracy of the black race that is such a menace to our civilization.

Roughly, one-third the human race is white, nearly one-third is yellow, a little more than one-third is black or brown. That is, two-thirds of mankind are colored people. A belief in humanity involves a belief in colored people. Do we believe in humanity or only in the "supremacy" of our favored class or race,"Deutschland über Alles," "America First," "My country, right or wrong," "White Supremacy," etc.?

OUR TREATMENT OF THE NEGRO

Let us ask in passing what has been our treatment of the Negro? For four hundred years the "Christian" nations ravaged the slave coast of Africa, burning, pillaging, murdering, and dragging the black race into slavery. They were brought here in foul slavers, chained below decks in their filth, in such unsanitary conditions that an average of one in five died upon the voyage. Hawkins, knighted by Queen Elizabeth for his profitable slave trade, conducted his business in his ship the "Jesus." After enslaving this race, we flung them free in economic poverty, ignorance, and illiteracy. Now what are we to do with them? The klan tells us that the solution is to keep them in their place.

Here is a little Negro boy whose name is Booker Washington. This little boy wants an education. What shall we do with him? We may do one of two things. We may "keep him in his place"—but what place? The place of ignorance, illiteracy, poverty, unsanitary surroundings? That place breeds disease, crime, rape. As Emerson says, you fasten one end of a chain to a slave and thereby fasten the other end to your own neck. As Fichte said, "He becomes a slave who enslaves another." Now let us give this little boy God's place. Supposing we treat him as a human being made in the image of God. Supposing we give him a practical, technical education. Out from Tuskegee and Hampton and similar institutions comes a stream of educated men—useful citizens, moral leaders. Within a generation from slavery, they own over 600,000 homes, they are operating over a million farms, successfully conducting more than 50,000 business enterprises of their own, producing 400 newspapers and periodicals and turning out over 500 college graduates a year. Which is better, to keep the Negro "in his place" which menaces our civilization, or to give him God's place, man's place, humanity's place and make him an asset, not a liability, a citizen, and not a vagabond, a man, not a brute?

LYNCHING UNKNOWN ELSEWHERE

Yet what place have we given the Negro in our civilization and how have we treated him? According to our records as pointed out by ex-President Taft, between 1885 and 1908 we had some 2,200 legal executions in this country. We have had 131,000 murders and homicides during the same period. Since 1885 we have had over 4,000 cases of lynching, burning, and lawless mob violence. In less than 20 per cent of these was the "unmentionable crime" even alleged. In some respects we are leading the world in lawlessness. In the last twenty-five years the writer has not known of a single case of lynching in the countries in which he has worked across the whole continent of Asia; it is not practiced in Europe; it is unknown in South America; it would be unthinkable in the British empire. Although the whites are outnumbered six to one in South Africa and twenty to one in parts of the West Indies, yet they never have to resort to lynching and mob violence to solve their problems.

Even since the Dyer bill was introduced into congress to prevent lynching, more than fifty additional cases have occurred. For over thirty years America has averaged two lynchings a week or over one hundred a year. Governor Dorsey of Georgia pleaded with the citizens of his state to wipe out the four-fold indictment of lynching, peonage, driving out the Negro, and subjecting him to cruelty and injustice. The women of Georgia have made a noble pronouncement through their interracial committee in protesting against this blot upon the honor of America, as follows:

"We have a deep sense of appreciation for the chivalry of men who would give their lives for the purity and safety of the women of their own race, yet we find in our hearts no extenuation for crime, be it violation of womanhood, mob-violence, or the illegal taking of human life.

"We are convinced that if there is any one crime more dangerous than another, it is that crime which strikes at the root of and undermines constituted authority, breaks all laws and restraints of civilization, substitutes mob-violence and masked irresponsibility for established justice, and deprives society of its protection against barbarism.

"Therefore, we believe that no falser appeal can be made to southern manhood than that mob-violence is necessary for the protection of womanhood, or that the brutal practice of lynching and burning of human beings is an expression of chivalry. We believe that these methods are no protection to anything or anybody, but that they jeopardize every right and every security that we possess."

This action of the Georgia women has been followed by a similar pronouncement from the women of Alabama, Tennessee, etc., who have organized women's sections of the inter-racial committees.

With the organization of the klan rapidly in the southwest, let us pause to ask ourselves, in the light of the four dangers mentioned above, if this is the solution of our problems. Let us ask our friends who are members of the klan whether these evils cannot be corrected and the good citizenship which they are seeking realized without the loss of democracy, without secrecy, without the dictatorship of a minority and with no appeal to race or religious prejudice?

This article will be concluded next week.

For Preachers Only

By Richard Roberts

IN the year 1912, I ventured to write a book in which I argued that the signs and movements of the time pointed to the coming of a new age of faith. I did not foresee that the world was about to be engulfed in the tragedy of a great war, though (so easily does one become wise after the event) I now perceive how inevitably certain of the circumstances that I passed in review portended the immense tragedy that befell us. I confess that there were times during the war when I supposed that my hope of a new spiritual dawn had been a dream of ignorance and credulity. But still the hope survived, and though I am no prophet and no son of a prophet, I look with confidence to a renascence of faith, and with it, to a new order of life.

And not without reason. There was an article in the "Century Magazine" a month or two ago upon "the dearth of prophets." That was only one (though a notable one) of many discussions of the same thesis in recent months. Now when people begin to feel a dearth of prophets, the dawn is not far away. The other day, I saw that Robert Blatchford, editor of the English socialist "Clarion," fine lover of men, but hitherto an incorrigible materialist and the chief British populariser of Haeckel, had repudiated materialism and had made a great new beginning in a notable article upon the immortality of the soul. I suspect that that keen, clear, sane observer of men and things, Dr. L. P. Jacks, editor of the "Hibbert Journal," is speaking his own mind when he puts on the lips of Rumbelow in his recent "Legends of Smokeover" the view that "the world is in the eve of a spiritual revolution of the same nature as the Revival of Learning in the fifteenth century but on an immensely greater scale and on far higher ground." For myself, I should be inclined to hope that the awakening might be more akin to that of the twelfth century; but whether that or another, it may well be that after a period of materialism, and in view of the palpable bankruptcy of the traditional acceptances of western civilization, there may presently be what an Old Testament prophet calls "a famine for the hearing of the word of the Lord."

I.

But if this famine overtake him, will the preacher be ready for it? Will he have the needful provender when the hungry sheep look up to be fed? The opinion of the average layman is not re-assuring. He would, if he knew it, quote a passage of Carlyle's about preachers. Carlyle said that no functionary was more worthily boarded and lodged on the industry of Europe than the preacher; he said also that "this function of truth coming to us in a living voice" had its own abiding place in the scheme of life. But he added that the preacher had wandered terribly from the point in the days when he wrote. "This preaching one," he cries, "if he could but find the point again!" And that, I imagine, would be a fair summary of the current lay judgment on us preachers.

It does not help us much to answer (as I have heard some of us do) that we have not missed the point. The trouble, we say, is that the people are being enticed away by false gods,—false gods of materialism, sensationalism, and the rest. The world, however you explain it, is not now interested in the preacher's point, even though he have not lost it. Let it be admitted at once that there have been outward conditions which have aggravated and hindered the preacher's task. But I seriously mistrust the temper which pleads the prevailing apathy as an excuse for the preacher's failure. For indifference, materialism, sensationalism, these are our problem always; the very enemies whom we should fight and defeat. I have never felt myself able to join in movements for the closing of "movies" or any other form of public entertainment on Sundays on the ground of their deleterious effect upon the religious habits of the people, partly because I cannot share the view that legislation in the interests of religion is of any advantage to religion (it's a poor religion that can't stand on its own feet!), but chiefly because I take the position that my job is not to close the movies but to beat them at their own game. And if I do not beat them, I am failing at my own task. I have indeed lost the point somewhere if I do not present the call of the kingdom of God as the most romantic and adventurous affair in the world. When we discuss the problem of the dearth of candidates for the ministry, we discuss everything except the one central cause. If men are not attracted to the ministry today, it is simply because the ministry is not attractive. If we preachers showed the ministry to men as the great creative vocation that it is, if we persuaded men of the urgency and the apostolic splendor of our calling, the prospect neither of poverty nor of loneliness could prevent the adventurous spirit of youth from taking it by storm. Meantime, we have fallen to the grade of second-rate public functionaries.

II.

And frankly, I see no hope of a recovery until we have reconsidered our relation to our task and set its parts in a rational proportion. The average minister today is a jack-of-all-trades and master of none. It is not merely that the church has abandoned the apostolic distribution of its ministry between apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers, and expects the minister to be all these in his own person; but under the pressure of a well-meant but mistaken purpose of social helpfulness, the minister has suffered himself to become a maid-of-all-work to the community. I am now speaking of what I know, for it happened to me and it is happening now to men that I know. We spend our days in a multiplicity of excellent labors, all of them unimpeachable; at any given moment we are to be found either at a committee or at the telephone; and the business of preparing for the pulpit has to be squeezed into whatever time we can spare from these strenuous and variegated labors. And then we wonder why people do not come to church on Sunday morning. There are few things of which I am so sure as I am of this: that the recovery of the pulpit is bound up with the practice of the closed study door for four solid hours on five mornings of the week. Some other things may have to be abandoned. But what shall it profit us to be the busiest men in the community if we are falling down at the very heart and center of our appointed task?

This is not all. Quite apart from the minister's prodigality in miscellaneous good works, I am persuaded that in this day and at this particular point of time, there will have to be a recognized division of ministerial functions, at least in populous communities. I do not see how one man can cover the whole group of ministerial duty and do justice to any part of it. If the preacher is to preach as he should, I am convinced that there is very little else that he can do fruitfully. The preacher must indeed preserve his human contracts, else he will become detached from life and his preaching will be in the air. But when generous allowance has been made for this, I fail to see how or when he is to do much else beside preaching. I may be building too much upon my own experience, and other men may work more rapidly than I; but that is how I find it. I would like to add in a parenthesis that it appears to me that every congregation should have three ministers,—the preacher, the minister in charge of religious education and young people's work, and the minister in charge of administration and regular pastoral work. This, it will be said, is an impossible counsel of perfection. But if churches had good sense and vision enough to understand their opportunity, they would combine locally for purposes of worship and work; and then a thorough and probably specialized ministry would be possible.

III.

But at the moment, I am concerned about the preacher, who is today facing a more exacting situation than his father or his grandfather did. Our evangelical predecessors had their gospel more or less pat; they saw what they called "the plan of salvation" clear; and they aimed to get it into every sermon. But a great deal has happened since their day, and the synthesis which seemed to them to be eternal as the hills has long been in liquidation. We have had the advance of science, the development of the literary and historical criticism of the Bible, the awakening of the social consciousness, and much besides. The old "concerns" have faded; the questions men are asking today are questions our grandfathers never heard. And on top of this is the vast insistent questioning which the war has set afoot. Are we likely to discover the answer to these questions in our odd moments? Shall we find the consolation which some tried and perplexed soul is looking for or the ray of light that some clouded spirit is seeking, while we are racing against time on Saturday night to get ready for Sunday morning? It is not good enough at this hour —with a world in ruins round about us—to serve a hurried salad of sentimental trifles to people who have a dark sense that the bottom has dropped out of life. We have to dig up the word of God by the sweat of our brow; and we shall have to give time to it and let other things go. We have come into a new strange world and we have to preach to it in the idiom of its own thought and over against its own special need.

I am aware that there are those who will demur at this point and say something about "the everlasting gospel." The gospel is, they say, for ever simple and for ever the same. Which is both true and untrue. The gospel is, in its essence, unchanging; but it is for ever changing its form. We have a gospel which is all the time outgrowing its last year's clothes; and what use is the preacher if he does not state his gospel to his own day? That is precisely what St. Paul did; and if he were with us today, he would take pains to know the feeling and the thought of the time as it expressed itself in its literature, he would be alert to discover whatever of light that science and scholarship had to bring to the solution of the problems of faith; he would find out what the man in the street and the man in the street-car were thinking about; and upon all this in relation to his gospel and his way of preaching it he would meditate day and night. That is the price of preaching that commands a hearing, and such preaching is cheap at any price that flesh and blood can pay.

IV.

Consider this fact alone. This is the day of short sermons; and it is none the worse for that. But it makes the preacher's task the harder, for he has to say in half an hour what our grandfathers took two hours to say. It is a much more protracted and laborious business to prepare a sermon that lasts half an hour than it is to prepare one four times as long; or at least it should be. Modern literature has evolved the technique of the short story; but we have not yet evolved a satisfactory technique of the short sermon. We have had no Robertson of Brighton to show us the way to preach the short sermon as he showed his time how to preach the sermon that marked the transition between the long and the short. But one thing is clear; the sermon must be carefully written. An exceptional person here and there may be able to do without writing, but the rest of us cannot. That for two reasons, first, in order to avoid undue and befogging prolixity; and second, to secure unfailing simplicity and directness of speech. A good deal of preaching miscarries because it is in a dead language, the obsolete language of a decayed theology. A good sermon will always be theological, but it is not necessary to use theological terms in order to be theological. One should preach as nearly as possible in the common speech of decent folk; for that represents the current idiom of life. And surely that is no gospel which cannot be fitly stated in that idiom. Even a touch of slang now and then may not come amiss. For slang grows directly out of the needs of life; it is the raw material of language; and often it will capture a truth more memorably than a more formal expression. All the same, let not this be taken as an excuse for cheapness and vulgarity of speech; for that is of its father the devil.

Also, it is well to eschew rhetoric. The day of "that grand manner" is dead and gone. "Parliamentary oratory," said Mr. Augustine Birrell some years ago, "is dead,—dead without hope of resurrection. The house of commons would not listen to it. The speeches which it likes best are . . . plain lucid statements gathering up all the arguments, the right word, the clean phrases and no frills." This is becoming more and more true of the churches also. There is a feeling abroad that the matter in hand is too urgent for anything but an honest realism of speech. "The right word, the clean phrase, and no frills"—that surely is a good motto for preachers. And the synoptic gospels are there to show what power may go with that style.

So much for the manner of preaching; the graver matter of its content still remains. And here one speaks with less certainty. Since Monday, Protestant evangelicalism seems to have been stricken with a sort of pernicious anæmia; and the nobility of the Moody tradition has run to seed in the burlesque of Billy-Sundayism. The emphasis of Protestantism has been individualistic because it was a protest against the subordination of the individual to the institution; and this individualism linked to a crude eschatology has given us what Mr. Bernard Shaw calls "'salvationism," the gospel treated as a sort of fire-escape. And the logic of this ego-centric emphasis has come full circle and given us the ray of unashamed egoism of

> When the roll is called up yonder, I'll be there!

and

> That will be glory for me, for me, for ME!

There surely is no stranger irony in history than that the gospel has been made to minister to the very egoism it was meant to destroy.

From this devastating emphasis we have been to some extent saved by the growth of interest in the conception of the kingdom of God. But we are as yet far from realizing all that is implied in it. The awakening and the growth of the social consciousness have helped us to read some elements of its vast content; but these we have not yet succeeded in relating organically to our underlying individualism. We have evolved a kind of Christian social theory which hangs rather uneasily as a post-script or a foot-note to our essential Protestant orthodoxy. But unless I am very much mistaken there is coming among our reflective young people, and most conspicuously in our colleges, a new quality of Christian experience which has overstepped the dualism of personal and social, and will in consequence bring us a more adequate doctrine of the Christian salvation, which is neither individual nor social nor both together but may perhaps be called (pending the discovery of a better name) an organic salvation.

But this gospel of the whole, how shall we render it into a flaming evangelism? It seems to me that here is the special responsibility of those of us who have been brought up in a liberal school. As yet we have hardly justified our existence. We did well to achieve our liberty and to turn our apparatus of criticism upon dogma and tradition. But we have been overmuch content to be critical and to make a religion of our liberty. We have had no gospel save that of a vague large devotion to large vague abstractions, loyalty to loyalty, as the late Josiah Royce put it. We have transferred our worship from the infinite to the indefinite, as Sir Henry Jones suggests in his posthumous Gifford lectures. But liberty is not an end; it is only a condition under which we may achieve the high ends of life; and our spiritual liberty is the condition under which we may recover and restate our gospel. We are delivered from the bondage of the letter in order that we may clothe the spirit in a new and more fitting habit—a habit that will in its turn, as all habits do, grow old and threadbare, and will be discarded by our children, but is nevertheless essential to the communication of the spirit here and now. What is the word that will rise to the height of the terrific business of these critical days? Round about us everywhere are premillenarians and pentecostalists, apostles of a thousand and one "fancy religions," plying their wares with passion and assuiduity; and everywhere is chaos awaiting the word that that will transmute its wild and desperate confusion into living and fruitful harmony. Do we know that word, the word that is at once self-realization for the individual and redemption for the race, a gospel that does not merely snatch the brand from the burning but enables the soul to find itself by transfiguring the crowd of jostling and selfregarding individuals among whom it dwells into a holy family, this organic gospel which holds the secret both of the great soul and of the great society?

I venture to believe that the gospel will once more lay hold of men with power when it comes to them with its creative redeeming word purged from the banalities of a cheap and easy "salvationism," from the moral palsy of a credulous adventism, from enervating doctrines of a fated human progress (the incubus fastened on it by an undigested evolution), and from a timid bondage to outward tradition, by being centered upon a kingdom, a city, a commonwealth of God, whose threshold is repentance, whose door is faith, whose law is love, whose ground-plan is the cross; and when all this is translated into an evangelism which will offer to men, freely and royally, without money and without price, a many-colored grace for a manifold need, and will bid them go out to bind their brethren to their hearts in the unity of a life-giving fellowship with the same haste and the same eagerness as in times past it has bidden them to flee from the wrath to come. And this, which as I read it is the essential and abiding gospel of the New Testament, is the gospel for which the heart of the world is calling today.

Christianize Economics!

UNTIL certain economic dogmas are changed there is no hope of a Christian society. The world of material concern looks upon them as fundamental, unrepealable and as eternal as the law of gravitation. They are called non-ethical just as geological or physical laws are, but the net result of their operation is inhuman, unjust, and anti-Christian.

There are no elemental economic laws akin to those of physics except the instinctive fact that human beings must eat and reproduce and that these things depend upon material production, i. e., work applied to nature. All material civilization is builded upon various and infinitely multiplied combinations and refinements of these facts. The laws governing these ways and means have ever changed with the growth of civilization and they must always change to meet the requirements of social progress. It is more reasonable to agree with Rosseau that the primitive man is happiest than to argue, with a modern disciple of laissez faire, that competition is the invariable law of trade, that supply and demand infallibly govern the exchange of values and of goods, labor included, or that when each individual follows his own self interest the highest good of all is served.

The old classical economist, and after him the modern capitalistic newspaper, contended that competition was the fundamental law of trade and was always good. The Marxian socialist reacted from that and with all the capitalistic materialism grounded in his philosophy, argued that all competition was bad. The events of social progress are showing both to be partially wrong—and both partially right. There is good in competition as a device, but as a dogma it is bad, i. e., human beings are stimulated to progress from an ethical competition but the dogma of competition will wreck a democratic civilization if it is applied as an unrepealable law. The law of competition depends upon the assumption of the perfect mobility of goods and of labor and upon the exact equality and freedom of all contendng parties. It actually works out a characteristic Darwinian formula of "struggle for self," resulting in the subjugation of the weak and unfortunate by the strong and fortunate. To say that those who do survive are the ones most fit to survive is about as ethical as to argue that tigers are better civilized than horses because in an open contest tigers would survive.

Self-Interest as a Moral Law

It is a striking fact that Malthus in England and Sumner in America should both have been clergymen and yet be two ot the great scholars that gave their lives and minds to championing a type of individualism that made self-interest by necessity the ruling motive of civilization. Every line and precept in the teachings of Jesus contradict this theory and the Christian religion is not Christian when it forsakes the social precepts regarding duty, service, sacrifice and the renunciation of selfish interests. That contradiction is still uppermost in the theories of the average layman who conducts a business enterprise, and the majority of the practical leaders of labor have not thought beyond it. All too many of the clergy have accepted this theory and are content to confine their gospel to individualistic motives, the realm of whose action is narrowed to purely personal contracts.

"By this wise provision," write Malthus, "i. e., by making the passion of self-love stronger than the passion of benevolence, the more ignorant are led to pursue the general happiness, an end which they would have totally failed to attain if the moving principle of their conduct had been benevolence." By "benevolence" Malthus does not mean merely a philanthropic spirit; he means all those motives by which men put the common good above their own. As Arnold Toynbee put it, this theory is based upon the concept that "self-love is God's providence."

Therefore each has only to follow self-interest to make the world into the kingdom of God. Through a gracious providence of God we poor, ignorant mortals, by each blindly following his own selfish ends, not only derive the greatest satisfaction for ourselves but irresistibly unite to make this the best possible world. It is like saying "follow the drift of the stream and the end of the journey will be heaven." It is the Darwinian law of the jungle transformed by a metaphysical concept into a theological paradise. Of course such a theory was not the product of an inductive science but of an abstract deductive logic. No wonder the "die-hards" decry social investigation and rail about commissions of inquiry. One must expect their chaplains to condemn social service and sociology as not of the gospel. It is actual inquiry into social conditions and social processes, coupled with a sympathy for "the least of these" that overthrows the non-ethical theory whereby the strong and fortunate can keep a good conscience while profiting through the misery of the weak and unfortunate and whereby competition of even a cut-throat variety wears the mystical mantle of divine law and the finest talents of men are released for a jungle-like commercialism. The result is untold human misery in this wealthiest and latest of the Christian centuries, and we can actually count the largest numerical gains to the churches at a time when the Christian world is well-nigh ruined by war and its most modern republic shaken with inter-necine strife.

Killing Freedom with a Dogma

Adam Smith is perhaps the father of laissez faire, but he was a passionate lover of justice whose work was directed to the emancipation of labor. Freedom of exchange for goods was, in his system of thought, incidental to the freedom of labor. Just here is one of the most interesting stories in the history of the evolution of dogmas. In Smith's day both labor and exchange were hampered by arbitrary laws and the dictates of monarchs. He looked upon labor as the means of obtaining all values; work applied to nature's goods produced all wealth primarily (a good socialist theory yet). But labor was hampered by all sorts of restrictions. It could not move freely from place to place and it could not freely develop skill and talent nor enter freely into competition for wages. The great economist tried to show that all this was contrary to fundamental social and economic laws. His primary theorems were that personal liberty was necessary to the largest productivity of goods and the best condition of labor, and that self-interest would bring forth the largest human welfare. His protest, in these theories, was against the arbitrary control of labor and commerce from above. Adoption of his theories in that simple age of individual relationships, brought freedom to the individual from arbitrary restriction and was basic to the new democracy. It was almost a moral crusade and did much for the free-trade policy that has made England a mighty industrial nation as well as has brought her far on toward social democracy.

Then came the great merchant Ricardo. Without mentioning them he writes on the basis of Smith's freedom-finding theorems with a deadly, deductive logic, and coins the non-ethical theories upon which our complex industrial and commercial epoch still seeks to ride the seas, made stormy with the ferment of a social progress that is motivated by moral and human urges. Men are not friends, neighbors, social beings or brothers—they are simple economic atoms with a nexus of material interest, gold-seeking animals endued with powers to organize, invent and manage great complex enterprises but with no ethical motives above those of the jungle. Economics becomes an abstract science, not only "dry as dust" but as dusty as the tombs and as inspiring as a tome of figures. Prices depend upon the cost of production measured only by the cost of labor; wages, rent, profits have nothing to do with the prices of goods—they are the result of such prices; competition is the law of trade; self-interest is the all-controlling motive; labor is assumed to be perfectly mobile and can therefore move hither and yon to compete for wages, and it is a commodity thus to be purchased on the market as are goods; competition is free and resistless and the world of work and trade is like a sea with its currents, winds, waves, calms and storms—you need only to know the laws governing it and you can utilize its powers to the best advantage, but there is no power in man to control the sea itself. Ricardo was a captain of industry and indulged in no moral philosophizings; Malthus and others gave the system the mystical interpretation of "self-love is God's providence" and James Stuart Mill wrought it out into that utilitarianism of "enlightened self-interest" that becomes its only apologetic in these modern times.

Hang-Overs from Ricardo

There are millions today who accept the general assumptions of the old economists as law though they know not the names of a single master of that school. The assumptions that labor is a commodity and must be dealt with as such; that it is perfectly mobile and therefore "if you don't like your job and its pay you can take it or leave it"; that competition is the infallible law of trade; that supply and demand adequately controls markets; that the cost of labor determines all price, and "things cannot come down until labor comes down (to old time starvation wages even); that property right is paramount and even labor is nothing more than labor power or earning capacity, and that it will, like goods, under free competition keep wages down to the lowest level consistent with ability to live. All these and many other presumptions need an ethical revaluation, or rather they need an ethical appraisement that there may be a new and more human mortality for industry. The economists are timidly making the turn; the church needs a generation of apostles in the field of industrial relations that the principles of Christ may find lodgment there as working principles. Until the Almighty Dollar is humanized no religion of humanity will get far in this complex and materal age.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Ezra—the Epoch-maker*

THE outstanding character of this period, although there is some confusion as to just the place of Ezra and Nehemiah, is the scribe, Ezra. You have the key to his life in the tenth verse: "Ezra had set his heart to seek the law of Jehovah, and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and ordinances." Here was a strong man who "set his heart upon the law," not upon folks; if the law said that marriage with foreign women was wrong, Ezra would demand divorce and would separate the families without batting an eye. If the law said that tithing was the thing, Ezra was the man to get the last farthing. He had the legal mind; he reveled in the statutes; he hewed to the line; he compelled himself to keep the ordinances as well as others; he loved to organize classes and teach the laws; he was a lawyer right; law was his middle name; he ate law and talked about law in his sleep. He had a single-track mind and the one car on that track was law. If one of these men who say that you cannot make people good by law had talked to Ezra, he would have received a blast that would have bowled him over. "Love" was not in his vocabulary. "Law" was: He knew what was wrong with the people—they didn't know the law and, of course, they didn't keep it. Why the exile? As plain as the nose on your face—Israel broke the laws. Why was Jerusalem an ash-heap? He told them—Israel forgot the law. Ezra practiced law, taught law, enforced law, codified law. He so stamped the authority of law upon the people that they never forgot it again. They never thought so much about law before and they could not get away from it after he was gone. The rabbis walked in his steps and all the hair-splitting and rules and by-laws and codes of later days resulted from Ezra's insistence upon the law. Who was this remarkable man? He is called a scribe, a priest-scribe, a prophet. He embodies the transition from the prophet to the scribe; he crystalized prophesy; he preserved it, pickled it! Ezra was a scholar who devoted all of his large genius to the study of Israelitish law. He wrote it down; he codified it. To the list of Draco, Solon, Justinian, Blackstone, we should add Ezra. We do not seek to make light of his great work; it was colossal. We only seek to show what vast effects his work had and to note that legalism, detail, Phariseeism came as the inevitable result of his method.

*Lesson for August 20, "The Second Return from Exile." Scripture, Ezra 7:10, 8:21-23, 31-32.

Ezra secured the good-will of Artaxerxes and was permitted to return to Jerusalem and rebuild it. The dearest object of his heart was to establish a hagiocracy there, to make the law of God the civil and religious authority. The king gave him money and offered soldiers to attend him. In 458 B. C. Ezra set forth with a caravan including about 1800 males, thirty-eight of these being Levites. He carried rich presents from the Jews who remained in Babylon. He was given authority even to life and death. His delight knew no bounds. In about four months he reached Jerusalem. His enthusiasm was dashed upon his arrival; not only was there order to bring out of chaos, a city and temple to be rebuilt, but he found the people indifferent to the law of God. He soon found that many of the Jews, even princes and some priests, had married foreigners. Ezra got the law on them. Fired by his eloquence they promised to put away the foreign wives, regardless of heart entanglements, regardless of effects upon happy family life. It was not so simple a matter as it at first seemed. What was to be done in three days, took three months, and then a court had to be established to administer, not justice, but the law. Ezra sat on the bench, with his finger on the statute; not a guilty man escaped. This purified the state, but it did not add to Ezra's popularity, and Stade suggests that it may have been on this account that he did not propose his code for some time after. The people had law enough for one dose. The time came, however, when Ezra did read his law. The people caught his enthusiasm and reinstated the feast of booths. A general fast was proclaimed, strangers were eliminated and Ezra made a magnificent prayer, in which he traced all their misfortunes to their sins.

Men like Ezra are needed. The authority of the law must be maintained; we are lax about this today. We take our law lightly, particularly our sumptuary law. We need a few strong men, like this scribe, to seek, do and teach the law. Ezra was a strict, Puritanical, rigid, scholarly, honest citizen. He wasted no time on social questions, he enforced the Constitution. He exalted the "letter of the law." He impressed his people for centuries.

British Table Talk

London, July 18, 1922.

THE London county council decided last week by a large majority to allow games in its parks at certain times on Sundays. It is very doubtful how far there is any public demand for such games. Those who ought to know suspect that the agitation has been chiefly a newspaper "stunt." But of course if the majority seek for such changes, the Christian church even if it had a veto, would not use it. Nevertheless I regret the decision, not only as a believer in the day of rest and worship, but as a citizen, and even as a lover of athletics. No one would impose a "sabbath" upon a reluctant people, but it may be permitted to us to regret that there is a blind and foolish movement away from the permanent good and the real joy which the Sunday brought to us and to our fathers. And it will be the workers who will suffer most. As for the immediate effect, it is bound to be serious in the Sunday schools, particularly in senior classes. But if the churches of London are wise, they will take this change as a challenge to them. They must show not only the duty of religious worship but the beauty and joy of it. There will be nothing to prevent John Smith now from playing cricket in the afternoon and evening. Let him be led to see in the house of God something without which he cannot live—something for which he must make room in his life. He will be a richer man, and on the whole he is likely to play better cricket by leaving his bat in its bag for the day.

A New Chapter for The Challenge

A few weeks before the great war, a number of younger churchmen and others began a weekly paper called The Challenge, which after a short time came under the editorship of Dr. Temple, now the Bishop of Manchester. He held the reins till about the end of the war. The paper has never been in smooth waters, to change metaphors, but contrary to the fears of its friends, it has not sunk in the storms. Now it is to pass under the direction of a group, centered in the Rev. "Dick" Sheppard of St. Martin's-in-the-Field. ("Give me 10,000 'Dick' Sheppards," said a bishop last week, "and I will fill 10,000 churches.") At the end of September its new chapter, let the metaphor be changed again, will begin.

"Many who wish to help," its new directors say, "have little hope in organized religion. It seems to attach undue importance to secondary matters and, in practice, to bolster up a system which is quite inconsistent with the end it professes to serve. The Challenge feels the force of this criticism, but believes that between those who make it and those who value institutional religion there is a community of interest and purpose. It is confident, however, that each has an essential contribution to make. To every movement in human endeavor which attempts to put first things first and keep second things second in the scale of values, The Challenge will give its support."

The "Honors" System

A royal system is to be appointed, it seems, to investigate the methods whereby honors are granted. It is to be hoped that the work will be thoroughly and ruthlessly done. If the charges made freely are false they should be shown to be false. If not, let justice be done and the lists be cleansed of unworthy names. We must face facts in the first place. "We are now well on the way to a very serious debasement of the standards of value, political and moral, and we shall not begin to get right until we face the facts." Above all, if party funds are necessary, that is, if it is right to have parties at all, they should be open to every eye. There is no more wrong in a gift from Sir Gorgias Midas to his party if he believes in it, than in a gift from the same man to his hospital. But let it be set forth plainly and if Sir Gorgias is elevated to the peerage simultaneously with a handsome gift, let both facts be known. If that were so, would he be raised to the peerage at all? This subject suggests the satires of Mr. Hilaire Belloc. The morning paper gives a rapier-like thrust of this brilliant fighter. It is suggested that Mr. H. G. Wells should stand for Parliament, and various writers were invited to say what they thought of the suggestion: "In morale, temperament, instructions, and type of oratory, I know him to be admirably suited for the House of Commons." I imagine the friends of Mr. Wells will not use this as a commendation. It would be a great waste anyhow for such a man to go into Parliament. Why cannot brilliant and gifted men stick to their own jobs?

Methodist Assemblies

The Methodists favor July and not May for their annual assemblies. The united Methodists have elected one of their leading writers to the chair, the Rev. E. H. Capey, who has published several works, one of them a volume of responsive services for worship. I have often used it and found it admirable and very well suited to free church services. The United Methodists are almost unanimously in favor of Methodist union. The Wesleyan Methodists, I think, have been more divided, but it looks as though the results of their long deliberation move to the same end, the union of all the churches called Methodist. "The committee of the Wesleyan Methodists," so it says in its report, "agrees with the conviction of the united committee that, after careful and prolonged consideration extending over four years, during which ample opportunity has been given for mutual consultation, neither on doctrinal nor on financial grounds nor on questions of church government are there any obstacles to Methodist union which with good-will cannot be overcome." Whether the action of the committee will be endorsed by the conference remains to be seen, but it is at least within the range of practical politics to look for one British Methodist church.

The Ideal Business

At a conference recently Mr. Aaron Watson, one of our great north country leaders in commerce and politics, laid down some characteristics of an ideal business. They will be open to debate on several grounds, but here they are. They show clearly that among many business leaders there is a willingness, and indeed an eagerness to follow an ideal. What Mr. Watson meant by his "eighthly" he had not time to unfold. Perhaps he meant that a business must not be a concern to be run and subsidized by the state or other corporation, but the venture of an individual man or group of men.

(1) The ideal business will have the power of dealing with all grievances or complaints. (2) It will provide at every point for the physical and moral well-being of the employe. (3) It will insure every employe against periodical unemployment and will provide for pensions. (4) It will have some scheme for the sharing of profits among members of its staff. (5) It will have a limit to its dividends and will not pay the inactive capitalist more than a reasonable return on the investment. (6) It will be controlled by a director who is prepared to work at least as hard as the other members of his staff—recognizing all that he has and is to be a trust. (7) It will disregard the existence of Trades Boards Acts (Mr. Watson clearly means, as an opponent of low wages, that the ideal business would move in a higher realm than that of mere minimum regulations). (8) Finally, Mr. Watson said the ideal business would be founded and conducted on a strictly individualistic basis."

Wise Words on Education

"In education there are three ways of helping people. For instance, if a boy, when doing his lessons, is in trouble, we can take the sum and do it for him, and say, 'Copy that,' and he can copy it. It is the poorest way. Then there is another way, and that is to go through it with him, to show him the process, and see that he understands it. He may follow you with more or less reluctance. And then, having grasped the process, he can work it in his own mind and can get the right result. That is a better way, though not the best. I suppose the secret of all great educationists is that they can pass on to their pupils something of their own passion for knowledge. If the pupil catches something of the teacher's own passion for knowledge he will say, 'Don't show me,' because it is a better thing to find out for oneself."

A Story from Sussex

To witness a certain wedding, the Christian World tells us, came a mother with an infant a few weeks old. The babe had neither hat nor bonnet, and before the ceremony began, the clergyman sent the churchwarden to enquire whether the child was a boy or a girl. If a girl, the babe must be removed as "no woman could be allowed to be in the church with head uncovered!"

Jesuit Ethics

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The question raised in your last issue, whether the Jesuits have ever taught that "the end justifies the means," was debated in the New York Observer of May 7, 1891, by John Jay, and others. The following quotations were given from Jesuit authors:

Busenbaum's Medulla Theologiæ: "Cum finis est licitus etiam media sunt licita." "Cui licitus est finis, etiam licent media." Layman, in Theologia Moralis: "Cui concenssus est finis, concessa etiam sunt media ad finem ordinata." Wageman, Synopsis Theologiae Moralis: "Finis determiat robiten actus." Father Voit, Moral Theology, referring to the case of a prisoner who by forcibly breaking out of prison, thereby exposed his jailer to punishment: "He has done no wrong cui enim licit finis ei et media permissa sunt.'

The reader can judge whether these quotations from recognized and popular Jesuit authors, as given in The Observer, sustains the charge so often made against the Jesuits.

Straddling the Grand Canyon

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Dr. William B. Riley, chairman of the Christian Fundamentalist's Association, is touring the country, lecturing in support of the fundamentalist program. He recently gave an interview to a reporter of the Portland Oregonian, in which he is quoted as follows: "The story of the prodigal son is of the allegorical genre. It is that of a supposed case, having application to many similar instances in real life. And as such it is wholly apart from the narrative of creation and the coming of the serpent. Believe that a snake, crafty with evil, entered the garden? Why should we not believe? Science itself tends to prove the authenticity of that tale, which is sacred and very literal history—a recorded truth.

"Geologists will tell you, when they have brought their ancient finds to light, the records of remote and vanished forms of life, that serpents once had wings, that even now that of all living creatures save man where the paths of birds and serpents diverged, but it is significant they are kin to the birds. Some birds alone are capable of speech—the parrot, the crow, can be trained to articulation.

"I say that this fact, together with the admitted kinship of the two species, is significant—for it supports with scientific proof the reasonableness of our claim that serpents once had speech, as they had wings. Indeed, there was a serpent in Eden, precisely as biblical history attests. How else may we regard these stories unless from the viewpoint of strong belief? We fundamentalists maintain that their historical accuracy is not to be questioned and cannot be successfully refuted, and that to deny one is to deny all and weaken the very structure of our faith."

If the Bible is literally correct as a text book of history, the incident of Eve and the serpent in the Garden of Eden occurred not earlier than 6000-7000 B. C. (4004 B. C. according to notes accompanying the 1901 edition of the King James Version of Samuel Bagster and Sons). The fossils of the archoeopteryx, or "bird-reptile," mentioned above, are found in the deposits of the Late Mezozoic Age, which, according to geological tables, ended not later than four million years ago.

Obviously there is a vast discrepancy in time. Does our fundamentalist friend wish us to believe that this "bird-reptile," with the suave, persuasive voice and the beguiling, penetrating mind, continued to live through the 3,996,000 years, more or less, from the Mezozoic to 4000 B. C. If so, aleontologists can furnish him with no evidences for such belief. And does he further wish us to believe that the parrots, crows and magpies of today evolved from the "bird-reptile" in the course of six or eight thousand years. It would be hard to find a biologist who would support him. And yet, how else could this avion-serpent have been alive in 4000 B. C. And where today do we find the descendents of this winged snake with his knowledge of the gods and of good and evil? Have his mental powers degenerated until we can no longer distinguish him from the garter snake? Or, possibly, like the tribolites, he is one of the "lost species."

If the good Dr. Riley has decided to accept the Bible, not only as a book of spiritual revelation, but also as a text-book of science and history, he has adopted a definite stand, which bears some of the earmarks of consistency. We can admire his faith, however much we regret his determination to see only a part of the revelation of God. But when he endeavors to summon historical biology to the support of his fundamentalist ideas, he places himself in the position of a man trying to straddle the Grand Canyon of the Colorado; and he will soon find himself at the bottom of the river, the laughing-stock, probably, of his conservative colleagues, and, most certainly, of his scientific friends.

In the above-mentioned interview Dr. Riley expressed regret at the unwillingness of exponents of the evolutionary process to meet him in public debate. Men of science will probably continue to avoid his discussions; they are not given to argument and are generally willing to let the truthfulness of their findings speak for itself; usually they do not possess oratorical powers, and lack the capacity to formulate a pleasing idea from two strongly discordant points of view.

Heppner, Ore. JOHN W. HEARD.

The Report on Unity

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your editorial comment in your issue of June 29, on "Geneva, Genoa and Jerusalem," has just come under my eye, or I should have written before, asking the privilege of saying a word. I must confess ignorance as to what "the new report" is, if something later than and different from the one put forth in 1921 is meant. One wishes that you had given some extracts from it so that uninformed readers might have the opportunity of knowing just what it was that is so severely condemned. Some of us not members of the Disciples church have come to have a respect for your magazine for its breadth of view; and since we Episcopalians particularly are paying our good money for the privilege, among others, of having denunciations of our church placed before our eyes, we would appreciate it if you would also spread the facts on which your abuse is based. Had you done so in this particular case, your readers would be enabled to judge for themselves as to whether the Lambeth utterance could justly and fairly be compared with Bunyan's "Mr. Anything"; and whether it deserves a "stinging criticism" from Mr. Glover or Mr. Anybody Else.

Quite possibly you have already published this document on which you animadvert so severely and that it has not fallen under my eye; or perhaps you assume familiarty on your readers' part with it. But even so, I am taking the liberty of suggesting that inasmuch as you can not be suspected of even wishing to speak "ex cathedra," it would be well to specify just wherein that or any other document "represents outclassed scholarship and old style thinking." No one can rightly object to reasoned criticism; and possibly Mr. Glover gave such; but so far as your own remarks are concerned and so far as Mr. Glover is quoted in your column, there is no reasoned criticism; there is no statement of what it is that is criticized; and the tone as it seems to me is not Christian in spirit, or even scientific; it is distinctively contemptuous. I am not, you will observe, assuming or even arguing that the Anglican bishops were or are right; not at all. If you care to see what I think about that you will find it in an enclosed pamphlet; a paper read by myself at a joint meeting of four clubs in Atlanta, representing almost every variety of religion and ecclesiastical thought and published at their request and, incidentally, at their expense.

I will go into the merits of the question only so far as to call attention to the fact (as is done in my pamphlet) that it is a good many years since the Anglican bishops used the phrase "historic episcopate," instead of "apostolical succession," and that the purpose of this was to set forth "the episcopate as it was actually developed; leaving the question open to be decided by scholarship how it developed." I do not see how this position, right or wrong, can be justly called "out-classed scholarship," if that is what is referred to. But that by the way. My main purpose in writing is to call attention to the curious fact as witnessed not only by your own most excellent magazine but by many others, that those who most strongly object to the pretensions of the Bishop of Rome; who stand theoretically for private judgment and personal liberty in thought and conduct; and who are against the pronouncement of official anathemas are the very people who, sometimes at least, are guilty of what they condemn in the pope. Verily "extremes meet." And so far as I am concerned, I am free to say that, personally, I prefer to take my denunciation from people, who if they refuse to allow me the privilege of thinking my own thoughts, at least speak with some sense of official responsibility. With assurance of my (almost) highest esteem, I am, very truly yours,

St. Luke's Episcopal Church,
Atlanta, Ga. C. B. WILMER.

[Our editorial comment was not directed at the Episcopal church, or the Lambeth report, or any Anglican document, but at the report of a joint committee representing Anglicans and nonconformists, of the latter group Dr. J. D. Jones, Dr. Shakespeare and Dr. Garvie being conspicuous members. To characterize our remarks as "denunciation" or "abuse" of the Episcopal church is quite gratuitous.—THE EDITOR.]

To Our Subscribers

Experience proves that it is highly unsatisfactory to handle two changes of address, one immediate and the other deferred, in one order. Our subscribers on vacation will therefore please take note that, in their own interest, we will await a specific order to change their Christian Century from the vacation address to the permanent address.

Two good rules to remember:

(1) One change at a time.

(2) Give present as well as new address.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Congo Worker Honored

Mr. Emory Ross, secretary for the Congo continuation committee and the Congo mission house, is at home on furlough. He was recently honored with election to a fellowship in the Royal Geographic society in recognition of special work done in Liberia in exploration and for studies on the effect of African climate on the health of men. He is also a member of the African Society of London. En route home he looked after business affairs in Belgium and England on behalf of the organizations of which he is secretary. The mission house will develop a hotel, a transport, and a fiscal agency as the beginning of larger united effort in equatorial Africa. Buildings to cost 300,000 francs are now going up at Kinshasa and it is proposed to hold a general conference at Kampala in Uganda in 1923. The line of stations across central Africa is now an accomplished fact. From the time of Stanley to the proposed Kampala conference marks an epoch.

Ozark Assemblies Popular

The Presbyterians and the Y. M. C. A. have assembly grounds at Hollister, Mo., in the heart of the Ozarks, and the Disciples are now attempting to develop a summer gathering place. For the present they enjoy the courtesy of the Presbyterians in the use of their grounds, a beautiful spot on the White river where the great power dam creates Lake Tanecomo. The "Shepherd of the Hills" country nearby lends romantic interest. The Methodists are seeking a location also in this section and the region bids fair to become famous as a vacation and assembly ground. The Disciples assembly follows the Presbyterian, from August 11th to 23rd. The first half will be a general church and ministerial institute and the last a young people's training school.

Missionary's Widow Back in America

Mrs. A. L. Shelton, widow of the missionary who was murdered by bandits in Thibet last winter, is back in America, and on her arrival she set out at once for California, where her two daughters are in school. She was at work on translations of the New Testament when her husband was killed, and was waiting for him to go to India through the mountain passes. Her translations were left with a Calcutta printer, and will be brought out under the supervision of Mr. W. B. Alexander, secretary of the Indian mission. Her future plans have not been announced.

Episcopal Students Have an Organization

The students of the Episcopal church are organized and they hold a triennial convention, which was held in Madison this year on June 19 to 23. The St. Francis Club, an Episcopalian student club, was headquarters for the organization; certain Methodist buildings were used. Thirty-seven institutions were represented in the convention. A student was elected as president though certain church functionaries, including a bishop, hold an important place in the cabinet. The presidency went to Mr. John M. Fulton of the University of Nebraska. Each day an interesting program of recreation, including swimming and other amusements, was added to the more serious pursuits. Through this organization the Episcopal church is enabled to know about its students' resources all over the United States and to train many for active Christian work.

Live Topics at Yale Commencement

The Yale Divinity school commencement this year proved to be unusually interesting in that some difficult themes were interpreted. Professor Porter spoke on "What the Second Coming Means to Me." Dr. Bainton added a study of the various times in history when bodies of Christians prepared for the second coming. Among the outside speakers was Dr. Cornelius Woelfkin of New York. Dr. Woelfkin paid his respects to the great commoner in these words: "For a real orthodoxy I have the highest reverence, but as for Mr. Bryan's 'chatterboxy' in regard to evolution as well as to certain other matters, historical and theological, I share the university-trained man's lack of respect."

American Lutherans Widen the Fellowship

The formation of the United Lutheran church has successfully fused a number of the leading Lutheran organizations of America. There are still a considerable number outside the fold, however. Recently a meeting was held in Toledo at which were forty-six Lutherans from the United Lutheran church, forty from the joint synod of Ohio, thirty-eight from the Augustana synod, eighteen from the Norwegian United church, eight from the Iowa synod and delegates from still other bodies. The event is regarded as having more than passing importance for American Lutherans.

Moderator Will Visit Mission Stations in Alaska

Rev. Calvin C. Hayes, moderator of the Presbyterian church, will make wider journeys than most of his predecessors in supervising the work of his great denomination, for it is announced that during his summer vacation he will visit the Presbyterian mission stations in Alaska. This denomination has the distinction of reaching farther north than any other Christian body at work in Alaska, with a mission at Point Barrow which is within the Arctic circle.

Getting Ready for the General Convention

The committee that is getting ready for the general convention of the Protestant Episcopal church at Portland report that two thousand reservations have been made, and they are still coming in at the rate of fifty a day. It seems certain that in spite of the distance to Portland, this will be in every way an epoch-making convention. The women's committee has secured over a thousand private homes where delegates can be housed at a moderate rate. The conductor of the symphony orchestra who is also organist at the cathedral has a large choir trained for the opening service. The strategy of Christian union and the amendment of the prayer book are the themes that will probably occupy the major portion of the time of the deputies and bishops.

Religious Leaders in Canal Zone Defeat Vice Promoters

Recently the Union church in the Canal Zone called Rev. Harry B. Fisher, a Methodist, as minister. On his way out from New York he learned that vice promoters were preparing for the coming of the American fleet, and on his own ship were girls who were destined for the vice parlors of the canal district. The booze sellers had stocked up with enormous quantities of the stuff which is no longer a legal beverage under the American flag. The minister got busy even on ship-board, and as a result the fleet will not go to the canal for the winter target practice. The business men of the canal zone over-reached themselves in allowing immoral conditions there, and their fancy stocks are now a dead loss. The Union church, which is functioning in many ways, is supported by the mission boards of a number of American denominations.

Friendly Visitors from America to Europe and Near East

One of the most significant achievements in recent times of the Federal Council of Churches is the appointment of friendly visitors to churches in other lands each summer. Many American divines travel to Europe and the Near East at their own expense, or on denominational errands. These are given a commission by the Federal Council of Churches to speak in behalf of international good will in many Christian churches. This year the list of speakers who will interpret the American viewpoint abroad is particularly large, and contains the names of some of the most eminent religious leaders of America.

Dr. Macfarland Goes to Europe With Full Schedule

Much of the time of Dr. Macfarland, secretary of the Federal Council of Churches has been given in recent years to work in Europe. He sailed recently for Europe again and will perform a number of duties. He will personally invite the queen of Holland, the king of Belgium and the president of France to come to the United States next year to participate in the celebration of the three hundredth anniversary of the settling at

New York and other points of Walloons and Huguenots. In August, Dr. Macfarland will attend three great church conferences at Copenhagen, the meeting of the World Alliance for International Friendship, the gathering of the continental church bodies to consider the state of the churches in Europe and the meeting of the international committee of the universal conference of the Churches of Christ on Life and Work. He will also attend the celebration of the completion of the Protestant church at San Quentin.

Churches Help City's Poor to the Country

Many churches of Chicago are now engaged in the task of transporting indigent city-dwellers to the country. Moody church has a large camp at Cedar Lake, Ind. Olivet Institute, a Presbyterian enterprise, has a large summer camp on the banks of Lake Geneva. The latter not only provides for mothers and young children, but for old men as well. In its appeal for funds this organization uses the following very fetching phrases: "What will you enjoy more this summer than helping to put a bit of flesh on some pale form, a glint of light into a pair of dull eyes, a touch of color in two wan cheeks, a ray of hope in a fainting heart and a spark of cheer in a despairing soul." Chicago Presbyterians have a summer camp on the east side of Lake Michigan which secures cooperation from the majority of the Presbyterian churches of the city.

American Disciples Help Evangelical Christians of Russia

A sense of fellowship has arisen in recent years between the Disciples of Christ in America and the Evangelical Christians of Russia. Last spring the needs of the Russian Christians was so forcibly presented that Rev. John Johnson, a Russian pastor of Chicago, was appointed to solicit funds to be forwarded to Dr. Prokanoff, head of the Russian communion. In two months this tireless worker has raised in small sums, mostly in the Chicago area, $1,652.95 and continues at his task. Recent advices to Mr. Johnson tell of the burial of dead bodies in an old well, the survivors of famine being too much exhausted to bury their own dead.

Fundamentalists Try to Split Michigan Baptists

After the most difficult state convention in years in which the liberals were quite in control, the Michigan Baptists have been taking a little time to think things over. The result of these cogitations is a movement on the part of a few fundamentalists to form a new association. In the past there have been two associations in the state formed on geographical lines. There is now to be a third which includes the following congregations: South Baptist of Lansing, First Baptist of Albion, Memorial Baptist of Jackson, First Baptist of St. John's, First Baptist of Grand Ledge and First Baptist of Laingsburg. The new association adopted a creed in which the following beliefs were affirmed: the virgin birth, the trinity, the substitutionary atonement, the plenary inspiration of the scriptures, the bodily resurrection of our Lord and his immanent return. Realizing that their statement was altogether in the field of abstract dogma it was hastily decided at the close of the consideration of the creed question to add an article on "the obligations of Christian citizenship." Not all fundamentalists recognize the lack in their program of any provision for the practical application of the gospel to our age. The next meeting of the new organization will be in September.

Minister Joins Staff of School of Osteopathy

Rev. F. W. Condit who has for several years been pastor of the Disciples church at Kirksville, Mo., has resigned to become dean and director of student activities at the American School of Osteopathy at Kirksville. Mr. Condit has been teaching a class in psychology the past year, making particular application to the psychology of the sick room. Before assuming the new position he will deliver a number of lectures on a Chautauqua circuit.

Minister Attacks Robinson's Book

The way a new and popular book strikes the different members of the clerical profession is of course varied. Robinson's "The Mind in the Making" has been so popular that the publishers could not catch up with the demand for a while, but not every minister finds the book to his liking. Rev. George Craig Stewart, pastor of St. Luke's Episcopal church of Evanston, Ill., preached against the book on a recent Sunday declaring it to be "a rather frantic attempt to justify bolshevism in the realm of ethics, politics, social science and religion." Robinson advocates the scrapping of intellectual tradition and beginning all over again. Dr. Stewart does not see it that way. He says: "Because Zion City, for instance, is wrong, it does not follow that Hollywood is right. Because Czar Nicholas was wrong, it does not follow that Lenin is right. Because a thing was believed on Monday, does not prove that it is wrong the following Thursday."

Church People Shut Out of Newspapers

The protest against lawless conditions in Los Angeles, a city that has the unenviable distinction of more murders per thousand of population than Chicago or New York, brought together a meeting in Trinity Methodist church recently, where Rev. Robert Shuler addressed a congregation of three thousand people. Resolutions were passed condemning lawlessness and calling on certain public officials to enforce the laws against gambling, vice and liquor selling. A demand was made that the private life and administration of the district attorney be investigated. These resolutions were sent to the public press, but not a line appeared. As a result the church people decided to bring their resolutions to the public by another means. They printed a tract, and scattered it all over the city. The churches are strong in this city and one might expect that a united demand from the churches would produce results.

Disciples Winona Program Announced

THE program committee has finished its work for the international Disciples convention at Winona Lake, Ind., Aug. 28-Sept. 3. Monday will be taken up with board meetings and the convention proper will open Tuesday morning when the Recommendations committee and the nominating committee will hold their first sessions. The afternoon of that day will be taken up with reports, and on Tuesday evening Rev. S. E. Fisher of Champaign, Ill., will give the convention address. The program is largely made up of presentations of the special interests of the various departments of the United Society. Among the outside speakers who will address the convention is Dr. W. O. Thompson, president of Ohio State University and also president of the International Council of Religious Education, and Roy S. Hayes, federal prohibition commissioner. The closing address of the convention will be given by Dr. W. Douglas Mackenzie, president of Hartford Seminary Foundation. Last year a period of free discussion was provided on Saturday which gave opportunity for the rank and file to introduce problems of the communion. This feature has been withdrawn this year under criticism from the conservatives who objected to the airing of liberal views last year. Most of the business of the convention will be done on Saturday. The issues which will command greatest interest are associated with foreign missions. Shall the College of Missions be removed from Indianapolis? The executive committee of the United Christian Missionary Society recommends that the college shall be moved either to New York or Chicago. The board of managers prior to the convention will choose between these two cities. A bigger question relates to the practice of the churches in China in receiving into some form of membership the unimmersed native Christians. This is called open membership by the conservatives and roundly condemned. Rev. John T. Brown, an American evangelist, is coming home with a report as to the practices of the mission churches. Rev. Alexander and Mr. R. A. Doan, a former missionary secretary, recently returned from China, will no doubt speak.

Cotner College Secures a New President

An Omaha pastor, Mr. Cobbey, has been selected to succeed Rev. A. D. Harmon as president of Cotner college at Lincoln, Neb., the latter having taken the presidency of Transylvania University. Cotner is a Disciples school which ministers to the far west and which last year had an enrollment of four hundred students. Mr. Cobbey is a former student of Cotner and for the past nine years has been pastor of First Christian church of Omaha.

Conference at Union Surpasses All Records

The summer conferences of ministers at Union Seminary which has just closed has surpassed all previous records in the matter of attendance. Two hundred and thirty men came together this year. Professor Scott of Union gave a stimulating course on the Holy Spirit in the New Testament. Professor Willard L. Sperry, the newly elected dean of the Theological School of Harvard university, did fundamental work in his course on Worship. Professor Gerald B. Smith of Chicago dealt with the Social Program of Christianity in its historical and practical aspects in a very competent way. Professor Lewis B. Paton of Hartford Theological seminary gave a suggestive course on the Social Problem in Ancient Israel. The lectures of Professor Fosdick of Union on Christianity and Progress had a philosophical foundation. Professor Coe of Union treated The Reconstruction of Religious Education. He insisted that the ministry should push this work rapidly and intelligently forward. Among other activities of the week was a visit to Ellis island and to certain social institutions about the city. The enrollment was by no means confined to the alumni of Union Seminary, though the course was primarily designed to serve them.

Women Preachers Will go to Winona Lake

The International Association of Women Preachers will assemble August 15-17 at Winona Lake, Ind. The speakers on the program are ordained or licensed women ministers in Baptist, Congregational, Disciples, Methodist and other denominations. They come from New York and Washington states, and from many states in between. While the meetings are conducted by the women they are open to all visitors. Rev. M. Madeline Southard of Winfield, Kans., is president, and Rev. Marie Burr Wilcox of Nelson, Neb., is secretary.

Dr. Barton Goes East On Vacation

Dr. W. E. Barton, moderator of the national council of Congregational churches and pastor of First Congregational church of Oak Park has gone east for his vacation again this summer. As usual he will engage in literary labors, his task this summer being a new life of Abraham Lincoln with much original material in it. Last summer he was on the Pacific coast but this year he will be at Sunset Lake, Foxboro, Mass. He will fill a number of special preaching engagements in the east during the summer.

Unitarians Get Help from the Evangelicals

The second annual Unitarian Laymen's League institute for religious education is being held this year at Isles of Shoals, N. H. With a total of 261 enrolled, the registration is now closed, there being no accommodations for others. The sessions will be held July 29 to August 12. Among the instructors this summer are a number of Evangelicals. Dr. T. G. Soares will lecture as well as Dr. William Byron Forbush, head of the Knights of King Arthur. Rev. Hilary G. Richardson of New York will lecture on the old testament, while Dr. Charles R. Bowen of Meadville will speak on new testament themes.

Methodist Training of Rural Workers Nation-wide.

The rural work department of the board of home missions and church extension of the Methodist Episcopal church is carrying on this summer a great program for the town and rural pastors of the denominations. In various sections schools are being conducted. Boston University has a particularly ambitious program this summer which is offered to fifteen districts of the church in New England. Professor M. A. Dawber of Boston University is acting as dean of the summer school. Bishop Hughes will be a member of the faculty. It is worthy of special note that a number of foreign missionaries will give addresses, it being the point of view that many of the methods used on the foreign field are available here. From four to six every day the ministers will study the subject of play by participating in games.

Label Without Libel

Sometimes it's useful (as well as amusing) to try to classify your friends or compatriots, to sort and label them, and then survey the result.

You'll find that the pigeon holes your specimens fall into are more likely to reveal yourselves than your victims. Your own mind will be better displayed in selecting than your subject in being selected.

As, for instance, Mr. Chesterton, who divides humanity into fools, knaves and revolutionists. Or the prominent critic who classifies American authors broadly as either patriotic or unpatriotic. Or the man who groups his fellowmen into Americans and foreigners.

Here in The New Republic office we own to a habit of classifying our countrymen as either "New Republic sort of people" or other sort of people. That shows us up a bit, doesn't it? Particularly if you know what we mean by "a New Republic sort of a person." Here's a letter we just got from one of them—a professor in the University of Southern California:

> "It (the November 16th) is an issue to be proud of; paper, text, a prevailing attitude of fair-play along with a capable handling of particular problems, make the reading of its pages eminently satisfactory; moreover, it has the prime quality of readableness.
> "The New Republic has made a good reputation in the past few years for good sense and thoroughness in dealing with current problems; and this copy shows its qualities at the best."
> Faithfully yours,
> JAMES MAIN DIXON,
> "Professor of Comparative Literature
> and the Higher Journalism."

That's what we call a "New Republic sort of person"—naturally, because he earnestly writes himself down as one. But there's more to it than that. A "New Republic sort of person" doesn't have to like The New Republic or even agree with it. He may be like the gentleman who "always reads The New Republic with interest because he is so rarely in accord with its reasoning or spirit." In fact, our "New Republic person" doesn't even have to read The New Republic. Broadly, he is anybody who finds thinking not only necessary but actually interesting; who finds impartial discussion not an impractical ideal but a most hard-headed, practical means of getting things done; a democrat who knows that votes may be counted but opinions must be weighed.

But if he's that kind, sooner or later he'll be reading The New Republic. And here are five attractive ways for him to begin:

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

is the most inspiring and beautiful hymnal in the American church. All the best loved hymns of Christian faith are included and, in addition, the book is distinguished by three outstanding features:

Hymns of Social Service,

Hymns of Christian Unity,

Hymns of the Inner Life.

Think of being able to sing the Social Gospel as well as to preach it! The Social Gospel will never seem to be truly religious until the church begins to sing it.

EDITORIAL

A Referendum on the Prohibition Law

AN admirable service is being rendered by the Literary Digest in securing a widespread and apparently representative vote as to the desirability of maintaining the 18th amendment, usually known as the Volstead law, on the statute books. Of course this is not at present a question for public debate. Congress has passed the law, and the majority of the states have ratified it. At the same time it is clear that circumstances are not quite the same as when the law was originally passed. It was essentially a war measure, and perhaps there is a certain type of public opinion that regards the law as too drastic in a peace period. Furthermore it is claimed by some that the men who were in service at the time the law was passed, many of them overseas, had a right to be heard upon the question. No one disputes the fact that the nation which passes an amendment of this character has the right also to revise or repeal it. The question is: Does the nation wish to do either one? So far as the votes yet recorded by the Literary Digest tell the story, there appears to be only a minority that would favor the repeal of the amendment. On the other hand, the first reading of the returns is in favor of some modification of the present law in the direction of permission to manufacture and dispense wines and beers. This is a sentiment diligently promoted by certain organizations and newspapers; but a more thoughtful body of sentiment based upon medical opinion and economic inquiry vouches for the fact that the influence of wines and beer upon a nation's life is even more inimical to public health and general prosperity than the prevalence of the stronger liquors. Both are bad enough, but the testimony of men in responsible positions in Europe, especially in France where the practice of so-called moderate drinking is common, is to the effect that the sag and deterioration of mental and physical tissue resulting from the continued though modified use of alcohol in wines and beers is quite as serious, if not more harmful, than the employment of the stronger liquors whose use is necessarily restricted by their cost and potency. Indeed there are many eminent authorities fitted to give an unbiased and competent judgment who would prefer to see whiskey and its associate liquors brought back rather than wine and beer. The nation will take long and serious thought over the entire question before it ventures upon any shallow or superficial modification of a law which is already working wonders in the economic rehabilitation of large sections of the population.

God and Perspective

ONE of our most popular essayists enjoins each of us to dedicate at least a brief period of each day to thoughts of God, so that, as he adds, we may get a perspective upon our lives. Another essayist, after reviewing in exceedingly vivid and incisive descriptions, the terrible grind of the present industrial order, declares that what the age needs is God. He is himself not sure, nor does he seem much to care, whether there be one or many. The need is God, to his thinking evidently a concept, or a force, or something else, which will relieve society and the individual from the spiritual blight which the grinding industry of our time has inflicted. He craves perspective also. It is well not to overlook the fact that here lies the impulse to the new seeking after God which constitutes the swelling revival of religion. This sort of deity will disappoint certain types of theological and ecclesiastical religionists who would fain gather comfort from the promised revival. Those who are seeking God to champion certain private or official interests will doubtless find him only to see him repudiated by this rising spiritual consciousness. This impulse to find life's perspective is courageously social. It associates or identifies God with profound social forces. Any appeal to a power capable of or disposed to wield an arbitrary sway in the interests of special pleas or programs will turn away the face of this deity, and alienate his devotees. Nothing is more clear than that the religious consciousness, which our essayists and publicists are doing so much to generate and guide, will come into clash with the hopes and aspirations of a certain type of ecclesiastical officialism. The latter has lost little of its depression which has been for so long bordering on despair. The same official assemblies which record increased funds and lengthened church rolls bewail the loss of the church's grip upon the life of the times. This betokens at least a vague insight into the genius of the religious movements of today. A revival of religion is taking place, but it does not and will not satisfy religious officialism. Special ideas, special doctrines, special programs, arbitrary interests, dominate the latter. The religious consciousness now becoming acute has a social content, generates social aspirations, honors the universal as over against special interests. In short, it seeks perspective for the life of the individual and for society. The old priesthood cannot mediate this religion. The old institutions, come to their logical and essential culmination in our denominational imbroglio, cannot embody this religion. So grand and wholesome a universalizing force will require an expression which these specialized and arbitrary agencies cannot compass. The blind who have been following these blind guides are turning aside to follow light and leading which, by bringing them to the vision they seek, will only confirm the despair of the specialized interests which bewail the loss of religion. The revival leaves these latter unrefreshed, and still clamoring for what has been vouchsafed in substance and volume beyond their discernment.

Education in the Local Church

PRIMARY among the various functions of the church is that of being a school. Yet very few churches ever stop to consider how they may coordinate the educational activities in such a way as to provide a schedule for every person in the parish. Much of the preaching is unorganized and sporadic. It has no program like the course of lectures in a university class-room, but depends upon chance influences that operate upon the preacher's mind from week to week. Many Sunday school classes read hastily a scrap of scripture, spend much time in "whoop-em-up" exhortation on attendance followed by vague moralizing talk upon the scrap of scripture. It is curious that sometimes large groups of fairly intelligent men are held to such classes for considerable periods through a sense of duty to the Sunday school movement. The mid-week meeting of the churches, which could provide ideal opportunity for sober and mature study of the scriptures is still in many communities a place for pious exhortation, stale and unprofitable. Many churches feel no sense of obligation to the community to provide lectures which are informing, say in the field of internationalism or social uplift. What is needed in the parish program is correlation. Some groups have more than they can properly assimilate. Other groups are entirely neglected. There is no adequate organization of materials that would inspire growth and lead to definite results through the years. The world will never be saved by knowledge, but it can be saved by Christian education, which is another thing. The church that knows its religion is guarded against the assaults of fad religions. It holds its members amid the devouring skepticism of many communities. It is loved by its people, for out of it comes a stream of light upon the problems of life which only that light can make understandable.

Coining the Dregs of the War Mind

"JEHOVAH the god, Americanism the religion,"—so runs a slogan which a certain group have tried to make current of late, but, happily, not with much success. It is significant of many things, being a clever effort to coin for further use the dregs of the war-mind, with its rough-neck brutality which masqueraded as patriotism. No wonder it goes back to the Jehovah of the barbaric days, when a tribal deity consecrated a narrow, bigoted nationalism—like "the good old German God" of our own time. It is an affront alike to religion and intelligence, an appeal to the brutal fanaticism of the herd-mind, to bolster up things which deserve the scorn of enlightened moral judgment. The fact that such a slogan is even proposed, much less gains any currency, shows that many people, if they have passed the Book of Kings, are a long way from the New Testament. Under no pretext can Christianity have any fellowship with a spirit as sinister as it is belated, as dangerous as it is ingenious. Americanism, so far from being a religion, needs the inspiration and transfiguration of Christianity—not Jehovah, but the God and Father of Jesus Christ—to redeem it from narrowness and lead it into the service of the world. No, humanity has struck its tent and is on the march away from force toward justice, from greed to generosity, from bigotry to brotherliness and comradeship.

Increasing Danger of Armenian Extermination

ONE of the saddest situations confronting the Christian world today is the settling down of public opinion, dulled by the perpetual tragedy of Armenian spoliation and persecution. Only a short time ago it was understood that concerted action was to be taken by the governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, and the United States to investigate the actual conditions among the Armenians in the Near East, and to devise measures for their permanent protection and sustentation until the present emergencies are passed. It now appears likely that this wise and hopeful plan will be given up, and no small portion of the responsibility for such an act of international neglect appears to be the failure of the government of the United States to participate in such an international inquiry. It looks as though suspicion of any international relationship has carried very far with leading spirits in the control of national policies. The chief hope for effective action now appears to be an individual inquiry by the United States. This can only be stimulated by a great tide of public opinion, and such a tide can be set in motion only by the churches. There is no other type of organization that is concerned with great moral questions to any considerable degree. The churches have put themselves on record in the most emphatic terms regarding the Armenian problem. During the past year ringing resolutions have been passed by the Northern Baptist convention at Indianapolis, the Southern Baptist convention at Jacksonville, Fla., the general assembly of the Presbyterian church at Des Moines, Ia., the Methodist Episcopal church, South, at Hot Springs, Ark., the United Presbyterian assembly at Cambridge, Ohio, the general council of the Congregational church at Des Moines, and by several other religious bodies. Also the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America has made its position unequivocal regarding the urgent need of demonstrative action in behalf of the Armenians. One of the sections of the memorial submitted to the state department by the federal council reads as follows: "The American public has given millions of dollars to save the remnant of this shattered race, in confidence that they will be given a protected home. This remarkable response to a nation's need will be lost if these promises are not fulfilled. America cannot escape her responsibility upon the ground of non-membership in the League. Our vast relief contributions—the cause of humanity—and our own moral welfare, require more than expressions of sympathy. Action is demanded." There is no time to be lost—no religious body of importance should be assembled without using the occasion for an urgent appeal to the government to assume the responsibility which it cannot escape, of employing the forces of the most favored nation of the world in behalf of one of the weakest, most bitterly persecuted.

Christianity is Intellectually Respectable

INTELLECTUALS a generation ago were accustomed to sneer at Christianity. It was regarded as a passing phenomenon in the history of civilization. The more dogmatic among the young scientists looked upon religion as something akin to astrology and alchemy, a superstition that must pass in the light of modern thought. One by one the great leaders of today have been taking their places on the side of the church. In intellectual circles generally there has been a softening of the antagonism which ruled during the nineteenth century among educated men. The average man gets most of his ethical teaching either directly or indirectly from the church. Without the guidance of Christian interpretation his life would be held down to the lower levels. The churches have often split little communities into warring factions through sectarianism, but some of the most urgent and promising community projects wait upon the leadership of the church before they can go forward. Most of the great philanthropies come to the church not only for collections, but for endorsement. Nor can the church be over-estimated as an educational force in the community. Even the poorest preachers give some scraps of information and some guidance in living. The educated ministry is the most potent force in the average community in directing public attention to the best things in literature, art and music as well as the deep things of the spirit. Because the church really serves, and because the modernized church has a body of teaching that rings true to the age, the best minds of today are not ashamed to call themselves Christian.

The Settlement of the Transportation Strike in Chicago

ON Saturday of last week an agreement was reached between the surface lines of Chicago and the labor unions involved in the strike whereby the men returned to work on Sunday evening. The terms reached continued the present hours and working conditions, thereby securing to the men a continuance of the eight-hour day and other conditions which have long been the subject of conference and adjustment between the companies and the workmen. There is very great advantage in losing nothing of this character which has been gained in behalf of those who labor, and their home conditions. On the other hand, the men consented to a slight reduction in their compensation. This was a compromise between the companies' offer of sixty-five cents and the union's demand for a minimum of seventy-two cents. The rate agreed upon is seventy cents. The active forces in securing the compromise and the final adjustment of conditions was an aldermanic committee that labored long and earnestly, and at times with no apparent hope of success, to bring matters to a favorable issue. The only contribution made by the city hall administration was the effort to capitalize the strike by securing the introduction of bus service at a five-cent fare. The mayor and his coterie would be very glad to secure authority to dip into the funds accumulated through years for the building of a subway, and divert any portion of them to almost any other purpose whatever. Once again the sinister plans of the city hall were disclosed with this attempt. Perhaps one of the reasons why both the traction companies and the working men were willing to reach an agreement was their disinclination to prolong a strike situation which would afford Mayor Thompson and his associates, discredited by both alike, the chance to further exploit the public and postpone a final adjustment of the transportation question, which can only be settled satisfactorily by the building of a subway.

The Cylinder of Nebuchadnezzer Found

AN incident which illustrates the possibilities of important archæological discoveries has come to light in the acquisition by the Carnegie Museum of an original cylinder of King Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon, who reigned in the sixth century B. C. A group of Arabs, engaged in tearing down a ruined wall at the ancient city of Marad, a suburb of Babylon, found in an opening in a wall a cylinder buried according to ancient custom as a record of the erection of the building, much as a modern corner-stone is used to enclose important documents of record. It is a cylinder nine inches high and has a diameter of six inches at the base. It bears an inscription telling in 145 lines how King Nebuchadnezzar built the walls of Babylon and restored the temple of Birs, which scholars have thought might have been associated with the biblical story of the Tower of Babel. It was fortunate that the Arabs who came upon this valuable find had some knowledge of the importance of such discoveries and took it to a collector of antiquities at Bagdad. That was back in 1915. By the slow process of adventures which befall such finds this fragment of ancient historical record has now come into a place of permanent safety where its story can be incorporated in the historical traditions of a great ancient civilization. It is probable that many such fragments of ancient record have been found and disposed of in the usually careless manner of unskilled workers, and will either find their way slowly to the larger and more carefully guarded collections or will be destroyed without record by the negligence and mishandling that so frequently befalls material of this sort. Nothing but a constructive and thoroughgoing survey of the sites of biblical antiquity can preserve the yet buried fragments of ancient civilization from the fate of the vandalism which has befallen so much valuable material in the past.

Summer Reading

NEARLY everyone who is interested in any sort of reading beyond the current "best sellers" regards the summer season as the appointed time to read over some old favorites, or to undertake something in the order of new adventures in literature. Probably there are few who can look forward to the summer as the time for a long and leisurely relaxation in intellectual pursuits, as providing, therefore, the opportunity to peruse an accumulated list of works gradually laid aside during more strenuous hours for a period of uninterrupted enjoyment. Some of us there are who are saving up a long array of the neglected books, classic and modern, for our old age. We have never had time to follow those alluring sign posts which invited us to side excursions down fascinating paths of worthful reading. But we are going to do all that when the stressful days are a little further spent, and life grows less insistent. Perhaps that time may never come. But the hope is a pleasurable occupation of crowded hours when the demands of current literature are too imperative to permit any but the most limited time with our familiar and indispensable favorites. But at least the summer is presumed to offer a little wider margin of unmortgaged time for the books that have waved to us as they passed our library doors during the other months of the year.

The vacation period may not mean very much to some of us in the way of actual cessation of customary work. When one says that "everybody is out of town," of course we know it to be a mere figure of speech. Probably not two per cent of the population of any place, large or small, is actually away on any kind of vacation adventure at any one time. But it is a pleasurable delusion at least that most people contrive some sort of relaxation for themselves in the summer time, and that period may well be devoted in some measure to good reading. At least, if it is not, it is a fair inference that the year as a whole will show a deficit in the record of worthful literature enjoyed.

There are some books of the period that insist on finding a place in the alcove or the desk-row devoted to fairly recent titles. Probably Wells' "Outline of History" is a bit past its prime, now that two years have gone by since it was issued. But so many who have set themselves to its perusal have not yet finished with it that it is only proper to place it among the current books that everyone wants to read as soon as time permits. To be sure the specialist in any of the areas of history is not going to be satisfied with a work that contains so many errors of statement. The expert on Hebrew or Roman history finds a score of exasperating points in which he challenges the apparent omniscience of the performance. But its movement and urgency, its appreciation of the part which education has played in the progress of the race, make it an inspiration to young and old. One can forgive many errors of detail for one such sentence as this: "History is the race between education and chaos." Then of course the informed person wishes to put the issuing volumes of Thompson's "Outline of Science" by the side of Wells, for an even more ambitious work has been here attempted, and in a field where the average person is still less aware of the materials. If Van Loon's "Story of Mankind" can be given a place in this shelf of world surveys, a great pleasureland of information and interpretation has been made accessible.

Then the past year has made some valuable contributions to particular literary interests, and one wishes to have some acquaintance with a few at least of these books. Among them there should be named Dewey's "Human Nature and Conduct," which some are pronouncing the most complete of his discussions of philosophy and social science, and a stimulating survey of the field of applied psychology. On another side of the big problem of modern thinking is Robinson's "The Mind in the Making," the commendations and criticisms of which whet the appetite of any searcher after a fresh discussion of a great theme. In the religious field no volume has created more discussion than Ellwood's "Reconstruction of Religion," which prefaces an appeal for a scientific, that is a social, interpretation of Christianity with a searching review of the ruling tendencies in the modern world. Professor Conklin's "Direction of Human Evolution" is a fresh and vigorous survey of a field in which there is apparently much need of popular information.

Other books that will abundantly repay careful reading are Parks' "The Crisis of the Churches," Professor Cross' "Creative Christianity," Fitch's "Can the Church Survive in the Changing Order?" Glover's "The Nature and Purpose of a Christian Society," Simkhovitch's "Toward the Understanding of Jesus," and Von Ogden Vogt's "Art and Religion." A little older, but still recent and stimulating are "What and Where Is God?" by R. L. Swain; "The Church and Industrial Reconstruction," edited by Professor William Adams Brown; "The Spread of Christianity in the Modern World," by Professor E. C. Moore; "Christian Unity, Its Principles and Possibilities," edited by Professor Brown. Older yet, but indispensable, are Rauschenbusch's works, especially "Christianizing the Social Order," Coe's "A Social Theory of Religious Education," and Dewey's "School and Society."

But the current books are not always the most important. It is true that one who is dealing in a technical manner with a particular profession or a specified area of knowledge will be supposed to keep acquaintance with the literature of his specialty, both in books and journals. If there is still time for volumes that find a place among the "best sellers," one is fortunate, and must be discriminating if he is not to be a spendthrift of time. Something must be allowed to the striking writers of the day, like Strachey, Shaw, Galsworthy; to the great biographies, and a few novels of the first rank. But the past has its incalculable hoard of writings, for the neglect of which no amount of current reading can wholly compensate.

There are the supreme classics of the years, which a discriminating writer in a current series calls "The Best Sellers of the Ages." Here of course one prefers to make his own list. Not even so suggestive an educator as ex-president Eliot can make a five-foot shelf of books for any one but himself. There is a certain property of volumes which cannot be transferred. One person will come back to the unwasting wealth of Shakespeare for his replenishment; another will make Emerson the companion of his leisure hours, convinced that no voice through the years has proclaimed a more calm, optimistic, persuasive and inspiring interpretation of life than his. A literary friend, who was also a preacher and editor, always carried with him one of the three little volumes of Dante's immortal epic, and in a long and active life had worn out several sets of his favorite author. A well-known writer, whose output through the year runs to large proportions, says that he always manages to get through Dickens, his best-prized possession, once in five years. A literary critic of sound judgment has affirmed that while Victor Hugo is not the greatest of novelists, yet "Les Miserables" is the greatest single work of the imagination ever produced, and he would not miss its re-reading every two years at least. If a supreme position is to be given to any one writer of fiction, many would accord it to Balzac, who in the almost innumerable volumes he produced traversed well-nigh the complete circle of French life, with all its varieties of occupation and types of character. Some of his sections of the "Comedie Humaine" repay many readings.

It is strange how books come and go. Some writers like Byron, Coleridge, Carlyle, Milton, Thackeray once enjoyed a vogue that appears to have passed; and some like Tennyson, Browning, Kipling, Wordworth, Tolstoi, and Tagore are on their way. Perhaps they will come back, for it is remarkable what revivals have come to Lamb, Shelley, Poe, Bunyan, and even Cervantes. And Stevenson and Dumas will always find devoted followers. One must learn early in life to select some tried and trustworthy books as friends, back to which he can go for companionship and stimulation. In an age when such Niagaras of neurotic, erotic and tommyrotic writings are pouring out from the press, when public libraries encourage the reading of the trashy and ephemeral until one well-nigh regrets Mr. Carnegie's program of generosity, when the monthlies, weeklies and dailies furnish such a complex of interesting but perishable material, blessed is the mind that is not hurried along by the mad rush of current writings, but finds choice hours of leisure and interest for Gibbon and Macauley, for Fiske and Parkman, for Balfour's "Foundations of Belief," Fairbairn's "Place of Christ in Modern Theology," and Sabatier's "Religions of Authority, and the Religion of the Spirit."

The Hole in the Doughnut

A Parable of Safed the Sage

NOW it is my custom to go away in the Good Old Summer Time, and to rest for a little season beside a Little Lake. And the daughter of the daughter of Keturah sat there with me, and told me about the Ark and Noah, and how the dove flew all around the Lake; and that Lake is for her great enough to satisfy all the requirements of the Flood; and it is very nearly large enough for me also.

And there spake one to me saying, Wherefore shouldest thou take a Vacation? Behold, I have not had a Vacation in Twenty Years.

And I said, That is one thing that aileth thee.

And he said, Why should not a man work the year around?

And I said, When God causeth the Grass and the Trees to toil all the year around, and obliterateth the distinction between the seasons, then will it be good for men to toil alway and rest never.

And I said, I am very fond of Doughnuts.

And he said, I discover not the connection.

And I said, Once upon a time did women fry their Crullers with no Hole in the middle, and they were just Crullers. But some one with a Towering Genius discovered that if an hole were made in the middle, then might there be a cake fried with a delicious Crust all about it, and one might eat thereof on every side down to the Hole, and find it good to the last crumb.

And he said, I also like Doughnuts.

And I said, What the Hole is unto the Doughnut, so is the Vacation unto the toil of the year; and there be many men half-baked or overdone because they know it not.

And he was Speechless. For though it be not possible to establish many sound arguments upon a Vacuum, yet is there one such Unanswerable Argument, and that is the most wise Argument based upon the Hole in the Doughnut.

VERSE

Compensation

THOUGH we grow old and slow
The Children are not so.
Their world's a rose new-oped,
Gold-hearted, pearly cupped,
Golden to-day; to-morrow?
Who talked of fear and sorrow?
Their world spreads endlessly,
Golden from sea to sea.

Our days turn as a wheel
Flying, a miracle;
So fast, without surcease,
The senses ache for peace.
So short our days, so long
Theirs, between song and song,
So much to see and do
In a world of gold and blue.

That which we have foregone
Their hands take hold upon.
Finish what we let fall;
Make good, atone for all.
The little heads inherit
The crown we missed, and wear it;
The darling shoulders bear
Our gold and miniver.

Though we grow old and pass,
The lad we made, the lass,
Dance in the wind of Spring,
When flowers bloom, thrushes sing.
Gather the daffodil
By many a golden hill.
Yea, though our suns be set
Make us immortal yet.

KATHARINE TYNAN.

A Song

DAYS I go very gayly
Up the roads and down,
Glad that the wind is shaggy and wild,
Glad that the hills are brown.
A very gypsy I am, by day,
Adventuring quite in a gipsy way.

But when the dusk comes drifting
Across the tall sky's face,
When yellow lamps smile quaintly out
From every window-place,—
No gypsy at all am I, at night,
Wanting my own little house and light.

MIRIAM VEDDER.

City Comradeship

FACE on face in the city, and when will the faces end?
Face on face in the city, but never the face of a friend;
Till my heart grows sick with longing and dazed with the din of the street,
As I rush with the thronging thousands in a loneliness complete.

Shall I not know my brothers? Their toil is one with mine.
We offer the fruits of our labor on the same great city's shrine.
They are weary as I am weary; they are happy and sad with me;
And all of us laugh together when evening sets us free.

Face on face in the city, and where shall our fortunes fall?
Face on face in the city—my heart goes out to you all.
See, we labor together; is not the bond divine?
Lo! the strength of the city is built of your life and mine.

ANNA LOUISE STRONG.

Love Omnipotent

BROODING over endless night,
I set the day star springing;
Breathing on an ice-bound earth,
I set the ocean singing.

Raining on a desert land,
I watched the grasses greening;
I whispered to a drowsing dove
And sent her mateward preening.

Beaming on a barren bush,
I set the roses blowing;
I nestled in an empty heart
And set the whole world glowing.

E. D. SCHONBERGER.

The Silver Lining

ANOTHER sulky morning!
Seems as if again,
All dear sunshine scorning,
The day would go forlorning,
And then—more rain.

But see! The sun is trying
To drive the clouds away:
Sun and shadow vying,
Laughter wed to sighing—
And, lo, the radiant day!

Carrying Education Through

By Charles A. Ellwood

IT is regrettable that the problem of moral and religious education remains unsolved, not only in a practical sense, but also in the sense of theoretical agreement among experts; for it must be evident to all thoughtful minds that if modern civilization is to emerge from its present crisis a different sort of education is needed by our young people. Thoughtful men are now beginning to see that intellectual education is insufficient to meet the needs of the complex and divided world in which we live. They are beginning to see that education must reach the will and the emotional attitudes, that is to say that it must be of a moral and religious nature.

In the remarkable manifesto issued in 1921 by a group of eminent religious leaders in Great Britain, such as Dr. John Clifford, Dr. A. E. Garvie, Dr. L. P. Jacks, and Dr. W. B. Selbie, the need of such moral and religious education is clearly indicated. They say: "No lover of mankind or of progress, no student of religion, of morals, or of economics, can regard the present trend of affairs without feelings of great anxiety. Civilization itself seems to be on the wane . . . the nations are filled with distrust and antipathy for each other, the classes have rarely been so antagonistic, while the relation of individual to individual has seldom been so frankly selfish. The vast destruction of life by war and the acute suffering which the war created seem to have largely destroyed human sympathy . . . never was greater need of all those qualities which make the race human, and never did they appear to be less manifest. It is becoming increasingly evident that the world has taken the wrong turn, which if persisted in, may lead to the destruction of civilization."

SOCIAL IDEALISM MUST MEET CRISIS

Only an intelligent social idealism can meet such a crisis; and such an idealism can be diffused among the masses only through proper moral and religious education. The problem of giving moral and religious education to our youth is, then, one of the central problems of education at the present time. It is not, therefore, a problem which can be thought of as belonging exclusively to the church and the Sunday school, or to schools with religious traditions. It may be that these institutions are best fitted to promote moral and religious education of a Christian sort; but the real problem is the bigger one of how the church and the church school may lead in diffusing moral and religious education among the whole mass of our young people and thus create in them a social idealism which is adequate to meet the present crisis in our civilization.

It should be the privilege of the church and the church school to lead in such moral and religious education. It is the thesis of this paper that such moral and religious education can be secured only by combining religious instruction with a liberal and enlightening social education. As Dr. S. M. Cavert has said, "In the marriage of social science and Christianity is the one possibility of social salvation." In a sense the whole ministry of Jesus was not simply one of religious teaching, but was surely also such a liberal and enlightening social education. The church should not hesitate to undertake the same work. It should lose that spirit of caution which leads it to think overmuch about its temporal prosperity, and have the divine recklessness of its master to be willing to risk its life in order to save the world. Unless the world has such leadership from the church in a social education into Christian ideals, it must go on the rocks.

COMBINE RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL EDUCATION

The church must find some way, therefore, of combining religious education and social education. The traditional religious education of the past, which consisted in Protestant churches almost entirely in the study of the Bible, will no longer answer. It is not that the Bible has lost any of its value for our civilization, but that we need the guidance of the dry light of social science as well as of the divine ideals of the sacred scriptures. As I have elsewhere said,* "It is idle to think that anyone can become moral and religious in a rational way without the study of the great masterpieces in ethics and religion. Now, by the common consent of all the great religious thinkers of our civilization, the supreme religious masterpieces of our cultural tradition are embodied in that unique collection of literature which we term the Bible. The ethical and religious value of the Bible, especially of the gospels, for the establishment of Christian civilization cannot be doubted. Other things being equal, a people will be Christian directly in proportion to the attention which they pay to the teaching of Jesus as found in the Bible."

Yet, as Professor Coe says,† "The spirit of Jesus is so forward looking, so creative, so inexhaustible, that the Bible cannot possibly be a sufficient textbook of Christian living. To tie religious education down to it, as dogmatism desires to do, would make us like those who are ever learning, but never able to come to the truth—ever learning to love, but ever permitting the social order to defeat love." In other words, a religious education adequate to meet the needs of the present crisis in our civilization must have vital connections with real life. It must not only enthuse for the service of humanity, but must have real appreciation of the needs of men, of the conditions under which they live, and of the problems to be solved before we can help them. Religious education, in other words, must be based upon the understanding and appreciation of the spiritual needs of men—that is to say, upon the social sciences. The soul of all culture, as has often been said, is the culture of the soul; but the culture of the soul in our world will be found to depend in the last analysis upon the awakening of an efficient social imagination in men which will lead them to identify themselves with their fellowmen and to devote their lives to the work of uplifting and redeeming them. Such culture of the soul will depend then upon the practical effective union of religion and the social sciences in the work of educating the young.

*"The Reconstruction of Religion." p. 158.

†"A Social Theory of Religious Education." p. 315.

Schools with religious traditions should have a great advantage in giving our youth the sort of education which is needed at the present day. The trouble with such schools is that thus far they have failed to appreciate the importance of the social sciences for their work. They have failed to see that the culture of the soul, upon which the salvation of men depends, itself depends upon knowledge of the condition and needs of men. In this respect, to be sure, religious schools have not been more backward than the schools of the state. But they should have been much more forward, for they were peculiarly charged with the work of redeeming humanity. Unless the schools of Christian traditions themselves speedily recognize the social sciences as the peculiar vehicle for the culture of the soul, and hence the necessary foundation of an education adequate to meet the present crisis, we cannot expect that the schools of the state will accept their leadership in moral and religious education.

That the union of religion and the social sciences is the necessary basis for moral and religious education in our schools is a proposition which, if rightly understood, is not open to a reasonable doubt. For what should religious leaders in the present crisis demand of educated men and women today? In the tremendous complexities of the modern world we think that all would agree that the first need of educated men and women, if they are to serve well their world, is social intelligence. The social ignorance of the present time is apalling and is costing our world more than any other sort of ignorance. Men scarcely know even the simplest principles of successful human living together. They still believe that human society can be organized upon the basis of power and self interest. They still believe that conflict and force, rather than cooperation and love, must rule the world. It was this appalling sociological ignorance which, as much as anything, precipitated the late war. And there is no remedy for this appalling social ignorance except the study of the social sciences. It is not enough for religion to assert the supremacy of love. Science must show that it is only through love, or active good will, that men live a human life at all, a life which rises above that of the brutes.

SERIOUS MINDEDNESS

All religious leaders would also certainly demand, in the perils of the present world situation, that educated men and women show in a high degree the quality of serious mindedness. They recognize that triviality is the besetting sin, not only of the youth of our time, but of many of those in mature life. Now there is undoubtedly nothing like the study of social conditions, of world affairs, to arouse the sense of social responsibility in all of us and to free us from trivial mindednes. Just as there is no great literature or art without a high seriousness, so there can be no great living without high seriousness; and this high seriousness can come only through the study and contemplation of the serious problems of our human life, which at the present time are certainly social in their nature.

Again all religious leaders would demand of the educated men and women today, in view of the needs of the world, the quality of loyalty—loyalty to humanity, for whom Christ died; loyalty to the Christian ideal of life, with its vision of a world united as one family in bonds of faith, hope, and love; loyalty to democracy, with its vision of equality of right and opportunity for all men and of social justice and freedom. Such loyalty can be awakened in the young only through bringing them into prolonged and vital contact with the great causes which the great movements of the modern world represent—with the cause of the common man which we call "democracy," with the cause of humanity and world peace and cooperation, with the cause of social idealism, which we term "Christianity." The history and purpose of these movements and of the principles underlying them must be studied in order to evoke in the young that loyalty to the higher ideals of life which is needed to meet the present crisis. This surely means that our modern world and its needs must be made the center of attention and study. The patriotism of humanity and "the patriotism of the cross" need to be taught in our schools not less than national patriotism. Moreover, our young should learn loyalty to these great causes not merely in deeds but also in speech. Their idle words should not undermine these great causes. Such loyalty is possible only when the mind is permeated with a consciousness of one's identity with all one's fellowmen; and such consciousness can come only from prolonged study of the condition and needs of men.

AGGRESSIVENESS

Finally all religious leaders would agree that educated men and women, in order to function rightly in the modern world, need the quality of aggressiveness in social righteousness. And here they may say that the study of social conditions and needs cannot give this quality, which, we must recognize, is especially the quality needed for effective social leadership. This view is probably correct if the social sciences are not taught with a religious and humanitarian accent. For we often see educated men and women, who are socially intelligent, relatively serious minded, loyal in thought and action to high ideals, yet who are not aggressive for social righteousness. In part, this may be the fault of individual temperament; but even more probably it is the fault of the way in which they received their social education. Unless the social sciences are taught with an outlook toward service, they may fail to generate aggressive civic righteousness or to convey to the young any call for leadership in social matters. The social sciences must be taught, in other words, not only as social information, but also as social values and standards. They should be so taught as to inculcate the service ideal of life. When thus taught, they blend insensibly with moral and religious education. Schools with religious traditions have the best chance to do this, as in the state schools the anti-social dogma still survives, to a great extent, that the social sciences must be taught apart from all social value judgments and social standards.

It is the blending of religious education then, with social education, for all of our young people, to which we must look for adequate social motivation and intelligence to meet our present social situation. This is the only possible way which we can hope to create a Christian world. All other methods will be found futile. Religious leaders should recognize this speedily and act accordingly. Social studies should be put in all of our Christian schools and be made the backbone of their curricula. They should also go into our Sunday schools from the primary grades up. The Bible should no longer be taught, even in the elementary grades of the Sunday schools, with little or nothing said about the concrete social situation in our civilization. That this has been done so often in the past is probably one reason why the religion of so many church members fails to function when they come into practical contact with the labor problem, the negro problem, the divorce problem, the problem of international relations, or some other concrete social situation.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS NEED SOCIAL TEXTS

If knowledge of actual social conditions in contrast with Christian ideals is to be introduced in our Sunday school instruction, then good books on social and economic problems, written with a Christian background, must be used in our Sunday schools along with the Bible. Moreover these books should not be too shallow, too light, or else discredit will be brought upon the whole scheme of combining religious and social education. The advanced classes especially should study the more adequate textbooks in sociology, with a Christian viewpoint, in connection with the study of the Gospels. All this would surely serve to vitalize and renew interest in the work of the church and the Sunday school.

If the church will really assume such leadership in promoting moral and religious education through the study on a scientific basis of social conditions, no one can doubt that the public school system will also fall into line; for the study of Christian ideals in relation to real life will soon create a Christianized public opinion on social problems which will be overwhelming. The result would be that the backbone of the curriculum of our public schools from the kindergarten to the end of the college course would also become the social studies. The final result would be nothing less than such diffusion of social and political intelligence throughout our world that we would have no need to fear the approach of a second dark age. We should see, instead, a moral and spiritual renaissance and the gradual but sure upbuilding of a world of truth, of justice, and of love. Will the church heed the great call which the present crisis has given it, and awake to its new and greatest opportunity?

A Man and an Institution

By Lynn Harold Hough

The following article is the first of a series of impressions of various outstanding English personalities from the pen of Dr. Lynn Harold Hough, pastor of Central Methodist Episcopal church of Detroit, Mich., who is spending the summer in England, preaching in the famous Carr's Lane church, Birmingham, and in the City Temple, London.—THE EDITOR.

VIRGIL'S famous phrase "Arms and the Man" suggests an inevitable relationship. There are two sides to almost everything in human life. On the one side there is the organization. On the other is the man. On the one side is the institution. On the other is personality. And history is in fact just the tale of the way in which institutions and personalities have reacted upon each other.

The most distinguished and indeed the most authoritative organ for the expression of opinion with regard to books which exists in the English-speaking world is the Literary Supplement of the London Times. For about 21 years it has appeared every week, and long ago it secured an unassailable position in its field. All over the English-speaking world men and women who care about books wait for its arrival happy in the thought that they possess a trusted and dependable guide through the highways and byways as well as through the great avenues of the city which authors have built. Alert eyes are watching all the streets of this great city of books and the new buildings are carefully catalogued and set forth after a process of serious valuation. The Literary Supplement is the most impersonal of periodicals. Its reviews are unsigned. And the reviewer never emerges and gets in the way of the book about which he is writing. You feel that you are dealing with an institution as you turn its pages and principles of taste and standards of judgment are in your mind rather than the bright and vivid personalities of clever reviewers.

But of course there is personality back of this massive and notable achievement. And while many men have a share in its production, it is essentially the creation of one man. Ever since the first issue was published in 1902 the destinies of the paper have been under the guidance of Mr. Bruce L. Richmond. It is not too much to say that essentially the great organ of criticism is his creation. He has put the closest thought and the most devoted and disciplined enthusiasm into his work as editor. And it is his spirit which infuses the whole.

MEETING MR. RICHMOND

I first met Mr. Richmond at a little dinner at the home of that brilliant traveler about the world, Mr. J. O. P. Bland in the summer of 1919. Mr. H. Perry Robinson (since knighted as a result of his extraordinary services as a war correspondent on many fronts in the years of the great world-wide contention) was one of the guests. The talk, which moved among books and personalities and large issues was that kindling sort which one remembers with the keenest relish. The three men represented unusual sources of information and were possessed of minds disciplined in relation to dealing with issues involved in many relationships and powers of expression which found the pungent phrase and the sentence tingling with vitality. A little later Mr. Richmond carried me off to the Oxford and Cambridge club, where I had an opportunity of coming into a closer contact with the processes of his own mind and of feeling the acuteness of his perception and his unhesitating devotion to standards of taste which might seem austere amid the chaos of contemporary writing, but which made room for a rich and noble beauty restrained by stern discipline and expressed with noble self-control. I particularly remember the relish with which he told the story of the sentimental man who had been deeply moved by a poor play. He was talking it over with a man of cultivated taste who frankly flouted his enthusiasm. The man who liked the play insisted upon holding his ground and defended himself by saying: "Well, I have my feelings, sir. And that play brought tears to my eyes." The critic who was made of sterner stuff, replied in one contemptuous phrase: "Yes. And so would a dull razor."

This summer I have renewed my acquaintance with Mr. Richmond. The other day we had luncheon together and there was ample opportunity for easy and discursive talk about books and movements and about the Times Literary Supplement. With my mind full of it all I want to put down some things which seem to me important about the paper and its editor. I want to say at once that I do this entirely upon my own responsibility. I am giving a record of my impressions. I am not at all attempting to speak for Mr. Richmond.

One of the outstanding things about the Literary Supplement is just the extraordinary fashion in which it secures authoritative articles regarding every sort of book. Indeed it is a definite policy of the editor if possible to have a book reviewed by a man who knows more about the subject with which the book deals than did the author of the book himself. This policy pursued with surprising success through a period of years has done more than anything else to give the paper its position of unique authority. You feel as you begin to read one of its typical reviews that a master is speaking and as you go farther the feeling develops into positive assurance. Perhaps if the field is one which you yourself know and one in which only a few men have a right to speak with full assurance you say to yourself as you read: "That must have been written by ——, or ——, or ——. Nobody else could have done it with such absolute command of all the materials."

UNSIGNED REVIEWS

The policy of unsigned reviews is one which might be the basis of heated discussion. And no doubt there is a good deal to be said on both sides of the question. It is at least clear that it makes it possible to give young men who have ample knowledge and thoroughly developed taste an opportunity such as they could not receive where every review is signed. And a matter of greater importance is this: The paper with unsigned reviews gradually develops a personality of its own. It comes to be a sort of super person whose qualities of mind both readers and contributors understand and to which both respond. And this composite personality is a richer and more commanding influence than any individual can secure. The man who writes for the Literary Supplement without ever surrendering the free and individual movement of his mind finds himself appropriating this large and impalpable personality of the paper and so rising to a level of steady and urbane thought and writing which the spirit of the periodical enables him to attain.

Perhaps the most significant aspect of the contribution of this organ of criticism to our civilization lies in the fact that it brings a well defined and clearly apprehended set of standards to bear upon contemporary writing and that these same standards are kept potently in our minds in their relation to the masterpieces of other periods. It is not that the Times would quote the words of Charles Lamb, "whenever a new book is published read an old one." It is that the age is seen in the light of the ages and the smoke of a man's pipe is not allowed to hide the stars. On both sides of the Atlantic there are bright young fellows who are ready to assert that we need a new set of stars in an absolutely new sky. And they are ready to supply the demand with a modesty which will prevent them from making too exorbitant a charge. The Times Supplement sees all their productions without anger and even without condescension. But it has a way of taking little electric lamps out into the glory of the silent night. And no more needs to be said when you have been led to look quite steadily at the little lamps and then up at the awful mystery of the sky pierced by the far bright splendor of the deathless stars.

APPRECIATION FOR WRITING

With all its appreciation for scientific accuracy and for soundly disciplined thinking, the Times Supplement has unfailing appreciation for writing which glows with the play of the seminal phrase and rises to the musical quality of paragraphs where the sentences march like well trained soldiers. Indeed, Mr. Richmond would hold that the man who knows fully and feels rightly is just the man who will find the living phrase, the luminous sentence, the unified and harmonious paragraph. It is the man whose knowledge is incomplete or whose feeling is false or artificial who writes poorly. There is always a watch tower above the field where the contemporary writers go through their involved and complicated evolutions, and from this watch tower the Times, like the waiting, patient personality it is, urbanely surveys the passing armies of writers, waiting with brave words of cheer whenever a bit of first hand knowledge, a bit of clear, straight thinking, or a bit of vital and distinguished expression is exhibited on the field below. The world of letters in which we live is indeed a finer world for us all because of the bracing, steadying influence of this organ of an opinion whose only masters are truth and good taste, whose only purpose is to increase and spread abroad the appreciation of that which is permanently good.

I am afraid I have not said very much about Mr. Richmond. But perhaps I have said the very best thing of all about him. For the precise effect he has upon you is to arouse your interest in the work he is doing, rather than merely in the man who is doing the work. He would no doubt be the first to pay eager tribute to all the ripe scholars, all the men of ample erudition, all the men of dependable taste and distinguished powers of expression who have given of their very best to the Literary Supplement. But after you have left him your mind goes back of the paper and back of all the people who have helped to make it to the man who is so willing to lose himself in his work. And one rather wants to say more eager words of appreciation than he would at all be willing to have said. Today I was talking to a highly distinguished English scholar. He spoke with emphasis about the high and unique position of the Literary Supplement. Then he said, "Richmond has made it." We can leave it at that. In this paper an Oxford man who has made his own the best traditions and the noblest hopes of his university has found his life work. One day it will be regarded as his monument.

As you read all this you will begin to wish to turn from writing about this powerful paper to the reading of the paper itself. Very well, the last mail is in. The Times Supplement lies unopened on your table. You may take a comfortable chair. And once again you may review the books, new and old, which are appearing from the presses of the world. And as you read you may grow in knowledge and in taste and in apprehension of those permanent standards by which all writing at last must be judged.

The Ku Klux Klan

By Sherwood Eddy

II

IN Part I the writer has endeavored to describe the activities of the klan as found in Texas, Arkansas, and the states of the southwest. In this portion we shall deal chiefly with the klan as found in the south.

In the eastern states of the south such as Georgia, the birthplace and center of the movement, we found the klan disreputable, disgraceful, and almost beneath contempt. It has exploited prejudice and fomented race hatred against the Negro, the Catholic, the Jew, and the foreigner. In some communities it has protected bootleggers, marched in masks to intimidate Negroes, opposed the noble work of those Christian men and women who are attempting to bring about a better relationship between the races, taken out men to beat or tar and feather them, and has been guilty of false propaganda and the cheapest frauds.

The movement is typified by its leaders. One poses as an ex-minister, although uneducated, lacking in poise, and reported on what seems good authority to be addicted to drink; one is a financial promoter, who has evidently used this ex-minister as a tool, and who is reported to have made many hundreds of thousands of dollars out of initiation fees. The movement was negligible until exploited and promoted as a cheap money-getting scheme by this man. He was found by the police at night in the house of the woman who has since been his associate in promoting the klan. Both were lodged in prison and fined for disorderly conduct. At the time of the above occurrence this promoter of an organization for the "protection of womanhood" had a wife and a small son in the city. When this transaction was made known the klan had enough influence among the Atlanta police authorities for the page of the police journal recording it to be cut out and destroyed or concealed by "unknown parties." Fortunately a photographic copy is in existence. A third, an "Imperial Chaplain," is a Baptist minister, in whose past have been very serious and embarrassing moral lapses.

In their method of organization in a new city the first effort is to secure as members at least a few leading citizens including the ministers, and Christian workers by playing up "one hundred per cent Americanism" good citizenship, "Protestantism," etc. Next they seek to enroll the politicians, the police, and all who control the enforcement of the law. Third, later in some sections the riff raff and the rabble are admitted, or any one who can pay the $10 to the promoters. In parts of Texas and the southwest, the best element is still in control. In other places the lower element is already coming in. Then the best men begin to drop out and the organization is in the hands of the least desirable citizens of the community.

VARIED OPINIONS OF KLAN

In Texas some of the writer's Christian friends were enthusiastic about the movement. In Georgia some of his friends have been shadowed by the lowest type of spies and plots of assassination. In Atlanta one minister who dared to expose the movement openly found his life in danger. The Tennessee conference of the M. E. church, South, condemned the movement, though some of the ministers present who were members were silent with regard to it. The press has shown far more courage in speaking against the klan in the south than has the pulpit. This has been due in part to the anti-Catholic agitation of the klan organ, the "Searchlight," and its membership salesmen.

In the southwest many of the members are seeking to make the movement one for the enforcement of law and order, though the disgraceful beating and whipping of one of the leading citizens of Dallas and similar outrages are examples of what will doubtless follow even there.

The presence of the klan often affords a cloak for criminals to go out masked or in secret to accomplish their own evil designs. Its whole method of procedure lends itself to men of the criminal and lower orders. It begins to break up our American republic into cliques and secret orders. Already anti-ku klux organizations are forming. In sheer defense it will lead the Negroes, the Catholics, the Jews, foreigners and others to organize against this menace. What a pathetic tragedy of "pure Americanism" is this!

The movement is undeniably spreading in certain parts of the country. It is reported on good authority that there are about 500 members in the city of Washington where four paid organizers are at work. Here the appeal is being made largely to Protestants on the ground that it is an anti-Catholic organization. The investigations in congress were suddenly and significantly dropped directly after a speech by Congressman Upshaw of Georgia, who gave notice that if there was to be a national inquiry of the klan he would urge the passage of a resolution to investigate all other secret organizations in the United States. This would include the Knights of Columbus, and other powerful bodies. Immediately the investigation was dropped, the klan began to boast that "the administration had got hold of something hot" and began to multiply its paid organizers. In at least 25 states the klan has made some 200 public appearances in its masks during the last year. Many of these demonstrations are a cheap bid for publicity. Sometimes they parade themselves in churches or at funerals, or make a charitable donation ostentatiously. At other times with threats, intimidations, flogging, tar and feathering, or kidnapping, their action is more despicable. Now a Catholic priest is killed in Birmingham, Alabama. At Atlanta, Georgia, the effort is made to dismiss all Catholics employed as public school teachers and threatening letters are sent to the board of education. The house of the mayor of Columbus, Georgia, is dynamited. In at least nine states the klan has forced its way into politics. This activity is likely to spread. The "Great American Fraternity" heralded in the klan's official organ, the Searchlight, proposes to unite thirteen secret orders in combined hostility to the Catholic church, and at the outset to unite two millions of men who will stand together for ends that threaten to divide our now united republic. All Protestants who are true Americans should protest against such a movement.

MINISTERS ARE MEMBERS

The writer felt a sincere regret to find some of his best friends in the movement in the southwest. Unquestionably they joined with the best of motives. In one place he found all the ministers in the county were members of the klan which was under the leadership of the Episcopal clergyman.

But while in the western states some of his friends have been duped into joining the klan, in the south some of them have had their lives threatened, have been dogged with spies, or driven out of the country. Only this month one of the writer's best friends has just been driven from the state of North Carolina. The facts of the case were these. The man is one of the ablest professors in the south. His Negro servant was quite innocently going to have a little birthday party and had invited a score of her friends. The professor's wife pointed out the fact that so many could not get into the servant's little bedroom and that as the family were to be away that night, she could have her friends in the kitchen. This disturbed the local klan. False rumors were spread in the community that my friend was an atheist, that he was a socialist, and that he was a "nigger lover," giving mixed social events for members of the black and white race. He received threatening communications ordering him to leave town within a certain time. Had it not been for men who represented labor, the Jews, and the Catholics, he would have been run out of town. As it was he refused to leave until this month. His usefulness has been ended in that state by a campaign of lies conducted by the Ku Klux Klan.

The writer is forced regretfully but deliberately to say that after his trip through the south he believes the Ku Klux Klan is a dangerous and disreputable organization. Upon what grounds does he base this statement?

Note first of all the oaths which a man who joins the klan takes. In Section I—"I, in the presence of God and man, most solemnly pledge, promise, and swear unconditionally, that I will....willingly conform to all regulations, usages, and requirements....and will render at all times loyal respect and steadfast support to the imperial authority of same, and will heartily heed all official mandates, decrees, edicts, rulings, and instructions of the (Imperial Wizard)," etc. Thus obedience to this Imperial Wizard becomes compulsory. In another oath the candidate swears to remain silent about any secret of a fellow klansman, save in the case of treason, rape, and murder. Since the klan makes special efforts to get judges, county and city officials, lawyers and policemen to join its ranks, it is a grave menace to the execution of the law.

KLAN INCREASES LAWLESSNESS

That the movement is dangerous and disreputable may be gathered from the testimony of representative men who have observed its workings in various sections of the country. Judge D. A. Turner at Texarkana on February 22, 1922, directed an investigation for the lynching of the Negro Norman, dragged from the custody of the deputy sheriff. The judge declared that lawlessness in the county had increased beyond anything he had known in fifty years and denounced the klan as a menace to constituted government. Mr. Leroy Percy, ex-senator from Mississippi, writing in the Atlantic Monthly for July, 1922, states his impression of the klan as "this amazing society which, calling itself Protestant Christian, preaches an aggressive bigotry, a venomous intolerance, abhorrent alike to Luther and to Christ, and, appointing itself the watchdog of private morals, dares assume that role only in anonymity, its members masked like clowns, sheeted like servants of the inquisition." The klan is also in his opinion a "grave menace to industrial conditions" and is without compensating advantages of any kind. . . . There is no crime which is to be or has been committed by a klansman, and which is revealed to a fellow klansman, which he will not keep sacred, except rape and malicious murder. He pledges himself to be willing to be an accessory, before or after the fact, for every crime that can be committed by a klansman, and this whether he be an ordinary American citizen, whose duty it is to uphold the law, a sheriff, whose sworn duty it is to enforce it, or a judge, whose duty it is to administer it."

One may gather the character of the movement from the feeble-minded imperial wizard and his bombastic and devisive utterances. "Colonel" William J. Simmons, in choosing the notorious woman Mary Elizabeth Tyler as his assistant says in an official document, "To all Genii, Grand Dragons and Hydras of Realms, Grand Goblins and Kleagles of Domains, Grand Titans and Furies of Provinces, Giants, Exalted Cyclops and Terrors of Klantons, and to all Citizens of the Invisible Empire, Knights of the Ku Klux Klan. . . Done in the Aulic of his Majesty, Imperial Wizard, Emperor of the Invisible Empire, Knights of the Ku Klux Klan . . . on the Dreadful Day of the Weeping Week of the Mournful Month of the Year of the Klan LV. Duly signed and sealed by his Majesty. (Signed) William Joseph Simmons, Imperial Wizard." Such mummery and tom-foolery would naturally appeal to the feeble-minded, the ignorant, the moron, and the lower elements of society.

CALLS AMERICA A GARBAGE CAN

In his address at Atlanta on April 30, published in the Searchlight, arousing prejudice against foreigners and the Negro, the "Colonel" says of America, "It is a garbage can! Not a melting pot. . . . When the hordes of aliens walk to the ballot box and their votes outnumber yours, then that horde has got you by the throat. . . . Americans will awake from their slumber and rush out for battle and there will be such stir as the world has never seen the like. The soil of America will run with the blood of its people. . . . All these folks of color can take their place—they had better take it and stay in it when they get in it. . . . I am informed that every buck nigger in Atlanta who attains the age of twenty-one years has gotten the money to pay his poll tax and register, and that 6,000,000 of them are now ready to vote, and that these apes are going to line up at the polls, mixed up there with white men and white women. Lord forgive me, but that is the most sickening and disgusting sight you ever saw. you've got to change that. . . . Keep the Negro and the other fellow where he belongs. They have got no part in our political and social life."

The imperial wizard also said, "We exclude Jews because they do not believe in the Christian religion. We exclude Catholics because they owe allegiance to an institution that is foreign to the government of the United States. Any native-born American who is a member of the English church or any other foreign church is barred. To assure the supremacy of the white race we believe in the exclusion of the yellow race and the disfranchisement of the Negro. It was God's act to make the white race superior to all others. By some scheme of Providence the Negro was created as a serf. . . . We do not act until called upon, but if needed we have a great invisible and mysterious force that will strike terror into the hearts of law-breakers." The czar or Lenine might say the same.

No wonder that Major Craven, the Grand Dragon of the Invisible Empire for the Realm of North Carolina, recently issued an order disbanding the klan in that state, saying that as conducted in North Carolina "it is an organization engaged exclusively in collecting initiation fees under false pretenses, without any legal standing in the state, and is, in my opinion, a failure and a fraud." He added that "the most notorious criminal in the county got in by paying for it . . . and the organizers kept him in because he was bringing in others of the same kind at so much per head." The sturdy William Allen White of Kansas may well say that it was "to the everlasting credit of Emporia that the organizer of this cheap clan found no suckers here with $10 each to squander."

KLAN WILL "ULSTERIZE" AMERICA

We will freely admit the efforts some good men have made who are members of the klan, and some of the good things that they have done, but it is our conviction that the klan is not only dangerous and disreputable, but that in proportion as it is successful it will "Ulsterize" America; it will rend our now united community into bitter and contending factions, each victimized by a distorted propaganda, suspecting and hating the other. Well may the nation protest that in this super-organization of haters America will be left "a free country for all except Roman Catholics, Jews, Negroes, persons born in foreign countries and progressive and liberal-minded Americans. . . . E. Y. Clarke, Mrs. Bessie Tyler, and William Joseph Simmons have capitalized ignorance, hatred, and violence in the United States. . . . Ku Klux hatred has forced its way to a greater or less degree into the politics of ten or more of the states."

The official Searchlight on June 10, 1922, elated after the primary election in Oregon which seemed to have been successful, says, "What has happened in Oregon will come sooner or later in every state. . . . What will the hostile hosts think when they find themselves opposed by the 'Great American Fraternity' throughout the land? . . . Americans, get to your lodges regularly now if you never did before and keep in touch with what is going on. The crisis has arrived; we must win."

We do not deny that the klan may effectively enter politics all over the country. They may become strong and successful as the contending parties in Ireland, with hatred, false propaganda, mutual suspicion, and violence leading to final bloodshed. And all this under the specious pretext of "one hundred per cent Americanism!" Is America going to degenerate to the level of the Ku Klux Klan with its organized idiocy, its capitalized mummery, its black-hand of "white supremacy," its prostitution of "Protestantism," its travesty of "pure Americanism?"

The Light of Life

I KNOW not what shall be,
But fear dwells not with me,
For in Him,
When earth lamps are all dim,
The light of life I see—
Love
Above
All things this earth upon;
And I follow Him
Trustingly
On and on.

British Table Talk

London, July 25, 1922.

THERE are a number of conferences either in being, or about to be. The Wesleyan Methodists are still at their important business. The student movement, second conference, is assembling today at Swanwick. There is a peace congress at hand, and any number of smaller schools are announced for the study of theology, social reform, education, international churchmanship, and for many other objects. In some quarters there is a time of longing for the old quiet Augusts when the wicked ceased from troubling, and the parsons, churchwardens, and the deacons gave themselves a rest from things ecclesiastical. We have discovered the value of the summer for religious fellowship, but whether or not we shall have to learn afresh how to unclamp is another matter. But thank goodness, camp begins next week. Camp is not a conference; by "camp" in this connection is meant the free church camp for public school boys. It is thither the minds of many of us turn when August begins. Those who know what camp means from experience will need no explanation, to the others all explanations will be in vain. It is sufficient to say that a good camp is as near to the ideal society as it is likely that we shall come until we behold the city of God.

Vital Statistics

The statistics of the year 1920 have now been published by the registrar general, Mr. Vivian. It seems that 1920 was a record year for the large number of births and marriages and the small number of deaths. But amid all the points of interest in this report, nothing is more convincing than its figures for alcoholism. They speak for themselves and are as eloquent a plea as we can imagine for the policy at least of strict control. "Table LXVIII, shows that while the number of deaths in 1914 associated in certification with alcoholism was 100, the number of deaths of males in 1920 was 45, and of females 22. Compared with the year 1918, when there was the greatest control and the largest number of persons absent on war service, the percentage has almost doubled in the case of men, rising from 23 to 45; for women it has risen from 14 to 22. 'It seems impossible to avoid associating this remarkable movement with the institution of war restrictions upon the sale of alcohol, followed later by their relaxation.' It is well pointed out that next year's figures will show further increase if the association is real, though such increase will probably be lessened by the effect of industrial depression in reducing the consumption of alcohol."

The Reform of the House of Lords

No one takes very seriously the suggestions for the reform of the house of lords. That house itself does not welcome them. One of their representatives put the case very tersely. "The hereditary principle is the only sound principle on which we can found any successful institution, whether it is a monarchy, a house of lords, or a pack of foxhounds." This declaration has led the scornful to inquire whether the same principle is adopted by the speaker in the choice of a doctor, whether indeed he would choose a poet laureate on that same principle or select even a golf champion. Another speaker with a suspicion of irony asserted that the value of the house of lords lay in the fact that its members represented nobody and were free to speak the truth! The plain truth is that the promise to reform the house of lords and the promise to hang the kaiser were "rather mere words;" and nobody who saw into the realities ever took them seriously.

A Congregational Missionary

The Rev. Lionel B. Fletcher has left his church at Cardiff for a year in order to talk up evangelistic work among the Congregational churches. He will work for a campaign, which will be under the direction of a group of Congregational ministers and laymen. Mr. Angus Watson will be the chairman and with him men like Mr. Garvie, Sir Evan Spicer, Mr. Stanley Toms, Rev. A. G. Sleep (secretary), and others. It is rare to find a Congregational minister in the ranks of missioners. But Mr. Fletcher, who came to Wales from Australia, is a great evangelist, a big-hearted lover of Christ and of his brother-man, and one who has not a trace of the "professional." Congregationalists are often misunderstood in their attitude to evangelism. They hate with a positive loathing the professional, whose eagerness for numbers is only surpassed by his anxiety for financial returns. They have a suspicion of methods which can be explained without any reference to spiritual forces. But if there is a man with a pure passion for Christ in his heart wherever he comes he will find no more eager allies than the people called Congregational. Therefore it is a matter of great rejoicing that Mr. Fletcher has taken upon himself this responsible task. He will not lack helpers wherever he goes. His church at Cardiff will miss him. There have been few pastorates so blessed as his, and for my own part, I hope he will not cut himself away permanently from a pastorate.

The United Methodist Church

The numerical returns presented at the annual conference of the United Methodist church were encouraging. For several years there has been a decline in numbers but this year there is a net increase of 837 adult members and a considerable increase in the number of Sunday scholars and teachers. With humble and grateful hearts the assembly received news of the turning of the tide. One resolution submitted will be read with interest. These are the significant words: "viewing with anxiety the growing estrangement between capital and labor, and urging upon the conference and other deliberative assemblies of religion the need for calling employers and employed together in order to further cooperative effort and closer fellowship in the control of industry, in full recognition of the principles of human brotherhood." One word was questioned, the "control of industry," and by way of compromise "conduct" was substituted. But what must come in the end is precisely the thing indicated in the resolution, "control." Still, it may be well to go slowly and "conduct" is something by way of an instalment. . . The prime minister was expected at the public meeting but was detained. It is a frequent occurrence, and the prime minister is not to blame. It is rather the eager and enthusiastic promoters of the meeting who overleap probabilities in drafting their programs.

Toc H.

The current number of The Challenge is devoted to the cause of Toc H. This is a great venture, begun among ex-service men and intended to perpetuate the good fellowship, learned at Talbot House in Poperinghe, Belgium. It has fine service to render as will be seen from this brief statement of its ideals.

"Briefly, Toc H. is aiming at two things. One, at the Christian alternative to class war, in the eradication of snobbery on the one side, and embitterment on the other, from the minds of the younger generation. Secondly, at the supply of social workers drawn from the widest area, irrespective of class or denomination. It is an attempt at the foundation of a society recruited not merely from ex-service men, but from succeeding generations as well, to carry on the spirit of service. Already there are many signs that the ideals of Toc H. have a message not merely for England but for the empire, and both in the United States and Canada they have found an eager response." Its founders declare that organized religion has only itself to thank if by a steady neglect from the age of 16 or so upwards "it produces between the ages of 20 and 30 a great number who look upon its claims as a bygone relic of childhood, rather than as a living challenge to their manhood."

The Challenge

"We suppose that there are few if any among those who are sensitive to the world's sorrow and responsive to the call to share in it, who do not experience the temptation to flee away from it, and forget, and retire to a sphere aloof and undistracted. To see the shattering of the world and remain unawed and undismayed by its ruin was the ideal of the ancient poet, and is often the aspiration of the natural man But fear can be cast out by pride, even as it can by sympathy; and at present, quite apart from the indifferent and the superficial, there are far too many who take refuge in detachment and coldness and spiritual suicide. Yet such a time offers a supreme opportunity to the Christian. Suffering is alone redemptive, is alone fruitful. The church has lived for centuries upon the suffering of her martyrs and saints of old time. Centuries ago her prophets were stoned, and ever since she has been sedulous in building splendid tombs in their honor. Now she is called to renew her one real task—the filling up of what is lacking in the sufferings of Christ. Will she shirk her cross?" —From the Challenge.

Is Youth Silent.

To many a man rich in years but young in spirit who has pinned his hopes on the rising generation and who, through many years, has been watching the great panorama of life spread before him; who has seen the rise and fall of empires and kings and peoples; who has witnessed the great and costly experiments of men called wise, but who were foolish; who with mature mind tried experience and ripe judgment, sees the opportunities of today fade into the regrets of tomorrow—youth must seem very blind, very stupid, very indifferent.

But youth is not blind, not stupid, not indifferent. It is inarticulate. It is penniless. It is absorbed.

Presbyterian Consolidation

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have read the editorial in The Christian Century of June 8 entitled "Presbyterian Consolidation and Disciples Unification," and find in it a number of what I regard as grave inaccuracies, and I feel that I should, with your courtesy, point out to you certain of these inaccuracies.

First, the writer does not clearly understand the Presbyterian form of government either in its spirit or in its letter. He does not understand the spirit of the Presbyterian form of government or he would not have compared the stated clerk with a Methodist bishop. The Methodist bishop is the product of an autocracy and the stated clerk is the product of a republic. Their duties are controlled by entirely different standards and ideals of church polity. The writer does not understand the letter of Presbyterian church law or he would never have spoken of "the office of the stated clerk." There is an officer in the Presbyterian system called the stated clerk, but there is no "office of the stated clerk." The office to which reference is undoubtedly made is the office of the general assembly, of which the stated clerk is the executive head. The distinction just referred to is of prime importance.

The office of the general assembly is not on a parity with the boards of the church present or future. The office of the general assembly is the center of the life of the Presbyterian church. All general assembly orders are issued from it; all boards and agencies are subject to it; all ecclesiastical roads lead to and from it. All this is because the general assembly is the highest court of the church, and the boards and agencies and committees and commissions are but instruments of the assembly.

Furthermore the writer of the editorial has not understood the plan adopted at our last assembly for consolidation. The plan proposed does not continue the old fashioned distinction between home and foreign missions. It proposes a board of foreign missions and a board of national missions and the division of work between the two is clear cut and logical. In the proposed consolidation the temperance and moral welfare cause is far from being belittled. It is given a better oportunity than ever before to exert influence. It is no longer set off by itself. Instead it is now linked closely with the whole educational system of the church, which will open to its secretaries many doors now partially or entirely closed to them. So far as a denomination is concerned temperance and moral welfare are essentially educational causes; they are certainly not law enforcement agencies.

With reference to church unity, the present plans of our church are wholly misstated. The committee on church cooperation and union, hitherto a special committee, has been made a department of the office of the general assembly, but it is not to be under the direction of the stated clerk, as are all the other departments of the office. He is to be one member of a committee of fifteen, and if he has his way, he will not be an officer of this committee, but will be a most interested and active member. Manifestly it would be absurd for any one man to endeavor to represent a denomination in matters of church cooperation and union. The plan of having a reasonably large group of specially interested individuals to handle interdenominational matters is clearly the wisest plan and was most earnestly advocated by the stated clerk before the committee which had consolidation under consideration.

I trust that you will not misunderstand my spirit when I call attention to one or two statements in the editorial which relate to things as they are in our church. You say "A right attitude towards religious education in the Sunday schools seems to be forming among Presbyterians." Having been a pastor for over quarter of a century and having been so closely identified with religious education problems, as to have been at one time urged to accept the secretaryship of our Sabbath-school board, I am justified in expressing my surprise at such a comment as this upon our Sabbath-school system.

Presbyterians were, to my personal knowledge, among the most influential leaders in the reorganization of our Sabbath-schools along graded lines. We have today and have had for some years a Sabbath-school board second to none among the denominations, and it is news to me that Presbyterian Sabbath-schools were ever "viewed simply as good grounds on which to raise a substantial crop of missionary offerings." It is also most surprising to read the references in the editorial to Dr. Stelzle and Dr. McAfee. The so-called home board with which these brethren were connected is under most aggressive leadership today and the successors in office to these brethren are certainly just as able and as outspoken as any denominational leaders in social service lines. That our leaders have "fallen into significant silence on the great industrial issues in recent times" with Dr. John McDowell going up and down the church speaking everywhere in no uncertain tones, will be astonishing news to Presbyterians.

At the close of the editorial the writer in referring to consolidation states, "No one claims that it spells democracy." This statement is true. The Presbyterian church has never claimed to be a democracy. The Presbyterian church is a republic. It is a government of the many by their duly elected representatives. This is very different from a democracy. Consolidation as adopted by the last general assembly, means more representative government. The plans in mind will bring the boards more closely under the control of the general assembly and the general assembly is a body composed of the duly elected representatives of the church. The plans under way should, dominated as they will be by the spirit of the Presbyterian form of government, lessen the autocracy in the church or the government of the many by the few, and lessen also the democracy, which is the government of the many by the many.

President Masaryk's Religion

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Let me correct your statements regarding President Masaryk of Czecho-Slovakia. You say that he was born a member of a small evangelical sect, but I know that he was born a Roman Catholic. When he was about twenty-four years old he became a member of the Reform church of Bohemia of which he is still a member, though not an active one. I read many of his writings and cannot agree with your statement that his religious views are quite definite. Dr. Masaryk was always a fearless man and as such must be honored by every honest man. He feels the need of religion and abhors infidelity and atheism and especially religious indifferentism.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

A Study of Prayer*

PAINED by the bad reports that came from Jerusalem Nehemiah, cup-bearer to the king, broods, weeps and prays. Thus his intense desires are focused and a strong impression is gained that God is on his side. Harmony comes into his own life and a measure of success crowns his efforts at rebuilding his native city. There is not much use seeking the science or philosophy of prayer; we know that we pray. We cry out, as children, to a Higher Power. Coe tells us that it is no longer correct to say that men are instinctively religious. If we follow him we shall have to give up that beautiful saying of Sabatier to the effect that man is incurably religious. Coe, in his "Pyschology of Religion," says: "(1) There is no evidence that a religious intuition ever occurs. (2) There is no religious instinct. (3) There is no adequate evidence that all individuals experience the particular longing, restlessness, or discontent that has just been mentioned. On the contrary, men can be absorbed by almost any interest, from love to business, and from research to golf. (4) No specific attitude toward the divine or the human can be attributed to all individuals. Attitudes grow; they are not given ready-made." If all this be true then religious education has the greater field. We are told that acquired traits cannot be passed on by heredity, i. e., a boy will not be a musician because his father was. Goodness is not born in one so much as made contagious in the atmosphere of home and church and society. All the more need then for the contagion of character—it is caught, not taught.

We were taught to pray in our homes. We heard the grace at the table and the long prayers at church. Later we learned what ejaculatory prayer was. If religion is the attempt to live completely, then prayer is the focusing of our desires and the expression to the Deity of those longings. The heathen use repetition as "Allah, Allah, Allah," or they pin the prayer to a prayer-wheel and pay the priest to revolve it. Even Christians attach much to a formula as putting the "Amen" invariably at the end. Dr. Abernathy was criticized, in some quarters, for omitting the formula "Through Christ our Lord" in certain prayers made before legislators in Washington, until Secretary Hughes came forward with the very sane statement that the thing which made a prayer Christian was the spirit in which it was uttered or the quality of the thing that was requested. It has always been easier to talk to God than to be sure of what he says to us. For this reason men have attached importance to dreams, auguries or even to opening the bible at random and placing the finger upon the sacred word. God speaks to us through our sacred book, through nature, and, the mystic would say, "Directly." Most of us are more or less mystical and yet we realize the dangers of direct revelation. On the one hand we feel the danger of thinking we receive an impression which may be wrong, and on the other hand, we feel what a dull, hard world this would be if a Living God did not communicate with his living children except by letters two thousand years old. Catholics find help in the crucifix and the stations of the cross in fixing attention upon holy things. Broadly you may say that there are two kinds of prayers: (1) Interior, (2) Ritualistic. In the former you brood, meditate, long, contemplate holy things and in the latter you use fixed forms, times and methods. There are values in external forms; the quiet spot, the closed eyes, the posture of kneeling, the raised hands. Tom Brown first thought that he could say his prayers as well in bed and presently he stopped praying altogether until the brave, new boy arrived. Prayer demands the fixing of attention both upon what you desire and upon the Deity whose favor you hope for. One of the greatest values of prayer is the sense of companionship with the Deity that results. A sense of repose, victory and adjustment to the Deity comes to pass. Dr. Fosdick defines prayer as "dominant desire." What we say does not matter so much as what we desire above everything else. If we live for money—that is our prayer. It is as if we were constantly saying, "God, make me rich." Ask and ye shall receive. In a sense it is terrible—we shall get what we want! Your Master-motive is your supreme prayer. Do you live for ease, wealth, power, pleasure, reputation, service, uplift, Christ? There was a man who said: "For me to live is CHRIST, to die is gain." His prayer was that the rule of Christ might come. If it be true that we are not instinctively, incurably religious, then home, Sunday-school and church should create the atmosphere in which religion must be caught.

To Our Subscribers

Experience proves that it is highly unsatisfactory to handle two changes of address, one immediate and the other deferred, in one order. Our subscribers on vacation will therefore please take note that, in their own interest, we will await a specific order to change their Christian Century from the vacation address to the permanent address.

Two good rules to remember:

(1) One change at a time.

(2) Give present as well as new address.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Milk for Starving Russian Children

In anticipation of the continued suffering and under-nourishment confronting the small children of the famine-stricken areas of Russia, a "Million Cans of Milk" campaign has been inaugurated by the American Committee for Relief of Russian Children, which has recently extended its activity to the middle west and is enlisting the cooperation of the churches in its work of sending milk into Russia this summer. A letter has been addressed to ministers by Bishop Francis J. McConnell of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Dean Paul Nixon of Bowdoin College, and Rev. John Haynes Holmes of the Community church, New York City, asking that churches put this appeal in their calendars for early action. The American committee is raising funds for the feeding of children exclusively, and it asks the assistance of all men and women of humanitarian spirit in contributing for the four million children in the famine areas whatever they can in the way of condensed milk, money and personal service in connection with this campaign. The committee, of which Miss Ruth R. Pearson, 5706 Stony Island Avenue, Chicago, is the secretary for Illinois, wishes it understood that contributions solicited by Mr. J. Forrest Marston are unauthorized. They should be sent directly to the secretary, Miss Pearson.

Will H. Hayes Will Cooperate with Church Leaders

Recently the commission on the church and social service of the Federal Council of Churches has completed a very extended survey of the moving picture business. This has been the particular task of Dean Lathrop of the commission. The report came to the eyes of Mr. Will H. Hayes, supervisor of the whole industry, who finds himself very appreciative of the study that has been made of the business, and thinks that the churches ought to know more about the industry, and the industry should know more about the churches. Among other things he said: "The churches and the motion picture producers and distributors should join in constructive efforts to establish and maintain the best moral and artistic standards in the industry."

World Secretary Will Prepare for World Convention

W. G. Landis has already entered upon his duties as secretary of the World Sunday School Convention. He was formerly secretary of the Pennsylvania Sunday School association. One of his first duties will be the preparation for the next World Sunday School convention which will be held in Glasgow in 1924. The American headquarters of the organization are in New York.

Federal Council will be Represented in Russia.

The Federal Council of Churches has been raising money for Russian relief during the past year and administering it through the American Relief Administration, known familiarly as "Hoover's organization," but henceforth there will be a representative in Russia to assist in the administration of funds, and to report back directly to the churches. Dr. John S. Zelie, pastor of First Presbyterian church, of Troy, N. Y., has been chosen for this post. He is a graduate of Williams college and Yale Divinity school. During the war he served as chaplain of the twenty-eighth division, and he has already achieved some distinction as a magazine writer. The task of the churches in Russia has not ended.

The Year Book of the Churches

The publication by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America of a new volume of their year book is a welcome addition to the working equipment of almost every minister, secretary and others interested in having up-to-date information regarding the various Christian bodies. The contents include a directory of religious bodies in America, with something of their history, doctrine and polity; a directory of interchurch, national and international organizations of every sort; a directory of the various activities of the Federal Council of Churches with its affiliated, cooperative and consultative bodies; a directory of the chaplains in the army and navy, and a large body of religious statistics and information dealing with matters of numbers of communicants, and funds raised for various purposes. It also includes a statement regarding the work of home and foreign missions under the auspices of the various American denominations. According to the revised statistics of the leading Protestant groups their numbers are as follows: Methodists 7,918,557; Baptists, 7,835,250; Lutherans, 2,466,645; Presbyterians, 2,384,683; Disciples, 1,210,023; Protestant Episcopalians, 1,104,029; Congregationalists, 819,225. The book is published in two forms—in paper covers it sells for $1.00, and in cloth for $1.50 postpaid. It can be ordered from the office of the Federal Council of Churches, 19 S. LaSalle Street, Chicago, or from the New York or Washington offices.

Mormon Missionaries on Chicago Streets

Mormon propaganda is becoming active again in many cities of the nation and several youths are now in Chicago on a mission. As it is now generally known, every Mormon is expected some time in his life to go on a mission at his own expense. The Chicago missionaries have memorized their speeches, being too young and untrained to master ex tempore street speaking. They disseminate Mormon literature at the close of the address which they make. However no large number of converts have been made, though Mormonism has attacked Chicago many times in the past few decades.

Lutheran Worker in Germany Stricken

As soon as the world war came to an end, the Lutherans of America united to send to the war lands Dr. J. A. Morehead as their representative. Supported by liberal contributions from the homeland he has been able to relieve both churches and individuals. The problem of administration in Germany has been a very heavy one, however, and recently the minister-philanthropist was sent to Baden for a six weeks' rest. While there he received medical treatment. No particulars are given as to the nature of his ailments, but it is hoped that he may make a good recovery.

Cranmer and Not Luther in the List of the Great

In the erection of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine statutes of those who have aided human uplift most in a given century are being placed. The secular press has already noted the inclusion in the list of Lincoln and Shakespeare. This is regarded as evidence of great liberality for Lincoln was an unbaptized person who never united with any church. But the Lutheran finds in "the list of saints" a very striking omission. In the century which produced Calvin, Knox, and Luther, Cranmer is chosen for the place of honor in the cathedral. He added in the divorce of Henry VIII, and recanted six times under Bloody Mary, but finally died professing the Protestant faith. He is given credit in connection with the formulation of the articles of religion and the service book of his church.

Famous Preacher Declines Call to London Church

When Dr. Sidney M. Berry surprised the whole civilized world by declining a call to Carr's Lane church of Birmingham to succeed Dr. Jowett recently, the announcement of his decision to remain in Birmingham was received by the congregation with applause, a very unusual occurrence in a British audience. In this connection Dr. Berry said: "I have felt the greatness of the opportunity which the pulpit of Westminster offers, and I have been greatly attracted by the prospect of cooperation with Dr. Jowett for a certain number of Sundays in the year. It has, however, been brought home to me in unmistakable ways that for the present, at all events, my work lies in Birmingham. I have tried to eliminate as far as possible all personal considerations, and to seek by thought and prayer to discover the Highest's will. It has been under a sense of that guidance that I have been led to my decision."

Minister Does Automatic Writing

In Lawrence, Mass., is a Unitarian minister who does automatic writing. He has gone to spiritualistic meetings, and thinks he can reproduce the work of the mediums. However, he denies the spiritual hypothesis as the explanation of the phenomena. He says: "The subconscious mind is the repository for all that a person has ever seen, heard, thought or read. Spiritualism is the tapping of this subconscious mind. I know enough of the remarkable effects of accidental and unconscious exposure to refuse to be convinced by evidence so far offered. Even if human bodies should prove to possess radio-active properties, it does not necessarily involve spirits." A number of other ministers of the Unitarian faith take a more favorable view of the claim of spiritualistic mediums.

Pulpit and Pew Talk Back at Each Other

On a recent Sunday Rev. A. N. Wolf, pastor of South Broadway church of Denver, preached a sermon on "If I were a Layman." In this address he brought the shortcomings of the average churchmember to their attention. The worm will turn once in a while so an elder of the church asked for opportunity to respond and on the following Sunday he spoke on "If I Were a Minister."

Campbell Institute Holds Summer Meeting

The Campbell Institute is a fellowship of Disciples, ministers, teachers and business men. Founded twenty-five years ago by a group of young men, mostly from Yale, the organization has maintained an unbroken life ever since, holding each year a summer meeting. At present the membership is the largest of any period in its history. At the annual meeting in Chicago July 26-28 addresses were given by many leading members. Prof. Robert E. Park essayed a study in social psychology by the use of autobiography. The humor of the Greek and Roman Classics was set forth by Prof. R. C. Flickinger. Rev. Burris Jenkins set forth a biographical sketch of Alexander Proctor, the patriarch of theological liberals in this communion. Prof. M. R. Gabbert spoke on "Democracy and the Prophets." The officers of the organization during the past year were Rev. Henry Pearce Atkins, president; Dr. E. S. Ames, secretary, and Dr. W. E. Garrison, editor of The Scroll.

Lutherans in Canada Will Get Together

Encouraged by the success of Lutheren reunion in America, the several varieties of Lutherans in Canada are now talking union with a strong prospect of success. This will prevent competition between Lutheran churches in many of the local fields. Immigration has brought all the diversity to Canadian Lutheranism which is to be found in the United States. One of the very first enterprises for the united church would be the proper correlation of educational work so that the colleges would get their proper support.

Chattanooga the Scene of Active Religious Work

Some of the southern cities are very active in their religious life. The city of Chattanooga during the past six months has had almost a continuous succession of special religious meetings. Early in the year thirty churches went together for revival services under the leadership of Rev. John Brown at an expense of $18,000. This enterprise was immediately followed by revival services in each of the cooperating churches. After this was finished, the fundamentalists carried on a series of meetings, three sessions a day, in which they put forth their views to large audiences. The conservative note is struck in most of these churches, but they are diligent in all good works.

French Protestants Are Vigorous Group

The war has brought a fresh interest in the welfare of French Protestantism. The St. Bartholomew's massacre did not completely eliminate the Protestants from France, though there have never been so many since. There are now a million Protestants in a population of twenty-five million people. Like the American churches, these are divided into the various kinds of denominations, though it can scarcely be said that denominational feeling runs as high in France as it does in the United States. The denominations on the field include two branches of the Reformed church, Lutherans, Free Church, and Evangelical Methodists. These Protestants are organized into 776 churches, and they have 840 ordained ministers. In Alsace-Lorraine are 265 churches and 209 ministers. The Laura Spellman Rockefeller foundation has promised to contribute $100,000 to a fund for the enlargement of the work in France, provided the French people raise $300,000.

Another Community Church Formed in Connecticut

Usually the economic motive enters into the formation of community churches, but at Middlefield, Conn., the Methodist church and the Congregational church were each in prosperous circumstances, having received legacies and gifts that made them permanent institutions. It was the hunger for a larger fellowship in the community that led to the formation of the joint church. The Methodist district superintendent and the secretary of the Connecticut Federation of Churches aided in the selection of a minister. The separate congregations were seldom larger than fifty people, but the united congregation is over two hundred. The members contribute their benevolent funds to their own denominations.

English Clergy Organize to Fight Drink

The religious forces of England are beginning to appreciate their duty to lead the nation in a fight against the evils of alcoholism. The bishop of London, Dr. Ingram, presided over a luncheon recently in which both churchmen and free-church ministers were present. Among those participating in the discussion were Dr. Garvie, Dr. Gillie and Rev. Henry Carter, former president of the Wesleyan Methodist church. The nation is not ripe yet for a campaign for prohibition so the present efforts of these religious leaders will be confined to four points—Sunday closing, abolition of sale to young persons, the control of clubs, and local option. The latter was discussed with considerable interest, the speakers insisting that it was by the local option road that both Canada and the United States prepared for prohibition in larger areas.

Russian Patriarch Did Not Abdicate

The contest between the bolshevist authorities and the leaders of the Russian church goes on without abatement. The bolshevists took advantage of the famine to strip the churches of their ornaments, and perhaps the churchmen showed bad strategy in not offering them freely, though many of the treasures are priceless works of art which can never be replaced. The press reported recently that twenty religious leaders were under sentence of death. As much of the Russian news needs to be censored, one must wait for further advices before this horrible story is believed. Among the other reports from Russia was one that Patriarch Tikhon had resigned. This is now denied in the most authoritative way by Metropolitan Anthony, president of the Russian holy synod outside of Russia in a cablegram to Bishop Anthony in New York. This cablegram informs the Russian bishop of the arrest of Patriarch Tikhon, and offers the additional information that during his confinement in prison one of his metropolitans represents him.

Wants to Evangelize America Througt the Press

Rev. Albertus Pieters, a missionary maintained in Japan by the Reformed church, has become a convert to the use of the printed page in the extension of Christianity. He writes in the Continent in the following fashion with regard to recent experiments in that line: "When we fix our minds steadily upon the class of people who are entirely out of touch with ordinary church work, people ignorant of the gospel, hostile to it or utterly indifferent with regard to it, people for whom, so to speak, the church and the Christian gospel hardly exist, we shall clearly see that the secular press is the only agency left, whereby, in the present state of society, the three great things can be done that must be done for such people—to tell them what they do not know, to convince them of that which they do not believe, and to arouse in them a desire for what they do not possess. In our work in Japan, naturally the main attention is concentrated upon the first class named—those who do not know and must be told. Hence our articles are chiefly designed to make the simplest facts and doctrines of the Christian religion commonly known. In America the emphasis may perhaps properly rest upon the second and third items, arousing conviction and desire. And yet, this should not be too hastily taken for granted. It strikes a returned missionary very forcibly in observing American conditions that almost all

Will Try to be Good Preachers' Wives

Ministers' wives have a position that is hard to fill, as everyone knows. Some try to be parish workers without salary, while others hold themselves quite aloof from all parish activity. The wives of Lutheran student ministers at the Lutheran Theological seminary of St. Paul have recently banded together for study that they may become informed in the things which will be necessary to them in their new relations. The wives of Methodist ministers in the Rock River conference (Chicago area) are organized. Many other groups are forming, and soon we may expect a pronouncement on the question, Shall the minister's wife become Aid Society president?

Missouri State Law Hinders Disciples

The Disciples of Christ chose to locate their headquarters in St. Louis without knowing that there were grave difficulties in the way of any church corporation doing business in Missouri. In the early days some who boasted themselves to be infidels wrote into the constitution of the state paragraphs which prevent a general church organization from administering property trusts in the state. The United Christian Missionary society cannot incorporate under the laws of Missouri unless the constitution of the state is changed. Should the society incorporate under the laws of some other state, there is grave doubt whether it could have its headquarters in a Missouri city. The result is that the Disciples' organization is in the anomalous situation of carrying on a business which runs into millions each year without being an incorporated body, though many local churches are incorporated. In consequence Disciples are much interested in pending constitutional changes in Missouri.

Yale Divinity School Remembers Its Centennial

Although Yale University was founded 222 years ago with the avowed purpose of fitting young men "for church and state," it was just a hundred years ago that the former function was separated from the other and a school was created for teaching divinity. The anniversary of the founding of this school was partially celebrated during centennial week but much of the celebration is yet to come. There are now five departments in this divinity school which fit men for five different specialized callings. These are: pastoral work; missionary work; religious education; social service, and the school of research in the philosophy of religion.

Kansas City a Place Where People Go to Church

Although a number of cities throughout the country have acquired the reputation of being places where people do not go to church, nevertheless there are certain cities where it is the style to dress up and find a church on Sunday morning. Kansas City is one of the best-church-going cities in the nation, and naturally has developed a strong pulpit. Among the leading ministers of Kansas City are Dr. C. F. Aked, a dramatic, idealistic preacher; Dr. Burris A. Jenkins, who is known for his literary style, his dignified pulpit manner, and unconventional selection of topics and Rev. D. R. Evans of First Baptist church, more of the evangelical type. All of these ministers face enormous congregations every Sunday and yet in the city are scores of other churches in which more than average congregations gather for the worship of God.

THERE was a man
Who would brook no disagreement.
His idea of a conversation was one
In which all the replies consisted of "You're right, Bill," "You said it."
When anyone ventured an opinion
With which he did not agree
He left him flat.
In the course of time he found himself
Without anyone to talk to.
Even his wife had her own ideas
On running the cream separator.
And the hired man
Was a convinced Baptist.
Our friend loved to talk
(When people agreed with him)
So
Evenings he would sit on the porch
And shout at the hillside,
"Prohibition, sir, is an infraction of man's God-given right."
And echo would answer
"Right!"
And he was happy.
He subscribed once to The New Republic
But cancelled his subscription

The Reconstruction of Religon

By PROFESSOR CHARLES A. ELLWOOD, Department of Sociology, University of Missouri

"That our civilization is sick, and that it must turn to religion for healing, has been said many times recently. We are in danger, indeed, of making the remark into self-deluding cant. For the sickness is generally diagnosed in terms of the most superficial symptoms, such as the disturbance of our habitual complacence, and the remedy is looked for in a larger dose of the religion to which we are already habituated. Both a standard of health and a cure for our ills are looked for in the status quo ante. A prime merit of Professor Ellwood's book is that he goes behind social symptoms to causes, and behind religion as a tradition to religion as a force, with the result of denying the customary assumption and point of view altogether. Our disease is not due to a departure from accepted standards of mores, and the remedy is not to be found by returning to them. Our sickness inheres, rather, in the status quo itself, both of social organization and of religion, and the remedy lies, not in restoring religion, but in reconstructing it."

So speaks Professor George A. Coe, of Union Theological Seminary, in considering Professor Ellwood's book; and he adds, in noting the author's success in this work: "Professor Ellwood approaches this problem with the sociologist's insight into social conditions, but this insight is warmed by cordial appreciation of religious motives and even traditions. The result is clearness and objectivity in both directions. The book is thought-awakening, conscience-searching, uncompromisingly frank; yet, because it is profoundly religious, it is profoundly friendly. It will help to generate the good will which it regards as the first mark of reasonable religion."

WHAT OTHER LEADERS SAY OF THE BOOK:

This is a great book, profound, logical, lucid, good tempered, and wise. I do not see how any serious man—least of all a clergyman—can afford to neglect it. I predict that no less than 20,000 times the next four years the question will be asked: "Have you read Ellwood's 'Reconstruction of Religion?'"—Prof. E. A. Ross, Department of Economics, University of Wisconsin.

It is a clear and fearless analysis of the present status of our civilization by a scholar amply qualified for the task. Its appearance at the present moment is especially timely. Its spirit throughout is not merely critical, but constructive. It will exert a wise influence because it is the work of an experienced sociologist who already has won a position of conspicuous leadership. In fearlessly declaring that the religion of Jesus contains a solution of our modern social problems he has voiced a conviction that is held by thousands of thoughtful men today. Professor Ellwood has given to the American people a valuable prolegomenon to the reconstruction of religion.—Prof. Charles Foster Kent, Yale University.

This is much more than a study, as the title might imply, of the changes taking place in theological thought; it is rather an analysis both of the significance of Christianity in society and the present stage of our civilization, and a statement of the characteristics of a positive religious faith that will function in our world. Here, then, is a book which no religious worker can afford to neglect, one of the most significant of recent works, because of the cogency of its reasoning, the richness of its background and the practical good sense of its ideal outlook."—H. F. Cope, Editor of "Religious Education."

This is a scholarly, able, and most timely book. In presenting the problem of the reconstruction of religion in terms of social idealism, the author speaks just the message which is most desperately needed by the churches at this moment. Particularly valuable is his application of the social principles of religion to various fields of modern life. The volume is one of the most important which has been issued in recent years and I hope that it will have a wide reading.—John Haynes Holmes.

Perhaps in no other work will be found so well summarized the principles of what may be called "The New Reformation," the movement to bring about the establishment of a more rational and more socialized form of Christianity—a Christianity in harmony with modern science and with modern democracy. The book points the way to the revival of religion and to "the resurrection of faith" by bringing our religious beliefs into line with the accepted truths and the democratic social aspirations of the modern world.

Price of the book $2.25, plus 12 cents postage.

The New Psychology: Why Do We Sin?

IT is interesting to watch the influence of the new psychology on Christian thought and method, as, for example, in a lucid and vivid sketch of the whole field of "Psychology and the Christian Life," by T. W. Pym, which is really a brief exposition of the monumental work of Tansley; its chief value being that it interprets psychology in a common sense manner—stripping it of the mysterious authority of high-sounding words. More specifically a book like "The Doctrine of Sin," by R. S. Moxon, shows what real help the new science gives in dealing with the oldest and most terrible mystery of mortal life. It is a book worth study; a breath of fresh air in a stuffy room. It seeks to triumph over sin by understanding it, answering the riddle of Robert Burns, "One point must still be greatly dark, the moving why they do it." According to the new science, sin is living under the influence of the subconscious instincts, desires and habits when the time has come to pass under the higher rule of reason and conscience. These nether instincts, passions and appetites are not in themselves evil; they are the chief sources of human energy for both good and evil. They cannot be ignored, and to repress them is to court disaster—driving them inward where they are twisted and tangled into all kinds of complexes. Jesus was a supreme psychologist, in that he sought to liberate and sublimate the native powers of man and use their energy for higher ends—forging passion into power, and the cunning of greed into the strategy of righteousness. If the old exhortations no longer appeal, it is because the time has come for understanding, for a wiser approach, for a more Christ-like insight and skill.

Persecuting the Rich

THE American "poor little rich girl" whose forthcoming marriage with a foreigner more than twice her age has been the subject of reams of comment in the public press, has voiced a sad plaint which goes to every human heart: "Why can't I be let alone; why doesn't America treat me just like other folks!" That wrings sympathy from every breast, and must check the avidity of even a newspaper reporter. But mightier and more inexorable forces than sentiment enter. They dominate and will dominate. She will not be let alone. She will not be treated like other folks, because she is not like other folks. She is heiress of two of the greatest American fortunes. She is destined to be the recipient of an enormous endowment of the savings of the American people, and the American people are interested to know what is to become of their savings and on whom they are to be bestowed. They cannot control the bestowal, or at least do not, and so they are doing what seems to them the next best thing, or at least the next most interesting thing, to spending their savings themselves: they are seeking to find out how those who arbitrarily control them propose to spend them. When one forgets how the rich come to be rich, where their money comes from, who produces it, and whom it finally belongs to, the prying, spying, inquisitive publicity given their personal conduct does seem malignant enough. But, whether they choose to grant the fact or not, the rich are the custodians of the accumulated savings of society, of all the people. The people love money, and they discover a special fondness for it as the consciousness deepens within them that the money held by the rich is their money, the true possession of all and only accidentally held in the possession of those who control it. Our poor little maiden would not be annoyed and distraught if she were not rich, if she were not the actual and prospective custodian of enormous values created by the American people, and in which they are more and more disposed to assert a proprietorship. She could act, and think, and move about, and take her own way, with all the freedom of other folks, if she were indeed like other folks. But she cannot eat her cake and have it, too. She cannot be rich with the common possessions and enjoy the felicities of those who lay no personal claim to what finally belongs to all. Of course she does not understand all this. She is grieved and vexed by what seem higgling and prying and spying reporters. Some day, perhaps, she will see what other folks now comprehend with gathering conviction, that these pestiferous questioners are the crude prototypes of emissaries who will one day scientifically and thoroughly conduct public scrutiny of the custodians of the public resources. The people will some day have more control of their savings. They should now be accorded, not too grudgingly, a curious knowledge of what those who hold their savings are doing and proposing to do with them.

"Number, Please: The Line is Busy"

THE death of Alexander Bell, inventor of the telephone, is an event to tell us how far and how fast we have journeyed in a single generation. Always in a hurry, and absorbed in our affairs, we seem unable to realize that there was a time, only a little while ago, when a man could not take down the receiver and have speech with his neighbor on urgent matters; he had to write or go on a journey. Beginning as a novelty, spreading first as a luxury, then as a necessity, the network of telephone wires is interwoven with the very warp and woof of our social fabric; has grown into it, grown with it, until there is hardly a family, in city or country, that is not enmeshed. So much so that, if there is ever to be a disentangling, it must come through another invention superseding that of Bell, perhaps dispensing with wires and even central operators. The inventor did not realize the revolution in human affairs he had wrought, and was wont to regard the telephone as a nuisance; but he was of another generation. All of which is a parable, if we have ears to hear; a parable of the increasing complexity of human life, the weaving together of society, and if it often seems a nuisance, it is none the less inevitable. For most of us and for civilization itself the telephone is a necessity; and we would not be without it. So, henceforth, man must live in a world drawn together, jammed together, whether he will or no; learning in a more intimate fellowship a finer insight, sympathy, and skill of contact and service. At the time of his death Dr. Bell was working on a device whereby a pilgrim lost in a desert might save himself from death by thirst by distilling water from his own breath; but soon there will be no deserts. Even so, the old individualism is becoming impossible, and we must find our solitude in society.

The Atrophy of Spirituality in Youth

DR. RUFUS JONES has recently said that we are confronted by a generation of boys and girls in our schools and colleges who are non-religious, "untroubled by a spark." They are not lawless; they are not anti-social; they appear to be unconcerned as to whether God exists or not, having cut him off their list of acquaintances, as if the spiritual life belonged to some unknown dimension of being. Happily, as Dr. Jones would be the first to admit, there are exceptions; but it is only too true that the youth of today seem to suffer a tragic atrophy of spirituality at the very time when the spiritual world ought to be near and real. Insofar as it is true, it is the master tragedy of our generation; and the fault lies equally with the home and the church. Nine people out of ten are materialists because, in the critical period of adolescence, one doorway of the spirit after another is allowed to close through neglect, until at last they come to regard the world of men and affairs as the only reality, and thereafter live in an Euclidian world of three dimensions, fancying that they are wise, whereas they are only hard and half blind. How can the transition be made from the vivid, imaginative, radiant religion of the child to the religion of the adult, without loss of the most precious vision of life? Tact, sympathy, skill, insight, all are needed, if the church is to be the nursery of the faith that makes men faithful and the vision that interprets life. Dean Inge was right; religion is not taught, it is caught—its secret is personal contact and the divine contagion of character, its method the ministry of truth through personality.

Rebecca West, the Brilliant

MISS REBECCA WEST has been so keen and slashing a critic of modern fiction that it seemed a duty laid upon her to show how to do the trick. She has done it magnificently in "The Judge," one of the most brilliant works of fiction in the last ten years. Indeed, it is almost too brilliant, dazzling by its glitter and fatiguing the power of surprise alike in style and characterization. She takes for her text the cryptic saying: "Every mother is the judge, who sentences the children for the sins of the father;" to expound which three tragedies are interlocked, knotted together, in a manner hardly found elsewhere in English fiction. For the like of it we must go to the great Russians, whose method the author has manifestly studied; and especially to Dostoevsky, the most terrifying reader of the human soul in recent generations. One had thought that the male species had been eviscerated once for all by Meredith in "The Egoist;" but here it is done even more mercilessly by the deft hand of a woman. If Hutchinson could draw a woman as well as Rebecca West, "If Winter Comes" would be immortal; but it is not in him to do it. There he fails, however well he succeeds with Mark Sabre, who reminds us of the gentle prince whom Dostoevsky described in "The Idiot,"—the Christ, it often seems, in disguise. A gallery of portraits, a laboratory of character, the blended lights of human love and sorrow and destiny—"The Judge" breaks the heart, and mends it.

The Anglo-American Admiration Society

THE Landmark, edited by John Evelyn Wrench, is the official organ of the English-speaking Union, and the unbroken flow of flattery is seldom interrupted in its pages. However, in the August issue there is a rift in the lute. An American woman living in Lima, Peru, protests against so much sickening gush, and against the policy of the Union in general, on the ground that it is ineffective—reaching only those who are already convinced on both sides, and making no attempt to express the real opinion of either people. Meanwhile, she suggests ways and means and plans whereby the Union might do real worth while work. More than once we have expressed the same feeling of futility, not because we are opposed to Anglo-American friendship—far from it—but because we should like to see intelligent and effective work done in its behalf. Oily flattery gets nowhere and is tiresome in the bargain. Friends who cannot be frank are not real friends; and that is just the impression which The Landmark must make upon a discerning reader—it is afraid some one will say something real and to the point, and so, as the lady from Peru said, it publishes only the letters which praise its policy. So far quite the best service the Union has rendered is the good banquets it has served, for the sake of which one might almost be willing to endure the palaver.

"Is it Nothing to You, O Ye that Pass By?

WHY do we let the Armenians and Greeks in Asia Minor be massacred out of existence? Has the war, which gorged us with horrors, killed the sense of justice and pity alike, leaving us dead of heart? Slowly, to an accompaniment of the most ghastly torture of red massacre and white massacre, all the Christian minorities in the land where St. Paul planted his little churches, are being exterminated; and we have failed to produce a public opinion to rebuke and stay it. A delegation of Greeks now in America in behalf of their tormented and slaughtered people—doomed by the august allied council to go once more under Turkish rule—tell of scenes that sicken the body with their filth and beastliness, and terrify the soul with their shame; yet no great public man has made their cause his own. Christian women are stripped in the open fields, ravaged, mutilated, and butchered. Children are stood up in rows to see how many little heads a bullet will go through before its force is spent. The aged and infirm are left to die like dogs by the road-sides, and the rest are driven into the wilderness to perish of hunger. How can we wear the name of humanity, to say nothing of the name of Christ, and remain unmoved by such things! The delegation of Greeks ask for no money, for no soldiers, but only for moral support—surely, if America is not dead of soul it will make its voice heard!

Authentic Theological Genius

A BROTHER minister has asked us if we know of any book of these late years which displays authentic theological insight of a kind both original and important, dropping a plummet a little deeper into the mystery of truth. It is a hard question to answer, if only because originality in theology is rare in any age, most of all in our own, when the tendency is everywhere toward sociology instead. If by theology we mean thought about God, who alone is permanently interesting, and whose love is really the only thing worth thinking about, then we can answer the question after a fashion. No one in recent times, so far as we are aware, has written of this mystery with more living insight than the late E. C. Rolt, in "The World's Redemption." It is an unfinished, unpolished book, and was almost unnoticed when it appeared; the work of a dying man writing away from his library—its piercing insight due, perhaps, to the ministry of pain and the near presence of death—yet, while not invulnerable to criticism, it reveals more authentic theological genius than any book we can recall in recent time. Unfortunately the book has not been published in America, but it ought to be, because it does deal with the wonder of the love of God in a manner unique and profound, almost penetrating the mystery into which the writer passed—he himself lingering at the portal while he wrote.

Governor Allen and Mr. White

THE emotional and intellectual caliber of William Allen White is much better known than is that of Governor Allen. The issue which has been raised between them, and which at least Mr. White insists will not be permitted to affect their long and intimate friendship, is one of deep interest to all. This interest will deepen in the degree in which they shall actually contrive to maintain their personal friendship while they press their legal and social issue to the decision.

Mr. White, most people will feel, has conducted himself and his cause admirably. He has not violated the law; he is testing official action which he believes not to be in accordance with the highest law of the land. Popular interest and sympathy are likely to remain with him to the end. What is the matter with Governor Allen and his position? His industrial court, whose administration is the issue between him and his friend, Mr. White, has been hailed both within and without the state, as the saving of our distraught social order. Few public measures have aroused so great hopes among conscientious citizens. Probably all unprejudiced persons very much want it to succeed. But it has not succeeded; it is not succeeding. That is the patent weakness of Governor Allen's position. This device was announced as the bringer of peace in the industrial world, and it has rather brought a sword; it has compounded industrial strife.. Under its strategy the heretofore silent and forbearing third party to industrial warfare, the innocent public, has lost its virtue of innocence and forbearance, and has become so vocal and boisterous as to shame itself by the violence of its participation in the contest. This sense of shame is driving the public into sympathy with Mr. White's cause, especially when it is under the conduct of so irenic and loyal a spirit as his.

Governor Allen has been betrayed into his indefensible position by an exceedingly common aberration of the official mind. He is an official plus. Indeed, he is first something else, and then an official. He is using his official power to put over a pet idea. The public was very glad to join in petting his idea so long as it offered promise of succeeding in its aim, but when it developed practical weaknesses the public is much more ready to discard it, or at least acknowledge its weaknesses, than is the governor. He shows a disposition to force the idea through, by the grace—or disgrace—of official sanction.

Aside from the merits of this particular governmental measure, Governor Allen's position is awkward in a social order which assumes to administer democracy. He is holding too many offices. He is prophet, the seer of a new idea, which was heralded as a saving force for democracy. He is priest, the high-priest of a cult which has speedily sprung up around this idea, and which at least in the governor's mind, has invested it with something like religious sanctity. Finally, he commands the power inherited from the king; he invokes the majesty of the law in the support of his idea. This is too much. No one can safely assume this triple role.

The American public is exceedingly sensitive on the score of the law. The reckless manner in which it is being defied by special and selfish interests is arousing great resentment. A champion of the law is a champion indeed. Governor Allen's championship, in so far, entitles him to honor and the support of all good citizens. But it compromises his position that the law which he is so doughty to defend and execute is his own law; he conceived it, and his personal and official prestige forced it into its place on the statute books. The idea is his; he has not been overmodest in claiming it, and exploiting it and himself before the whole American public. Another, holding his office, might execute the law with that inexorable fidelity which is the glory of the impartial administrator. Such fidelity would set the law forth in its strength and in its weakness, confirming its strength and guiding the sovereign public mind in eradicating its weaknesses. But Governor Allen, prophet and priest, as well as clothed with the majesty of administrator of the law, can lay claim to no such glory. Assuming so much and such varied prerogative, one glory clouds and tarnishes another. He vitiates his prophethood and priesthood by invoking the arm of the law, and he violates his office as impartial administrator of the law by standing forth at the same time in the full robes of his other offices. His idea having failed as idea, he seeks to put it over by strong-arm methods. He set out to gain industrial peace, and he determinedly proposes to get peace, even if he has to fight for it along lines of his own pre-determination, not alone against the prejudice and selfish interests of the labor unions, but against the clearest and most exalted expression of public opinion, as revealed in the attitude of its most trustworthy exponent in his state, his friend and hitherto loyal supporer, William Allen White.

Governor Allen is not a base-hearted despot. He is a conscientious public servant and a high-minded citizen. But he is holding too many offices, seeking to discharge too many and too varied social functions. Democracy doubtless has need of all of the functions of the prophet, the priest and the king, or their democratic successors and modern expressions. But to concentrate them all in one vitiates the virtue of each and all of them, and constitutes an autocracy which democracy must always resent and seek to frustrate.

The Passing of Lord Northcliffe

THE passing of Lord Northcliffe removes by far the greatest figure in British journalism, and one of the most tremendous personalities of our generation. His rise from lowly place to the height of influence and power was in nowise due to luck, but to grit, pluck, insight, enterprise, practical sagacity and unconquerable courage. At the time of his death he was perhaps the most influential unofficial personage in the British Isles, having command of the strongest combination of journals in Europe, not only the London Times with its prestige, but the Daily Mail with its prodigous circulation, as well as a string of some forty periodicals of various kinds. The first question in every mind is what effect his death will have on the policy of the London Times, which, since the war, has opposed the Lloyd George administration so strongly, with the notable exception of its recent dealings with Ireland, which the Northcliffe press approved throughout. During the war the great editor was at the head of the British propaganda in enemy countries, and the German generals attributed the breaking down of the morale of their armies, in large part, to the influence of his work. In person Lord Northcliffe was a stockily built man, square-headed, square-jawed, with keen eyes, in appearance like a typical British business man—the embodiment of energy, sagacity, and persistence. A man of undoubted genius, he thought in flashes, and was the victim of moods of dark melancholy which discolored his temperament; not a materialist, as the foes charged, but a realist who dealt with things as they are, working in a world where, as he thought, ideals seldom have standing room. He was a keen journalist, not over scrupulous when dealing with a rival, but, having worked his way up through hard lot, he was kind to his men, generous to the lowly, and did not, as was said of one of his contemporaries, take young men, suck their brains, and throw them away, like squeezed lemons, when he had finished. His attack on Lord Kitchener, the idol of British homage, and his demand for high explosives to prevent the British army from committing suicide, was the most daring, if not the most memorable, feat of journalism in England during the great war. It resulted in the rise of Lloyd George to power, and the subsequent break between the two men, was as picturesque as it was uncompromising. After the manner of the late Henry Watterson, the great English editor refused to hold office, on the ground that he could do better service, and be more independent, in a private capacity—he did not wish to be gagged by loyalty to a party or policy. As a writer he was vigorous, forthright, and incisive, but with no unusual literary quality—no poetry, at any rate—but his quick and unusual observations of men and things made his war-book and his articles of travel well worth reading. The first and last impression of Northcliffe was that of power, both of intellect and of personality, sheer energy rather than force of character; a power more often selfish and seldom dedicated to the highest ends. He was a Titan of our day, a great driving force in an age of syndicated enterprise, more concerned, it would seem, for quantity of production than for quality. The true nature of his achievement remains to be appraised, and no doubt it will be a mixed verdict; and it also remains to be seen whether his empire of influence will disintegrate, now that he has passed "to where, beyond these voices, there is peace." Such a life suggests many reflections, one of which, from our Christian point of view, is, what such a man of power might have been had he been touched and transfigured by the spirit of Christ, and his tremendous executive energies directed toward the organization of the kingdom of righteousness. Today the world is well nigh leaderless, lacking men of disinterested public-mindedness, and the result is that we drift not knowing whither we go. At last, or soon or late, men like Northcliffe—men of courage, practical capacity, and executive acumen—must by a deep necessity turn their power to the service of creative goodwill and the common weal.

The Spider

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I AND KETURAH we rode in a Canoe, and we came upon Great Bushes of Wild Honeysuckle. And the fragrance thereof was upon the face of the waters. And I paddled the Canoe to where the Honeysuckle grew, and Keturah plucked the branches, so that the Canoe was fragrant and even more beautiful than when nothing was in it save me and Keturah. But the Blossoms were not more sweet than Keturah. And when we came unto the House, she took the Blossoms and gathered them in her arm, and the great bunch of Honeysuckle walked up to the House and took Keturah with it.

And she arranged a vast Bouquet upon the Table under the Electrick Light. And in the evening, I laid me down upon a Divan that was in the room, and Keturah read aloud unto me out of a book.

Now a Spider had been among the Honeysuckle, and Keturah saw her not. And the Spider found herself unexpectedly in the house, away from all her past associations and opportunities of gaining a livelihood. For I believe it is the Lady Spiders who are most industrious. And as I lay upon the Divan and looked at Keturah, I saw that the Spider had climbed to the Electrick Light, and had gotten a line from the shade thereof to certain of the stalks of the Honeysuckle. And when I saw it first, it looked like an unpromising beginning, for I saw not how the Spider might there construct anything that would look like a Web. Neither did I see that it would do her any good, for the House had Screens, and there is not within it one Fly or Mosquito.

Now what I saw occurred so rapidly that I could not keep up with it; for the Spider climbed to the shade and dropped to the flowers, leaving a Silken Cord behind it, and then started again and did it some more. And then, without stopping to Measure she began at the Outside and ran around the edge, and spun a Filament there. And then she went around again, and there was another.

And Keturah paused in her reading, and behold there was a Spider at her shoulder. And she said, I did not know that I carried in a Spider.

And I said, Let not the Spider frighten Miss Muffet away; neither do thou anything unto it. But come hither and behold how wondrous is the weaving of its Web.

And we beheld, both of us, and it was more rapid and more wonderful than we could have imagined.

And the Web was finished, and the Spider sat down in the center of it.

And I said, Thou hast set up Business in an Unpromising Location.

But even as I spake, there came a Gnat, and was caught in the Web, and the Spider hastened and fastened him in. And then came a tiny Moth, and he also was caught. For whatever got through the screens and had wings flew toward the light, and few of them escaped.

And the Spider did good Business all the evening, and before we turned out the light, the Web was all Puckered and Knotted with the things that the Spider had caught.

Now this I say unto the sons and daughters of men who must live in Unpromising Locations, and do Business in Unattractive Places, and to those whose Life Plans are Dislocated by Accident or Providence, Consider the Spider. Adapt thyself to Circumstances. Weave thou thy Web, and do thy work, and behold, it may be that the place where Providence or Circumstance hath placed thee shall be even like the Spider, whose misfortunes brought unto her the biggest and best meal that she had ever eaten.

To Our Subscribers

Experience proves that it is highly unsatisfactory to handle two changes of address, one immediate and the other deferred, in one order. Our subscribers on vacation will therefore please take note that, in their own interest, we will await a specific order to change their Christian Century from the vacation address to the permanent address.

Two good rules to remember:

(1) One change at a time.

(2) Give present as well as new address.

VERSE

A Road Song

IT'S—Oh, for the hills, where the wind's some one
With a vagabond foot that follows!
And a cheer-up hand that he claps upon
Your arm with the hearty words, "Come on!
We'll soon be out of the hollows,
My heart!
We'll soon be out of the hollows!"

It's—Oh, for the songs, where the hope's some one
With a renegade foot that doubles!
And a jolly lilt that he flings to the sun
As he turns with the friendly laugh, "Come on!
We'll soon be out of the troubles,
My heart!
We'll soon be out of the troubles."

MADISON CAWEIN.

The Bond

O I was born a Protestant
And all my years have clung
To the lifted, living Cross
Where the Lord Christ hung.

Now the goodly Catholics nearby
Have had the grace to raise
A steeple with a golden cross;
Take, Lord, my praise!

For, O, it is a noble thing
To see my symbol high
Upon a brother's house of prayer,
Against the changing sky.

FRANCES AVERY FAUNCE.

Thomas

I BELIEVE in God, the Father;
Yet I doubt his being.
My soul assents, but senses urge:
"Belief must follow seeing."
Where matter ceases, vision ends—
Reason hesitates, the spirit comprehends.

I believe in Christ, the Savior;
Yet I doubt his birth.
I feel his power, but science says:
"All flesh is born of earth."
Shall nature step aside for God, forsooth?
Reason shakes its head—the spirit grasps the truth.

As Man to Man

I DON'T see how you stand it, God,
Looking right down into men's hearts
All the time,
And seeing them always wanting things
They can't get.
Not things—that's not what I mean—
But what a man—or a woman—
Wants in his heart:
A chance to do his bit in his own way,
A little time to look up at the sky
And watch the high clouds sailing by—
You know!
And somebody to love, maybe a child,
And a God he feels dead sure about.

Maybe you don't know what it's like
To want and want and want,
Up in heaven with all the angels there,
And folks that are saved.
Maybe it isn't lonely there,
Unless—perhaps—
I wonder—
God! Do you happen to want—us?

Well, if you do,
It somehow makes our wanting
Not so hard to stand;
And if you do,
Then we're glad
For most of all we want you.

JEAN GRIGSBY PAXTON.

Life's Hour Glass

I CLOSE my hand upon life—
The fickle moments escape
Like handfuls of slippery sand
From the fingers of children at play.
The tighter I clutch, like sand,

The faster the minutes flow.
I dare not loosen my hold
To see how many be left
For fear I should lose them all.
And yet, if I stumble not,
Or if Fate unkind forbear
To palsy my grip betimes,
I know I've enough and to spare
To weary me quite of the game.
So I lay me down to sleep;
Why care how the hour glass runs?
God will keep count of the sands.

Finishing Schools

By Halford E. Luccock

THE little girl across the street went away last fall to a finishing school. The trip was a success. She was "finished." The preceptress and all the other "esses" accomplished the task with all the neatness and dispatch promised in the catalog. Of the efficiency of the curriculum there can be no doubt. The finished product has reminded us that the tender grace of a day that is dead will never come back again. And I, for one, feel almost as though a funeral had passed down our block, for the light of the whole block dies when one of its little girls disappears in the clutches of a finishing school.

Oh yes, Mildred is still with us. Not all the finishing touches have been entirely completed. Little girls are endowed by the Creator with certain inalienable rights and not even the most expensive finishing school in the country can quite alienate them. She is still pretty. In some sophisticated ways much more so than before. She has what is described in the catalog as "carriage." But the frank, rollicking playmate-at-large of the whole neighborhood, with her honest, inquisitive eyes, with her unconscious and yet fierce democracy and her sublime (I had almost written divine) independence of judgment, is gone. In her place there is a finished product, with imagination, emotions and most other faculties so stiff that they walk with a limp.

A schoolboy showing a picture of King Charles I on his way to the scaffold, told the astonished onlookers that it was a picture of King Charles on his way to be blockheaded. That sometimes happens at school. And it is a question whether it is not a worse tragedy in one's life to be block-headed than be-headed. If I were to draw a picture of the type of finishing school to which Mildred went, it would be the open mouth of a dark cave with a long string of little girls in pig-tails going into it on their way to be block-headed.

LIKE JAPANESE GARDEN

Whoever gave this particular type of institution the name of finishing school had a flash of genius. There is a kind of expensive school that is like a garden in which the little dwarf Japanese trees are raised, or rather where they are stunted. Every variety of retarding process known is ingeniously applied. The native efflorescence of the plant is deadened until the "finished" tree, a few feet in height, while graceful and beautiful after a hothouse fashion, is nothing more than a caricature of a tree.

These schools do not supply the discipline or the training which would fit a woman for the modern world of self-respecting freedom and enlarged opportunity. They do not fit her to move in self-reliant and effective service in the world today. They rather fit her to take her part in one of the Elsie Dinsmore books, or one of the novels by "the Dutchess" so popular a generation ago. They teach a little French, enough to enable one to order a table d'hote dinner, but not enough to struggle with the mysteries of an a la carte menu. They teach some music, enough to enable the student to change the phonograph records gracefully. And they teach deportment. Heavens! What a word. The self-conscious attention to "the proprieties" acts on the human soul like a chilling breeze on a peach orchard just bursting into blossom and nips all the blooms in the bud. The ill-fated graduates of a fashionable finishing school might well take as their class motto, "We have met the enemy and we are theirs." For their natural human sympathies and the possibilities of their expanding spirits have been smothered by that deadly enemy of the human race—superficial convention.

They have become self-centered and self-satisfied. Their vision is astigmatized until Paul Poiret is a greater man than Abraham Lincoln, and bridge-whist is a more vital issue than child labor. Oh, events will happen after they are "finished." Events such as marriage, births and deaths, but the history of a growing soul is pretty largely closed. The candle has been snuffed out.

MARRIAGE DEADLY FOR MANY

But there are many other kinds of finishing schools. Marriage has proved a deadly finishing school for the larger powers of human spirit to many millions of women. This is not necessarily a fault of the institution of marriage itself. It is the woman who is the usual victim of the inertia which develops often after marriage. When the bride steps within her own four walls, the shades of the prison house descend upon her. Indeed, we might often as well read the burial service instead of the wedding ritual, for many of the finest possibilities of the mind are laid away. The interests of a woman's life shrink until they are bounded by the diminutive circle of her neighbors and her house and her family. These are harsh words. Perchance you do not believe them. Then talk to the next minister you meet. Get him to tell you of the vast number of matrimonial craft which have disappeared beyond the vanishing point as far as any vital, human service is concerned after marriage.

Here is a bright young girl interested in many kinds of work, both religious and philanthropic. Often she makes the capital blunder of dropping all after marrige and retires from the busy world's human need as if she were either a nun who had entered a convent, or a fat little hedgehog which had wiggled itself into its dug-out for the winter. The person who thus takes the line of least resistance and in the self-satisfied happiness of the early ways and years of married life, withdraws from the wider circle of service and fellowship, will pay a heavy price for it in the dullness and emptiness of later years.

Many other things act as finishing schools in much the same manner. A little bit of success early in the game may be a finishing school, for anyone so unlucky as to encounter it. A man's real possibilities of growth and development may be entirely spoiled by the easy mastery of the first lessons of a profession or art. Whenever a person says, ever so slyly and softly to himself, "I have learned the trick," his feet stand in slippery places. We often use the phrase regarding a certain person, "He has arrived." That phrase in itself is an epitaph, for the man who has "arrived" is usually so conscious of the feat that he stops to admire himself, and at that hour his faculties congeal.

ALWAYS THE BUTLER'S PART

There was an actor in the old days who played the part of a butler so perfectly that every critic singled out his performance for favorable mention. The praise so went to his head that he played the butler's part all his life. When a singer has listened to enough people telling him that he is a wonder, he is in imminent danger of coming to believe it and when that happens there is only one step more, namely, the exit. More preachers have been ruined by thoughtless old ladies in their congregations, who play the part of the very devil, tempting the poor fellow to the dizzy heights of self-conceit, than by all other causes put together. Unconsciously, unless he is a man either of iron will or genuine Christian humility, he surveys his weekly sermonic effort with the air of a Nebuchadnezzar who says "Is not this great Babylon which I have built?" The inevitable sequel always happens. Like the great Nebuchadnezzar he is soon turned out to pasture!

Pity the poor man who has one good sermon. It will be the death of him as a preacher, unless a providential fire comes along and burns it up, or some other interposition of Providence snatches him from the jaws of death. Many a man owes his power as a preacher to the fact that he was condemned to preach for years to audiences which in true scriptural fashion, were steadfast and immovable. Trying to move them was like trying to lift the Rocky Mountains. The poor man strained on in the labors of Hercules for years, until, by the grace of God, he acquired the power of speaking words so straight and plain and warm that they would melt the very rocks. It must be laid up to the eternal credit of many a solid-headed congregation that it has helped to make real preachers by strengthening in them that humility of spirit which is the only path to power.

Ingrowing professionalism is an ideal finishing school. The narrow interests, stereotyped manner, the class consciousness, the machine-like mental reactions—all combine to stifle the native individual flavor of personality. It is a common biological process for a man's position to harden on him like a shell. When this goes on unhindered for several years, the man is as much cased in from the outer world as a hermit crab. The physician, the business executive, the teacher and the preacher all stand in the way of temptation.

THE PREACHERS' MEETING

We are very familiar with the name "hard-shelled Baptists." But the Baptists have no monopoly on hard shells. The family of crustaceans is very democratic. There are "hard-shelled" Episcopalians and "hard-shelled" Methodists and Presbyterians,—clergymen whom their professions has solidified. The Monday morning preachers' meeting has proved a finishing school for many a minister. It is a serious question whether the preachers' meeting ought not to be listed in the Methodist Discipline in the paragraph on "Forbidden Amusements." The dangerous part of the curriculum is not in the meeting itself which occasionally provides addresses of a stimulating order. The danger spot is the bookstore where the brethren gather for the weekly orgy of ecclesiastical gossip. Let us be fair. There is a fellowship value to these gatherings which is large. The Monday morning meeting is the pious equipment for the "Hail, hail, the gang's all here" of other circles and as such ought to be encouraged. The finishing school comes in the professional consciousness which is promoted by the petty whirl-pool and eddys of a backwater far removed from the main streams of life. A cramping professionalism closes in on one when the small game of ecclesiastical politics looms larger and larger.

To many preachers the question of St. Paul in Galatians is very applicable "You were running well, what did hinder you?" What slows down so many ministers at middle age? When a runner slackens in the second lap of the race the trouble is usually simple—he gets out of breath. The preacher has the same trouble—scanty inspiration. His attention gets deflected to the minor details and accidents of his work. Large enthusiasms are swallowed up by petty annoyances.

An item in the newspapers a few days ago recorded the fact that a Boston built clipper ship of the sixties named "The Glory of the Seas" (what a hilarious name for a trim little clipper!) was condemned to the junk heap. "The Glory of the Seas" was one of the first square-rigged vessels afloat in her day and it was a sad sight to see her towed away to the junk heap. But that event pictured the anti-climax that often happens in life when a man whose passion and freshness might well be termed "the glory of the seas" pulls into some inglorious drydock of a lack-lustre routine.

WRANGLING FOR PRECEDENCE

A recent comic film showed the village fire department called out to extinguish a fire. They fell to wrangling over the precedence and rank of the various members—which one should have the rank of attaching the hose and which would hold the nozzle. The dispute lasted until the house completely burned down. It was uproariously funny on the screen, but not so funny in real life where the men whose ostensible business it is to serve civilization allow their energies to be absorbed in the details of wrangling for precedence.

One of the most fatal features of the professional manner is the subtlety of the process by which a man's advancement becomes the chief, or at least one of the major ends of life. The result is either that a gently complaining disposition sets in, or a complacency which is not easily stirred. It is this professionalism which is largely responsible for the ungenerous jealousy so often noticed among ministers. Or this finishing school results in a mechanical routine. The prophet no longer gives to me battle cries and banners. Instead he administers opiates and anodynes.

There is in the Methodist phraseology a spiritual phrase which ought not to be lost and that is a "traveling ministry." If there is any profession which ought to be a traveling one, it is the ministry. It must travel to keep step with the onward pilgrimage of the human race. The old physical itinerating may become largely a memory, but when the minister ceases to travel with intellectual agility, he surrenders his largest usefulness. A colored minister in the south greatly impressed his hearers once with a sermon, in which he used again and again the phrase statu quo. After the sermon was over one of the elders took him aside and said, "Parson, you kept saying lots of times that we were in a statu quo. What does that mean?" "Well, I will tell you," the preacher answered, "it is Latin and it means in English, 'we are in the devil of a fix.' " He translated well. It is a terrible fix to be in statu quo where everything is settled. Many a man imagines that he has settled the great questions which used to perplex him, when, as a matter of fact, he has only forgotten them. Ruskin says: "Whenever the search after truth begins, there life begins. Whenever that search ceases, there life ceases." A tragedy has happened in any man's life when he loses that eager interest in intellectual life which Mr. Chesterton has characterized as "uproarious thinking."

THE LANGUAGE OF ZION

Consider some of the most common courses at this finishing school for prophets. They may be briefly pointed out and a red lantern hung on them. A frequent and effective one is Ecclesiastical English. This is what is known in pious phraseology as the "language of Zion." Unless a minister watches his speech with eternal vigilance, it becomes interlarded with pious phrases never used elsewhere, and which stamp him as belonging to a class apart from the common variety of the human race. Turn to any district superintendent's report delivered at the annual conference to find an anthology of these threadbare ecclesiastical phrases. No orthodox district superintendent would think of closing a report without mentioning "A going in the tops of the mulberry trees," or referring to a "gracious revival" and adding as an afterthought that "the end is not yet."

Tone Production is another course at the finishing school by which a human voice becomes an instrument for emitting sounds like that of a train caller at the union station. A minister ought to perform the highly useful function of a fog horn, warning people of impending dangers. But it is not strictly necessary to reproduce the tones of the fog horn itself. The worst trouble with what is known as a pulpit tone is that the afflicted is rarely conscious of it. We once listened to a professor in a theological seminary warning the students against using a "pulpit tone." The warning itself was vocalized in what seemed to us as the most sepulchral noises which ever burst forth from a human chest.

A man has reached a sorry pass when he cannot speak in public without a trace of the "let-us-all-rise-and-sing-that-grand-old-hymn" manner of speech. Happily the ponderous pulpit orator is being gathered to the historical museum. We do not hear that painful phrase "pulpit effort" as often as we used to. The preachers whom the country listens to with the greatest eagerness and profit are men who have mastered the art of simple speech without the slightest trace of conscious effort or impressiveness, men like Bishop F. J. McConnell, Charles Reynolds Brown, Charles E. Jefferson, Henry Sloan Coffin and a host of others. With such leaders a new preaching tradition is growing.

There is only one really effective precaution against suffocation—keep out in the open air.

Washington and the French Bolshevists

By Lucia Ames Mead

SENATOR Borah is to be thanked for teaching Americans a forgotten episode in American history which has very pertinent bearing on the policies laid down by President Harding and Secretary Hughes as to Soviet Russia. For nearly four years since the armistice, all production and reconstruction have been hampered or halted by the folly of statesmen intent on political rather than on economic readjustment. A far truer instinct than that shown by the diplomats at Paris was that of those women delegates from fifteen different countries who came from the Women's International League for Peace to Zurich just as the Versailles treaty was published. Knowing that even then there could be alterations, they sent a ringing appeal to lay first emphasis on the world's need for bread.

A great experiment has been tried in Russia, or rather half tried, for its effects have been greatly altered by extraneous circumstances. The world has condemned the experiment and tried to crush the experimenters. Month after month for nearly five years we have been told of the imminent fall of the bolshevik regime. The nations have spent nearly a billion dollars in fruitless attempts to sustain various counter revolutions. Left alone, one of the greatest economic experiments ever tried might have had a fair chance to show how it was the product of doctrinaires and ignored fundamental instincts of human nature. The Russian people would have struggled through to some conclusion and taught themselves a lesson which foreign guns could never teach. If the injunction of President Wilson after the advent of Lenin had been followed: "Afford Russia a clear and precise opportunity for independent settlement of her autonomous and political development."

Today, with all the world but France and the United States ready to resume relations with a de facto government in Russia, it behooves Americans to study the exact parallelism between the Russian revolution and the French revolution. The latter undermined monarchy and shook the Bastilles of privilege throughout the world just as our own republic was born. In 1800, Pitt in Parliament declared that the French republic had "issued a universal declaration of war against all the thrones of Europe. They had passed the decree of 1792 proclaiming the promise of French succor to all nations who should manifest a wish to become free, they had sealed their principles by the deposition of their sovereign, they had applied them to England by encouraging the addresses of those seditious and traitorous societies who from the beginning favored their views."

PARALLELISM IN REVOLUTIONS

All stand-patters in Europe stood appalled before the audacious and destructive doctrines which undermined the foundations of their privilege. Pitt demanded just what the allies have been demanding of the bolshevists—"the giving in some public and unequivocal manner of a pledge of their intention no longer to foment trouble or to excite disturbances against the governments." Just as the Soviet government has, up to date, amazed and refuted the prophets of its downfall, so the success of the French revolution for a decade confounded men like Pitt.

Fox did not justify the revolutionists, but with a keen sense of consistency declared: "I therefore contend, that as we never scrupled to treat with the princes of the house of Bourbon on account of their rapacity, their thirst for conquest, their violation of treaties, their perfidy, and their restless spirit, so we ought not to refuse to treat with their republican imitators. . . . No man can regret more than I do the enormities that France has committed; but how do they bear on the question as it now stands? Are we forever to deprive ourselves of the benefits of peace because France has perpetrated acts of injustice? I think the people of France as well as every other people ought to have the government which they like best themselves. and the form of that government or the persons who hold it in their hands, should never be an obstacle with me to treat with the nation for peace or to live with them in amity."

WASHINGTON RECOGNIZED FRANCE

For a generation, republican France bolstered up Tsaristic Russia, with its cruel oppression of 170,000,000 abject subjects. Its money-lenders poured in gold to buttress the imperial military power of the most autocratic government in the world which, as we are now discovering, was largely responsible as well as Austria and Germany for precipitation of the world war. The United States recognized and was on friendly terms with this autocratic government, but now, with the attitude of Pitt instead of Fox, it repudiates the de facto government that has replaced it. Washington abhorred the excesses and cruelties of the Dantons and Robespierres, as much as Secretary Hughes and Poincare condemn those of Lenin and Trotzky, but his attitude was wholly different. In 1793, seven years before Fox's reply to Pitt, he asked Hamilton whether a minister from the republic of France "shall be received and, if so, whether it be absolutely or with qualifications." This was shortly after a committee of public safety had assumed dictatorial powers and of which Danton was the controlling influence. All life and property in France were in the control of nine men. Previous to this, the monarchy had been overthrown, the king executed, prisoners in jails had been massacred, and "Paris ran red with blood." Since his cabinet unanimously decided to receive the minister from the French republic, Washington received Genet as minister and through the following bloody years continued to recognize the French republic.

Hamilton's abhorrence of the French revolution was precisely Secretary Hughes's feeling regarding the Russian regime. He said: "A league has at length been cemented between the apostles of irreligion and anarchy." He pictured the "rapid succession of dreadful revolutions which have laid waste property, made havoc among the arts, overthrown cities, desolated provinces"; yet he and Jefferson agreed with Washington as to recognition. The result was the cessation of French propaganda in this country. Later, England was compelled to follow Washington's example. Ten years of warfare might have been prevented had Pitt had the wisdom to recognize the French republic, when Washington proclaimed the policy of wisdom. In a letter written later, Washington says: "My conduct in public and private life, as it relates to the important struggle in which France is engaged has been uniform from the commencement and may be summed up in a few words: that I have always wished well to the French revolution; that I have always given it as my decided opinion that no nation has a right to intermeddle in the internal concerns of another; that every one had a right to form and adopt whatever government they liked best to live under themselves."

FRENCH REPUDIATED CLAIMS

The claim of the irreconcileables in France today that Soviet Russia must repay the old loans made by Frenchmen to maintain the Tsar's imperial regime should be contrasted with the action of their forefathers in their own revolution. These repudiated the financial claims made against the rotten government that they had overthrown and paid, if I remember right, but thirty per cent of the total, the interest not beginning until 1800.

Today, it is axiomatic to say that the fate of Europe and America's own prosperity depend on confidence, leading to credit loans and stimulation of European production. Two nations stand chiefly in the way, France and the United States. The doctrinaires of Russia, France and our own country, each in their own way, have ignored the lessons of history, of mass psychology, and economic necessity. Washington's advice has been much in evidence in misquotation regarding "entangling alliances." It is now desirable that those long-forgotten words of his touching the recognition of the French republic should be resurrected and made influential in our policies as regards the recognition of Russia.

"And What Good Came of It?"

By W. R. Inge

"Sirs, ye are brethren; why do ye wrong one to another?" .Acts vii, 26.

IN the early part of the war a young English officer who was killed on the following day wrote his last letter to his father: "Having been about all night digging, I was shifted to make room for some other company. I advanced to a cemetery to defend it and stayed there most of the day. It is a beastly thing to have to do, digging trenches among graves and pulling down crosses and ornamental wreaths to make room. One feels that something is wrong when a man lies down behind a child's grave to shoot at a bearded German who has probably got a family anxiously awaiting his return home. It was a miserable day, wet, and spent in a cemetery under those conditions. There was a large crucifix at one end. The sight of the bullets chipping Christ's image about, and the knowledge of what he has done for us and the Germans, and what we are doing to his consecrated ground and each other, make one feel sick of the whole war, or sicker than before."

The men at the front "felt that something was wrong," and sometimes said so in plain soldierly words, like this poor boy. I think most of us feel it now. We all learned in our childhood Southey's poem about the Battle of Blenheim, with the child's unanswered and unanswerable question, "And what good came of it at last? said little Wilhelmina." "The wrath of men worketh not the righteousness of God." We knew it, of course, and I never met any one who wished for war with Germany or any other country; but we were told. perhaps rightly—it is not for me to say—that the country must fight, that there was no help for it. The people of all the other belligerent countries were told the same, and so millions of men who a week before were absorbed in their peaceful work and play in their quiet homes, with their families round them, were hurled against each other for four years of scientific butchery. We need not now apportion the guilt. It is as Europeans, as Christians, as civilized nations, that we are all called to penitence, a penitence in which we may find the path to reconciliation.

The young officer's words recall that unforgettable paragraph in Sartor Resartus: "There dwell and toil in the British village of Dumdrudge some five hundred souls. From these, by certain "natural enemies" of the French, there are selected during the French war, say, thirty able-bodied men. Dumdrudge at her own expense has suckled and nursed them; she has, not without difficulty or sorrow, fed them up to manhood, and even trained them to crafts, so that one can weave and another build, another hammer. Nevertheless, among much weeping and swearing, they are selected, all dressed in red; and shipped away at the public charges, say to the south of Spain, and kept there till they are wanted. And now to that same spot in the south of Spain are thirty similar French artisans from a French Dumdrudge in like manner winding; till at length the two parties come into actual juxtaposition, and thirty stand fighting thirty, each with a gun in his hand. Straightway the word 'Fire!' is given, and they blow the souls out of one another, and in place of sixty brisk, useful craftsmen, the world has sixty dead carcasses, which it must bury and shed tears for. Had these men any quarrel? Busy as the devil is, not the smallest. They lived far enough apart, were the entirest strangers; nay, in so wide a universe, there was even unconsciously, by commerce, some mutual helpfulness between them."

ABSTRACT CRIMINALS

The war, while it lasted, seemed to us to have been caused by the deliberate wickedness of an abstract demon called Germany. The Germans were more or less honestly persuaded that similar abstractions called Russia, France, and England, were the criminals. Now it seems to most of us that we were all stark mad together. The chief obstacle to penitence is indeed the suspicion that none of the parties concerned was responsible for their actions. The utter futility and folly of modern war had often been demonstrated. Wars are waged, I suppose, for territory or for plunder or for trade. As for the first, nothing weakens a country more than unwilling subjects. As for indemnities, I have it on good authority that Bismarck declared that if he made another successful war, one of the terms of peace would be that Germany should pay a large indemnity to the losers. As for trade, if our most energetic competitor and our best customer happened to own the same head, it is not good business to cut that head off. And let any one estimate the value to us of the tropics and all the blacks who inhabit them, and compare the totals with what the war has cost us. A sane man does not pay ten thousand pounds a year in fire insurance for a haystack.

I cannot admit that to demonstrate the economic lunacy of war is to appeal to "low motives." That is sheer cant. National bankruptcy means widespread unemployment, starving children with pinched faces and legs like broomsticks; it means civil war and revolution; it means the relapse of civilization into barbarism, since it is the most highly educated classes—as we see everywhere in Europe —who are first ruined. That is what war means. Well, perhaps the business community will not again make the mistake of thinking that war can ever be good business. Even the press, I am told, has found that it is very bad business from its point of view.

But the liability to attacks of war fever is so great, and the irrationality of human beings so intractable, that we cannot rely only on appeals to common-sense. The moral appeal must come first, if for no other reason, because the war spirit makes a successful appeal to the idealist as well as to the self-regarding. As has been said, it was the moral effect of an obscure monk's self-sacrifice which brought the bloody games of the Coliseum to an end. And the emancipation of the slave was won not by proving that free labor would produce more sugar and more cotton than the cowhide lash, but by persuading public opinion that slavery as an institution involved horrors which were an outrage on humanity and an insult to God.

* A sermon preached in St. Paul's cathedral, London, at the International Peace Congress, July 26th, 1922.

The moral appeal just now must mainly take the form of penitence and the spirit of reconciliation. Europe has deep cause for penitence. Do we realize these two things: first, that the relations of civilized mankind had become so close that this war was at least as much a civil war as the chronic wars between the various cantons of ancient Greece; and, secondly, that after a century of growing humanity, a century which prided itself on having banished cruelty from the statute-book, and which even concerned itself in safeguarding the rights of the lower animals to decent treatment, the nations of Europe were no sooner locked in the death grapple than horrors and atrocities were committed which ten or a hundred or even two thousand years ago would have been thought incredible except in savage warfare?

GREEK RULES OF WAR

If this seems to you too strong, let me quote to you a few sentences from the Republic of Plato, in which Socrates lays down what seem to him to be reasonable and practicable rules for the conduct of war between Greek states. I have just said that the civilized world is quite as much bound together by common traditions and habits and convictions as were the Greek states, so that the comparison is a fair one. "Do you think it right," asks Socrates, "that Greeks should enslave Greeks, considering the danger that all Greece is in of barbarian conquest? Clearly no Greek should make a slave of another Greek. Then we must abstain from spoiling the dead or hindering their burial. Neither shall we offer up trophies in the temples of the gods, fearing that the offering of trophies taken from kinsmen may be a pollution. Again we shall not devastate the land of Greek enemies, nor burn their houses; it is only lawful to reap standing corn and take it for ourselves, without injuring the next harvest." This is pagan war morality, 2300 years ago. Think of this, you who have seen northeastern France! And now it is widely assumed that if there is another war, each side will try to exterminate the non-combatants of the other by poison! I cannot altogether account for this outbreak of diabolism; but while such things are done and justified, the less we talk about progress the better.

In part, no doubt, these horrors are the result of the elaborately engineered propaganda of hatred which all the belligerents employed, knowing that the average man needs some incitement to kill his fellow man. This is one of the most devilish parts of the whole business. The soldiers were told untrue stories of the outrages committed by the other side. Furious hatred and indignation were artificially stimulated. Even religion was freely dragged in. One side appealed to their "good old ally, God"; the other represented the war as "a struggle between Corsica and Calvary." Alas, the spirit of the Corsican was not hovering over one army only. So the minds of the belligerents were systematically poisoned by their own governments, and the deadly spirit of hatred thus generated has been slow to subside.

And then we think of the peace. The victors had to consider whether they wished to make an end of war, knowing, as we all know, that another war in our time would destroy our civilization utterly; or whether they wished to make a vindictive peace, which the losers would think themselves justified in tearing up at the first opportunity. If we wished the former, we ought to have offered the Germans terms which they themselves would have thought unexpectedly generous, and then to have said to them, "Now we have given you not excuse for plotting revenge; join us in establishing a league of nations and universal disarmament, and let us all help each other to 'gather up the fragments that remain.' " We say that the Germans showed no sign of repentance. Did we make it easy for them to repent? The human heart is like water; it freezes at a certain temperature, and melts under the influence of warmth. The Christian method is to overcome evil with good. It does not always succeed; but the opposite method, of driving out devils by Beelzebub, invariably fails.

So far as I can gather from those who have lately traveled in Germany, the Germans are rather less bitter and fierce than we should be if we had met with the same treatment. But I should not like to build upon this. I have no wish to talk politics. I merely point out the obvious fact that if one of a pair of gamblers has won and exacted full payment of a heavy stake, and then says, "Now we will play for love for the rest of the evening," his proposal is not likely to find favor with the loser. It is an appalling state of things; and what should our feelings be when we turn to our Bibles, to the visions of the prophets and the promise of the incarnation. "O that thou hadst hearkened to my law! then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea." The crowning title of the coming deliverer in Isaiah's prophecy was the Prince of Peace. "Of the increase of his government, and peace, there shall be no end." "Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." The happy vision seemed to be near its fulfillment in the angels' song: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill towards men." Alas! another passage in the gospels comes to our minds: "If thou hadst known, even thou, in this thy day, the things that belong to thy peace; but now they are hid from thine eyes."

THE GATE OF REPENTANCE

But, if it please God, it is not yet too late. The gate of repentance is not yet shut. We have all sinned and suffered together; we may all repent together. We may help to bear one another's burdens; not only by relieving the necessities of those who are suffering most grievously, but by bearing one another's moral burdens. But here a caution is needed. We English are a sentimental people; and some of us, in our reaction from the hatred fostered during the war, and our shame at having given way to the absurd idea that everyone who has the misfortune to be born between the Rhine and the Vistula has a double dose of original sin, have rushed to the opposite extreme, and speak as if the Germans were amiable and injured innocents. That will not do at all. They have at least as much to repent of as we have; indeed, I still think they have more; but we must help them to show their best selves by showing them our best selves. Justice, common-sense, and good will are the qualities which are needed, not sentimentality.

The spirit of civilization would say to us all, "Sirs, ye are brethren; why do ye wrong one to another?" We are brethren, we Europeans. If one member suffers, all the members suffer with it. We have discovered this to our great cost in the economic sphere; we must learn it also in the moral sphere. We cannot afford a humiliated, embittered, and degenerate Germany, any more than a triumphant militarist Germany. The harmony of the European symphony needs the best notes of all its members; and who, after all, are the typical Germans—Goethe, Schiller, Kant, Beethoven, or the Slavs, Nietzsche and Treitschke, and the Englishman, Houston Stewart Chamberlain?

"If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your father in heaven forgive your trespasses." "Repent, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshment shall come from the presence of the Lord."

Boycotting Benevolence

THE moral reaction of the best conscience of the nation to the efforts of the Pittsburgh Employers' association to boycott the local Y. W. C. A. seems to have had little effect on the headquarters' office of the Ohio Manufactureres' association, as may be seen from the verbatim copy of a bulletin sent out by the secretary under date of April 21, 1922. Secretary Jennings is, we believe, the same gentleman who sent out false and misleading statements regarding the personnel of the Interchurch committee appointeed to investigate steel. He was compelled to eat his words at that time but seems to still be possessed of the same inspiration.

"Money is power," said Judge Gary recently, a statement quite trite unless it is given special significance. Its special significance. however, seems to be that men who possess it can use it quite ruthlessly. Justice, right, humanity, and law itself can be thrust under foot by its use, but a much more insidious use, which is defensible in worldly logic, is to put the life and usefulness of religious, educational and welfare organizations under its power.

The letter here reproduced, like many of the publications coming from the state office of the Ohio Manufacturers' association, takes in a rather broad sweep. It betrays such disregard for either truth or the proprieties that one wonders why there is not a rebuke from many of the large minded men who are in the association. If there was not something in the temper of the organization that finds satisfaction in such reactionary utterances, they would not be so revealed to the public. We challenge any sensible man to call them less incendiary or farther from the constructive truth than the radicalism of Wm. Z. Foster at the other end of the line. Here is a verbatim reproduction of the bulletin:

"ARE YOU CONTRIBUTING TO THESE ORGANIZATIONS?"

"On March 20th a meeting of the so-called 'Ohio Council of Women and Children in Industry' was held in the office of the Ohio Institute for Public Efficiency. In addition to the council of the 'delegates' to the meeting represented the following organizations:

Ohio Institute for Public Efficiency
The Young Women's Christian Association
The National Consumers' Leagues
The Women's Christian Temperance Union
The Vocation Bureau of Cincinnati
The Ohio State University
The Urban League of Columbus
Ohio Council for Family Social Work, Columbus
The Welfare Federation, Cleveland
The Temple Sisterhood, Columbus
The Women's Trade Union League, Chicago
Industrial Health Conservancy Laboratories, Cincinnati

"These organizations have all adopted the program of the American Society for Labor Legislation (also supported by manufacturers' contributions) and this program includes the short (and shorter) work day with the 8 hour day as the maximum in all employment, minimum wage (with commission administration and enforcement), old age pensions, unemployment compensation or insurance, one day's rest in seven, no night work for women, etc., and the establishment of the employers' responsibility for living and housing conditions.

SOCIAL WORKERS AS "PAID PROPAGANDISTS"

"No laboring women and no real representatives of working women were in attendance at the meeting. All were paid propagandists or volunteer enthusiasts looking for a place in the sun of publicity. It was officially reported to the meeting that the first and chief effort was to put through the minimum wage law in Ohio. This law has not worked well in any state or in any country and it has been established as impractical in operation. When labor is in heavy demand no one pays attention to the minimum wage—restriction results in women losing their employment—the shops closing or replacing them with men—or, as often happens—in levelling wages from the top and making the minimum the maximum, thus penalizing the efficient to reward the inefficient.

"We are to have this fight again. It will affect the interest of every employer. If it is established as a principle of law that wages may be legally established which bear no relation to earnings, the principles will be applied to all employments, not alone to that of women and minors. It will seriously affect the interests of women workers. So many restrictions are being thrown about their employment as to make it unwise to hire them where men can be obtained or machines devised.

"The heading over this notice is pertinent. The organizations which are doing this work are largely supported but not directed by you. The Y. W. C. A., which was a most worthy and useful body as originally conceived, is now—at least in the industrial centers—a hot bed for socialistic propaganda and legislative experimentation. Its local bodies are often officered by the wives, sisters and daughters of manufacturers and business men who have never sought to present the economic side of social problems to their women folks. The libraries and the reading courses and reference works are largely made up of socialistic works and the officers will give no bearings to books or speakers on the other side.

"The woman worker who has experience and who won promotion in industry is not in sympathy with these movements and is therefore excluded from the councils of such organizations. What are you going to do about it? Meetings under the auspices of the Y. W. C. A. are going on in every county and candidates for the legislature are being interviewed and pledged. You are making the campaign possible. I have no right to do more than tell you the facts, but I am going to venture to suggest that unless you approve all these schemes to load industry with the maintenance in 'decent living conditions,' the standard being established by the beneficiaries, of all the inefficient, the lazy, the thriftless and the maimed or defective, you might stipulate the purposes for which your contributions to these organizations may be used and expressly provide that no part of it shall be used to promote the passage of legislation or to carry on propaganda for the social service labor program adopted by these organizations.

"It might be added, merely as significant, that Mr. Thomas J. Donnelly, secretary of the Ohio Federation of Labor, was elected at this meeting as a member of the executive committee of the 'Council of Women and Children in Industry.'"

Yellow Reaction

If the radical is a "red" this sort of reactionary utterance is yellow. Look at a few of the phrases—"no real representatives of the working women were in attendance;" "all were paid propagandists or volunteer enthusiasts looking for a place in the sun of publicity;" "the law (for a minimum wage) has not worked well in any state or any country;" the Y. W. C. A. "is now—at least in industrial centers—a hot bed for socialistic propaganda." So much for the public spirited citizens who manage such institutions as the Y. W. C. A., the W. C. T. U., Ohio university, the National Consumers league, the Cleveland Welfare federation and all the others.

Mr. Jennings takes a leaf from the experience of the secretary of the Pittsburg Employers association and says, "I have no right to do more than to tell you the facts," but "I am going to venture to suggest" that unless the manufacturers of Ohio wish to "load the industry with the maintenance . . . in decent living conditions "of all the inefficient, the lazy, the thriftless and the maimed or defective" they might "stipulate" the purposes for which their contributions are to be used. Of course "stipulation" means, in diplomatic phrase, when taken with the rest of the advice, that it will be wise not to contribute at all; but there is no legal boycott in the advice.

Of course any man has a right to stipulate his contribution. But to hand out such yellow bunk as is given for advice in the phrase above quoted, and in many others, does not argue well for the men who pay to have it given them. No minimum wage law compels the employment of the unfortunates above named. Perhaps the Ohio Manufacturers like this sort of thing—we doubt it—but the more of it the public hears the better will welfare legislation progress.

British Table Talk

London, July 31, 1922.

ALONG with more than 300 others, I was present at the lunch given by Sir Murray Hyslop to free churchmen to meet the premier. It was a pleasant function, but of course the one thing which mattered was the speech of Mr. Lloyd George. Conjectures had been thrown out in some journals that there was a political plot in the luncheon; we who went were the flies drawn into the arch-spider's web. There were no signs of such an intrigue in the premier's words. It was true that he had not given up several hours of his busy day without a purpose of some importance. His concern proved to be one which did not touch party politics. He clearly had it on his heart to call the free churches to fight against war, in an hour when this had become the one living issue. His words seemed to me more solemn even than eloquent. I have not heard Mr. Lloyd George speak for at least fourteen years, so that I am unable to compare his speaking today with that of recent days, but he struck me as a man who had seriously made up his mind to devote the rest of his life to the cause of peace. If so, he will find many who will rally to his standard.

The Old Dugouts

In one passage in his speech the premier chaffed the warriors who dig themselves into the dugouts of deserted battlefields. The battle may be raging miles away, but they are faithful to the old dugouts, and they accuse others of deserting the cause because they move where the battle goes. As for himself, the prime minister declares, he wanted to be wherever the battle was raging at the moment. This meant, interpreted into practical politics, that the free churches ought to awake to the fact that the battle of the hour in the public life of the world was the fight for peace. There were many adversaries, many were busy strewing the world with explosives. It was necessary to put under lock and key those who spread explosives, and particularly those who drop matches. One thing is clear to all who feel the call to fight for international peace. It will be a fight in no idle use of the word. If we are to have peace, we must seek and pursue it. And the great gain of such an ally as the premier is to be found in the fact that he is on every man's testimony a good fighting man, and such a man is needed for this cause in this hour.

The Student Christian Movement

From one who was present at the Student Christian Movement conference last week I have heard reports of the same old miracle repeated—of good fellowship, and bold thinking, and of high and noble purposes formed. One meeting was of peculiar interest. Representatives of nine nations brought news of the student movement in their lands. Germany, Austria, France, China, and India were among these countries. The Austrian told of the "youth" movement in his country. The Chinese student explained how some things the Christian movement and the anti-Christian shared; the anti's were opposed to Christianity because they did not understand it but identified it with superstition. The German described the life that was manifest in the movement within his country and closed with the cry "Forward!" To look at the program of the conference is a study in real catholicism. Almost all shades of Christian thought were represented. There were even Roman Catholics present, though Roman officials could not take part. Anglican Catholics were there with Evangelicals, Methodists with Friends. Every school of learning, medicine, science, arts, theology, had provision made for it on the program. Among the speakers were the Bishop of Ipswich, Dr. Crichton Miller, Dr. A. H. Gray, and others who have the ear of youth; but none is more beloved than Canon Streeter, whose ability with limericks is as notable as his theological learning. The Student Christian movement is one for which we are more and more grateful and, unlike some movements, it moves.

A Great Story

A memorial has recently been dedicated to the memory of Principal T. C. Edwards of Aberystwyth. At the ceremony Mr. Lloyd George recalls this story which deserves to be widely known: "After Thomas Charles Edwards had made great efforts, after he had built up the college and got a good many students, there came the great fire, and there was what would have been the end of the hopes of an ordinary man. But he was not an ordinary man. On the night the college was burnt he was either preaching or lecturing at Newquay. He had gone to bed, and in the middle of the night they saw the glare over Cardigan Bay, and somebody said, 'The college is on fire.' He replied, 'Order a car for me.' They said, 'You had better wait until morning; you can do nothing now.' 'Order a car,' he repeated; 'I am going back to start rebuilding the college.' "

England Awakens to Importance of Young China

An interesting quotation from a recent issue of the London Times is given here: "China today is run, so far as all public offices are concerned, by the younger men who have acquired foreign education, either at home or abroad. Their numbers, in proportion to the total population, are infinitesimal, but in fact it is this comparative few, acting as the clerical and advisory staff of the old-fashioned mandarins and ignorant military rulers, who are exercising incalculable influence in political, social, and economic development. In this small but highly important class, British-trained young men are conspicuous by their scarcity. If it were not for those educated in British missionary schools in China, many of whom occupy good positions, British culture and standards would be almost unknown to the younger generation in China.

"The British chambers of commerce in China have become active on their own account, and have collected over 20,000 pounds for promoting the education of Chinese on British lines. After a great deal of discussion it has been decided to spend the money over a period of five years in making donations to several highly deserving British missionary secondary schools, for the specified purpose of strengthening the British teaching staffs, thus securing a better standard of teaching in these schools, and providing for a larger number of scholars. The chambers hope to obtain more funds when times improve, when the question of scholarships for the Hong-kong University, a British institution for Chinese, and for universities at home will come up for consideration."

CORRESPONDENCE

The Strike from the Union Point of View

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: All that stands in the way of "normalcy" we are led to believe, is the downright obstinacy and hoggishness of the railroad men who refuse to work at the rates the operators would like to pay, thereby making it necessary to saddle excessive rates onto the overburdened public. Moreover, these men, with whom this paper is concerned, have refused to comply with the orders of the Railroad Labor board and are, therefore, branded as outlaws and their organization presumably disqualified. You know the story. But what of the railroad man's point of view? Wherein does he justify himself, and how long will he override the wave of public condemnation now surging upon him? As to the latter question, time will tell. The former deserves consideration.

Claiming imminent bankruptcy the railroads secured an order from the Railroad Labor board reducing the wages of the entire railroad forces of the country, approximately twelve per cent. effective July 1st, 1921. This was accepted as a necessary part of the procedure for the reduction of rates to the public. Evidently this was not the plan of the railroads, for no reductions were made until January 1st, 1922, and then only on carload rates of a few agricultural products, chiefly grain, hay and live stock. Effective February 1st. 1922, by order of the Railroad Laboi board, the entire clerical forces of the railroads, including freight handlers, warehousemen, baggagemen, cashiers and clerks of all kinds, were made subject to intermittent assignments whereby they might be required to work over a period of twelve hours. putting in only eight hours actual time and receiving eight hours pay. This served to reduce forces and overtime in no small degree, besides working a rank injustice on this class of employes.

Then came the order reducing the wages of the maintenance of way forces, machinists, linemen, car repairers and clerical forces, three to six cents per hour, effective July 1st, 1922. This would reduce the pay of the section men of the better paid roads to thirty-five cents per hour. eight hours a day, six days a week, the carriers claiming this to be the average wage of laborers doing a similar class of work in other industries. On some roads it is reported as even lower, accordingly as they were paid prior to the wage increase. Consequently the machinist forces went on strike July 1st, and the maintenance of way forces would have gone out, too, but for the unexpected action of their president, Mr. Grable, who seemed to have developed more concern for authority than for the welfare of the men he represented. It is doubtful if he can exercise control over them much longer. Since July 1st the stationary firemen and linemen have walked out.

Incidentally, about the middle of June, 1922, there appeared in the Chicago Tribune a half column article saying that in 1921, the year when the roads were portrayed as so nearly bankrupt and the twelve per cent cut had been accepted, the Burlington had had the best year since 1917. Compared with 1920, despite a loss of revenue of eight per cent, they had reduced operating expenses about twenty-one per cent.

What is the present reaction from this situation? A prominent question is whether or not we will obey the orders of the Labor board as the voice of the law. It seems safe to predict we will not. Within the past few months the Pennsylvania railroad served an injunction on the Labor board defying certain of its rulings as to the contracting of repair work. They were sustained by Judge Page of Chicago, who declared the functions of the board advisory only. As unincorporated unions we cannot serve injunctions, though we are liable to be sued for the misconduct of any of our members, according to a recent decision by our chief justice. So far, the unions have taken the board's orders as final, but it is doubtful if the president's admonition to Mr. Grable that hereafter the board's rulings must be obeyed as law by both carriers and unions will be taken seriously. On what basis, then, can a settlement be effected? The attitude of the unions will be influenced by the following facts:

The unions not now involved know that with this present contention settled in favor of the carriers, our turn for another cut will soon follow. We interpret the motives of the carriers in cutting wages as selfish and unwarranted under present conditions. We have acute sympathy for our fellow employes who would be forced to work for less than seventy-five dollars per month, with the added disadvantage of being subject to dismissal if they take up outside work to help themselves along. Our overtures towards parley have been rejected. We see no satisfaction in conferences for "adjustments" since those adjustments are not intended for the benefit of the employes. We hold that the financial returns to the carrier should be secondary to the welfare of the employes, who carry out the work of production. We feel that the findings of the Labor board are influenced by the carriers. We claim that the income of an employe with a family should not be under one hundred dollars per month; that under proper management they need not be less. The introduction of scab labor under the protection of machine guns signifies a showdown rather than a compromise. The continuation of such a policy will likely see us all out in a short time. From present indications it seems inevitable sooner or later. But this much is certain, if it comes to a showdown it will be a real one. The men are not awed by the idea of a general walkout nor intimidated by militia. Our organizations which have been built up at tremendous cost because of uncompromising railroad officials may be expected to hold together. Training for Vocalization

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your notice in a recent issue of "A Theatre School To Teach Preachers" how to use their voices to the best advantage moves me to "enlarge" a little upon the theme. It goes without saying that the effective instrument in public address is the voice. Of what force is a good sermon to the hearer if in its delivery it is marred by muffled and monotonous tones or violent and unintelligible vociferations? A common fault with the voices of preachers is the lack of carrying quality. Theodore Cuyler called it "projectile force." It should be the aim of the preacher to make himself heard and understood by the man in the farthest pew. In order to do this he does not need to vociferate. He will defeat his purpose if he waxes loud and vehement. Let him heed Wesley's admonition who wrote one of his preachers: "Sammy, don't scream." He should learn to breathe deeply and naturally. Chauncey DePew says: "The principal thing about oratory is to use your diaphragm instead of your throat. "Let him give all vowels their full value, and keep his voice up in clear, smooth accents to the end of every sentence.

Years ago I paid seventy-five cents for a little book, "Before An Audience." It contained the few, simple rules of a natural and effective elocution. One of them especially was worth to me hundreds of dollars in gold. It was simply this: "Cultivate an ear for your own voice." It had never occurred to me to listen to my own voice. Like many another earnest brother, I religiously thought it all-important to "lose" myself in my subject with little thought of voice or gesture. But the suggestion haunted me, and even in the heat of public address I found myself turning an ear to my own voice, which I was able to do for an instant or more without interrupting the continuity of my thought. I discovered that I not infrequently dropped into dull monotone and sometimes rose to tones harsh and strident. An ear for one's own voice will enable him to hear himself as "ithers" hear him, and so to avoid the vocal faults by which many an excellent sermon is all but spoiled.

The test of a good delivery is easy. Russell Conwell illustrates the difference between an "artificial" elocution and real oratory when he says: "Call a dog, and if he runs away from you—that is elocution. If he comes to you—that is oratory." My humble opinion is that there is a large place for schools "to teach preachers how to use their voices to the best advantage."

Nehemiah—the Business-man Type*

A WORD of appreciation is due our business men, who in these days enter the church life with so much power. Nehemiah was not an orator, not a keen thinker, not a dreamer, not a poet, not a philosopher. He did not talk overmuch, he did not see visions, he did not interpret the finer things in nature by means of music, art or poetry; he wrote no book, settling the great questions of the universe. He was a business man, a leader and master of men, he knew how to get the work out of a set of fellows; he was a hard-headed practical man, with a talent for organization; he knew how to build a wall, he knew how to handle critics so as to put the fear-of-God into them. He had an iron nerve and a steady purpose. He could fight and hit hard. He could pray, work and fight. He could watch as well as pray. He had stores of energy, his eye was not always on the clock and the dinner-bucket. He was not afraid to put his good money into an enterprise and to get others to do the same. I sing his praises. I know men like him. They are capital men. I dedicate this hour and this lesson to the business men who compose our classes, who form our church boards, who build our churches, who finance our missionaries, who make money for Christ's sake, who give to the poor, who pour their fine American energies into the church of the Living God. I am not only for men, I am for business men. Nehemiah belongs to them. This morning we think about them.

Business ability is highly esteemed in America. We glory in the way our engineers went to France and built piers, warehouses, bridges, railroads, and set up our smooth-running United States way of doing things. We are masters of organization. Why should not the church capitalize this marvelous power? Just now we are "fed-up" on drives and campaigns. We say that the Interchurch Movement went to pieces on the rock of organization, which is only a half-truth. The whole story of that partial failure has not yet been told. On the other hand there is no end of churches under-organized. One big business man could step in and set up a system that would cause the plant to produce ten to twenty times the results. He might begin by putting the preacher on a schedule, telling him to hustle out and play eighteen holes of golf and then get right on the job, studying, with a clear brain, some book worthy of his metal, telling him to start out at two, in his machine, and clean up ten calls before he dared to think of dinner. Certainly he would revolutionize the financial policy. I know what I am talking about here. I know well big business men who develop the financial capacities of the church and bless the people by inducing them to give generously. Only this morning I had a letter from such a man, urging me to call upon a certain person and talk plainly about the joy—the "joy" mind you—of generous giving. When a man spends thirty-three cents to go to a movie and then puts a quarter in an envelope on Sunday, he does not know the A B C of giving; he is still in the kindergarten of finance. When a woman spends two dollars to go to a show and cannot make any pledge to the church at all—what she needs is religion, not recreation! The church needs prayer and Nehemiah could pray, but we need prayer plus action. We are tired of pious tight-wads, disgusted with talkative do-nothings. Organization, filled with spiritual power, should be taken over by the church in full measure.

Nehemiah, as a type of business man, knew how to handle adverse criticism. There were those nuisances Sanballat and Tobiah, envious faultfinders. They stood off and laughed at the wall, their miserable envious hearts being consumed by Nehemiah's success, in organizing walls out of rubbish and ashes. How does a business man meet such opposition? By steaming ahead with more power. He does not come down from his wall, he gets more trowels and more swords. "Tend to business, get this wall built, say nothing in reply, but if one of these fellows bothers you by getting in your way, kill him!" Sanballat and Tobiah caught the point; they went far away and sat down. The wall grew and the critics faded away. Increase your volume of business, that will shut your critics' mouths. The annual report tells the story. Every knock is a boost. Your critics only advertise you if you can hold steady and produce. Prayer, we want that, we have spoken of that, we believe in that with all our hearts, but we also want action, we want the wall built, stone upon stone, day in and day out. Business will do that.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Hold Mome Missions Council at Chautauqua

The mother chautauqua in New York loses none of its popularity through the years. It has never lost sight of the original religious motive, and has not subordinated educational interest for vaudeville as have assemblies in the west. The Council of Women for Home Missions is holding an institute there during August with Mrs. John Ferguson as chairman. The mission study book, "The Trend of the Races" will be taught. Among those who will appear on the platform during the sessions are: Dr. Thomas A. Fenton, Dr. C. F. Schaeffer, Dr. George E. Haynes, Dr. S. G. Inman and others. Dr. George L. Cady gave an illustrated lecture on "California and the Japanese."

Large Student Body Hears Great Preaching

The largest summer attendance in its history is enrolled these days at the University of Chicago. The total attendance is 5,601, of whom all but 1,347 are graduate or professional students. The attendance at the divinity school is 219. For this great student body, some great preachers have been provided. Professor Theodore Gerald Soares, head of the department of practical theology at the University of Chicago, was the university preacher on July 23, and Professor Allan Hoben, of Carleton college, Minn., on July 30. The first preacher in August was Professor Henry Burke Robins, of Rochester Theological Seminary, and he will be followed in the same month by Rev. James Francis, of the First Baptist church, Los Angeles, Professor Gerald Birney Smith, of the University of Chicago divinity school, and Rev. Lathan A. Crandall, of the Hyde Park Baptist church, Chicago, who will be the convocation preacher on August 27.

International Conference of Churches

One of the most noteworthy religious gatherings of the summer was the International Conference of Churches, held the first week in August at Copenhagen, at which some of the greatest Christian leaders of the age were in attendance. Prof. William I. Hull, of Swarthmore College and a Quaker, in addressing the conference said: "The tar of the big stick of militarism clings to us all; and we are nearly all afraid of one another. Thus we are imprisoned in the vicious circle, transfixed by the same electric current. Modern industry demands raw materials of production and markets for finished products; other nations are acquiring these by force or fraud; we must do likewise for necessity knows no law. Our neighbors are maintaining large armies; we must do likewise, for self-defense is the first duty of statesmanship. It is time for someone to break through this vicious circle. Men fought the world war for this purpose. It was to be a war to end war, and preparations for war and to the armed peace which breeds war; it was to make the world safe for democracy and rid of imperialism. It failed tragically to do these things. Some more effective, as well as more righteous method must be tried."

W. C. Pearce Journeys Around World

Mr. W. C. Pearce, associate secretary of the World's Sunday School association, reached Manila on August 1 after a hot journey across the equator from Australia and New Zealand. From Manila he will go to China and Japan. Owing to a change in his sailing arrangements Mr. Pearce remained in Australia longer than he had planned and his time was well spent in addressing meetings in every state of the country. As a result of this visit the Australian states will form a section of the World's Sunday School association. Perhaps no other Christian organization is so truly catholic in its fellowship these days as is the organization of which Mr. Pearce is secretary. The whole world is to be united in its religious interest through a common program of religious education.

Will Ask for Local Conferences

The joint commission on the World Conference on Faith and Order has given to the press the report which will be submitted to the general convention of the Protestant Episcopal church at Portland next month. The Episcopalian leaders are urged to hold local conferences, and in this connection is the following statement: "The churches, and especially this church as the originator of the movement, must be thoroughly trained in the conference method in order that their delegates may not only give to the conference their personal experience in that method but be supported by the whole strength of their respective churches. Otherwise there is danger that at the World Conference there will be much repetition of high-sounding and meaningless platitudes, or hasty and dogmatic assertions provoking, inevitably, hasty and sectarian contradictions, and then the last state of a divided Christendom may be worse than the first."

Use Fine Old Dwelling for Community Work

One of the fine old mansions of Galveston, Tex., will be used for community work by Central Christian church of which Rev. A. E. Ewell is pastor. A large church auditorium will be erected near the community building, and a modern church program will be inaugurated. A local paper describes the plan in the following words: "All Sunday school classes are to be housed in the residence structure. In addition it will contain the church kitchen, a large dining room and other institutional features of the modern church. But there is room to spare even after these things have been provided for in the most generous fashion. The house has thirty rooms, some of them large

Young Friends Meet in Conference

YOUNG Friends from all parts of the United States, one from China, one from Canada, and one from Cuba, 316 in all, gathered for their thirteenth general conference at Richmond, Ind., during the latter part of July to consider their problems of service and leadership. Prof. Alexander C. Purdy, of Earlham college, delivered the open lecture of the conference on "The Amateur Spirit," characterizing the spirit of the conference as that of the amateur who threw himself into his work to create and to reach new goals.

Other speakers on the program were Dr. Miles H. Krumbine, pastor of the First Lutheran church of Dayton, O., who discussed the field of Christian leadership; Rev. Kirby Page, secretary of the Fellowship for a Christian Social Order, who lectured on the need for Christ in the business world; Murray S. Kenworthy, recently returned from a year in Russia as head of the American Friends relief work, and Frederick Libby, executive secretary of the National Council for the Reduction of Armaments, who spoke on disarmament and the way toward a world peace.

Ten classes, a series of small groups for morning worship and two special evening classes for the boys and girls, made up the class program. Largest of these was the class on training for leadership in the world peace movement conducted by Mr. Libby, but another popular one was the course in Bible history given by Dr. Edward E. Nourse, professor in the Hartford Theological seminary, on the spiritual interpretation of the old and new testaments in the light of their historic backgrounds. Other classes included Friends' missions, Quaker history, the teacher, the Sunday school, personal evangelism, and young people and the church, as well as two large discussion groups on the problems of the boys and girls. Dr. W. O. Mendenhall, president of Friends' university, Wichita, Kans., conducted a short study period each morning on the relation of good will to life, particularly in the business and political world. The part that music plays in religious life was brought out through group singing without accompaniment at the meetings, organized sings in the evening, and through special programs. Stunts and games furnished relaxation for the delegates.

enough almost to contain a modest bungalow. Here is where Rev. Mr. Ewell intends that the property shall begin to serve the whole community, rather than simply the congregation. In the institutional features of his plan, Rev. Mr. Ewell derived much encouragement from the success he has met with in the organization and handling of the Galveston men's Bible class—a strictly nondenominational organization, which meets downtown every Sunday morning for Bible instruction. The congregation is to receive $25,000 in aid from the church extension or mission fund. It is intended to make an appeal to the community at large for $25,000. In view of the community uses to which the building is to be put, this appeal will be nondenominational."

Swedish and English Churchmen Propose Intercommunion

The Lambeth conference provided a method by which the English church might come to recognize the ministry of other churches. The Lutheran church in Sweden has always had the apostolic succession of bishops, though setting no store by this idea. The English church proposes intercommunion between the two bodies, and that in the future each should help the other communion in the ordination of bishops. The Swedish church agrees, but feels in conscience bound to declare its lack of interest in apostolic succession. Archbishop Soderblom of Sweden is being criticized by American Lutherans for his willingness to entertain the proposal of union, for it is pointed out that the American Lutheran churches have no bishops at all. If the Swedish Lutheran church opens up communion with the English church, must it deny fellowship to the non-episcopal churches of the Lutheran faith in America? The following is an official statement of the attitude of the Swedish church toward the question of orders: "No particular organization of the church and of its ministry is instituted jure divino, not even the order and discipline and state of things recorded in the New Testament, because the holy scriptures, the norma normans of the faith of the church, are no law, but vindicate for the new covenant the great principle of Christian freedom, unweariedly asserted by St. Paul against every form of legal religion, and applied with fresh strength and clearness by Luther, but instituted by our Saviour himself, as for instance when, in taking farewell of his disciples, he did not regulate their future work by a priori rules and institutions, but directed them to the guidance of the paraclete, the Holy Ghost."

German Young People Organized for Christian Work

The young people of Germany have organized in many cities to fight the evils of the day. The movie films that have gone to Germany have been particularly evil, and an organization of 23,000 young people has come into being for the primary purpose of cleaning up the movies. This movement began in Dresden and later spread to Schlesein, Thuringen and other provinces. They have also fought the dealers in vulgar picture cards, visiting establishments as often as five hundred times in a single week to protest against the sale of these iniquities. Recently a number of societies have come together to form the National Evangelical Organization of German Young Men. This now has 125,317 members. The German Christian Students' union with headquarters in Berlin is another significant sign of the times. It has 1,269 members and 1,623 patrons. The young women of Germany are also organized and these have a society with a quarter of a million members united in the Evangelical Union of German Young Women. The battle-ground of the Christian and non-Christian elements in modern society is in Germany, and it is interesting to see that such progress has been made since the war in marshalling the Christian forces. The church has been disestablished, but this disestablishment seems to have resulted in an increase in genuine religious work.

Modern Church Program at Springfield, Mass.

The combination of South Congregational church with Olivet church in Springfield, Mass., has resulted in the inauguration of a community program in the latter church, of which James Gordon Gilkey is pastor. Where there was formerly a struggling conventional church, there is now an active center of good-will. During the past season the total attendance at all meetings at Olivet church has been 83,431. One of the big items in the program is the concern for public health. A graduate nurse is maintained in the parish. This person holds pre-natal clinics, baby-welfare conferences, and corrective clinics for crippled children. Hot lunches are served to school children at a nominal cost. During the past year 7,462 children were led in this way. In the community house two motion picture machines have been installed. Four entertainments are given each week during the school year. A radio outfit is now a part of the church equipment and furnishes the music for the Sunday evening services which are held in the church. A 25-minute film has been made of the activities of this live community church, and is available for the use of other churches.

Ghandi Thinks Christians Do Not Practice Their Religion

Ghandi, the foremost citizen of India these days, was asked recently for his opinion of Christianity. His appreciation of the religion of Jesus is much higher than of the religion of Jesus' followers. He said: "All you missionaries and Indian Christians should begin to live as Jesus did; you should all practice your religion without adulterating it or toning it down; you should emphasize the love side of Christianity more, for love is central in your religion; you should study non-Christian religions more sympathetically in order to find the truth that is in them; and then a more sympathetic approach to the people would be possible."

Meadville House a Successful Experiment

Meadville Theological seminary in Pennsylvania has a great endowment and but few students. This has been charged to its Unitarian teaching, which does not attract divinity students in large numbers, but to greater extent it has probably been due to the isolation of the school. There are legal complications about removing the institution entirely from Pennsylvania but a year ago Meadville House was established at the University of Chicago, exchanging

Disciples Consider Relocation of College

ONE of the issues that will provoke discussion at the coming international convention of the Disciples of Christ at Winona Lake will be the relocation of the College of Missions. The United Christian Missionary society has issued a bulletin setting forth the various alternatives with the advantages in connection with each location. In this bulletin may be found the following summarization: "It is interesting to know how many educational centers of the country have given earnest invitation to the College of Missions to locate with them and take advantage of their educational opportunities. The college itself has never made any overture to any institution in connection with the possibility of a new location. Educational institutions throughout the United States have come to realize that the field of missionary preparation is an important one and they have recognized both the work of our College of Missions and the faculty leadership which made it possible. Urgent invitations have come from the following centers: New York City, Yale University, Hartford Theological Seminary, the University of Chicago, Northwestern University, the University of Michigan, Kansas University, the University of Illinois, Oberlin College and Seminary, Alabama State University, Vanderbilt University. No formal invitation has come from any of our own colleges with the exception of Butler, probably for the reason that the College of Missions is a school accepting for entrance graduate or advanced students and our own colleges have not felt that they could offer the opportunities for training which it requires. In thinking of the possible re-location of the College of Missions, a number of centers have been eliminated from the very nature of the case. The state universities could not be considered because they do not offer the courses which are needed for the graduate training of missionaries. The following centers offer the facilities which the College of Missions need: New York, Yale, Hartford, and Chicago."

New Books on

Christ in Today's Life

In the amazingly puzzling times in which men find themselves today, there is no fact of greater significance, or more hope-radiating, than that thoughtful men are turning for guidance to the great Teacher and Master. New book catalogs bristle with striking titles which point to Him who alone can lead men out of darkness into light. The Christian Century Press has selected the following as really great books. All of them endeavor to see Jesus, not merely as a hero of the first century, but as the true leader for men and nations in this twentieth century.

Jesus and Life

By Joseph F. McFadyen, D.D.

A fresh and searching interpretation of the Gospel of Jesus in its social implications. The author, who is professor of New Testament in Queen's University, Kingston, Canada, says in his preface: "We are realizing as never before that the christianizing of men, of all men, in their relations is not so much a matter of interest to the church as a matter of life and death for the world." ($2.00).

The Guidance of Jesus for Today

By Cecil John Cadoux, D.D.

This book is an account of the teaching of Jesus from the standpoint of modern personal and social need. Says Canon James Adderley: "It recalls by a shock to the bewildering problem of applied Christianity and makes us once more suitably uncomfortable. I want everybody to read it." ($2.00).

The Open Light

By Nathaniel Micklem, M.A.

This interpretation of Christianity by one of England's younger Christian thinkers takes its title from William Morris's lines, "Looking up, at last we see the glimmer of the open light, from o'er the place where we would be." The author says: "I hope this book may help to make Christianity appear more reasonable and more beautiful." ($2.00).

Christianity and Christ

By William Scott Palmer.

"Twelve years ago," says Dr. Palmer in his introductory note, "I was profoundly influenced by the critical examination of Christian documents and of Christian origins, by science generally and by the new movement in philosophy. I felt impelled to revise my religious beliefs. It was a kind of stock-taking, and took the form of a diary, now long out of print. Many trials have come upon the Christian religion and the church since then. It seems to be time for a new stock-takng on my part; and I propose to write a new diary and in it ask my new questions and find, perhaps, new answers." Dr. Palmer is author of "Where Science and Religion Meet." ($2.00).

Studies in the Inner Life of Jesus

By Principal A. E. Garvie, D.D.

This is not a new book, but a new edition of a very great book by the noted head of New College, London. The Congregationalist says of the book: "Its chief value is in its emphatic insistence upon the genuineness of the human experience of Jesus, coupled with the constant acceptance of the uniqueness of his nature as the only-begotten and well-loved Son of God." ($3.00).

courses with the Divinity school. The house has quarters for eighteen men, some of whom do liberal arts work, but already it has been shown that such an institution can be made to function serviceably in interesting young men in entering the Christian ministry. The Channing club connected with the House has held thirty-eight meetings during the year with an attendance of between fifty and sixty and community forum lectures have been held on Sunday afternoons. The house not only gathers together prospective Unitarian religious workers, but is a kind of club house for Unitarians at the university.

Weekly Church Page a Feature in Many Cities

The page of church news in the Saturday or Sunday edition of secular papers is becoming a feature in many cities. In the west the church does not bulk as large in the community life, but nevertheless the editors are progressive in taking on new features. In Denver the Rocky Mountain News now prints a page of church news each week, and at the top of the page in bold type is a verse of scripture which is selected by some local minister.

Only Ten Per Cent Indifferent to the Churches

The recent year book of the churches, published by the Federal Council of Churches, has some important new statistics. For instance the report circulated for a time that the Baptists led the Methodists of this country in membership has been corrected by revised figures from the Colored Methodists. By the latest figures there are 83,307 more Methodists in the country than Baptists. The statisticians have arrived at a basis for computing Protestant "constituency" as contrasted with membership. It is held that the constituency is 2.8 times the communicant membership. On this basis the Protestant constituency of the country is 75,099,499 as compared with the Catholic constituency which is 17,885,646. The Latter Day Saints are credited with 587,918, a radical revision of figures. The Jewish religious constituency is 1,600,000 and the Eastern Orthodox 411,054. This leaves only ten per cent of the population totally indifferent to religion either in the matter of financial support, Sunday school attendance, or other form of interest.

Southern Churches Erect Imposing Buildings

After the stagnation of the war period, the churches are once more engaged in the task of erecting modern edifices to house the labors of religious congregations. In the south particularly there is great activity in this line. The Manufacturer's Record of Baltimore, Md., lists 361 ecclesiastical structures in process of erection. The most expensive of these is First Methodist church of South Dallas, Tex., which is to cost $850,000, and the next is First Baptist church of Shreveport, La., which will cost $500,000. The Catholics are also building in the south, though they are not so strong there as in the north. The Church of the Sisters of the Divine cost $300,000.

The 20th Century Quarterly

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK
Editor

A Non-denominational study of the International Uniform Lessons for adult and young people's classes of twentieth century leanings.

THE remarkable success of this quarterly has proved that it is possible to interest deeply large groups of young and older people in straight-away Bible study. The international uniform lessons are used as the basis for this study, but the conductors of the various departments have so inspired their lesson treatments with the life and thought of today that the Old and New Testament prophets and preachers seem to have abandoned the more or less musty pulpits to which they have been bound by an obscurantist "scholarship" so-called, and to have stepped right down into the marts and streets of these twentieth century days. John R. Ewers, of Pittsburgh, knows his Bible, — and knows, too, the spirit of modern life; and all of the other contributors — Herbert L. Willett, Jr., with his oriental sidelights; W. D. Ryan, with his instructive lesson introductions; Prof. W. C. Morro, with his brilliant "Forum" questions — are particularly alert to-day's problems and needs; and, finally, Ernest Bourner Allen, with his weekly "prayer thought," infuses the whole discussion with the spirit of devotion.

When you see this little booklet, you will say it is the handiest and most attractive quarterly you have ever seen — but you will say also, after you have looked into it, that it contains the most effective treatment of the international lessons which has ever been put between covers.

A Suggestion: Send for 10 free sample copies of the Quarterly for the use of some of your leaders during the balance of the current quarter, then mail us an order for 50, or 100, or 400 copies for your adult and young people's classes during the Autumn quarter.

EDITORIAL

The Debts of Europe and the Disarmament Program

THE American press has been of two minds regarding the proposal that the creditor nations shall forego the collection of the debts piled up during the war, and allow the various parts of the world to regain their normal economic status. Of course there is the nationalistic, jingo type of journal that insists loudly that the loans we made to the allied nations are just and honorable debts, and ought to be paid. On the other hand, it is increasingly clear to those of fair and open mind that the rigorous enforcement of these claims is likely to work not only hardship, but such havoc that the trading interests of the United States with its customer nations will be seriously compromised for years to come. May it not actually be easier for us to waive the loan debts, and to assist in an early reconstruction of the economic structure of Europe than to enforce the payments, and run the risk of collapse, and therefore of loss to a far greater extent? These are questions which only economists can decide. The United States is the one nation with resources sufficient to take such a reassuring step without serious financial loss. Might it not be good strategy as well as good economy and good ethics for this government to pursue that policy? At all events there is one obligation on which insistence ought to be made. If any such offers of exemption from the payment of international loans are made by the United States, they should be based upon the explicit understanding that disarmament is undertaken, and that pledges of a warless policy for the future are included. It is useless to talk of the waiving of financial obligations of the other nations to the United States while it is practically certain that the immunity thus secured would be employed in preparing for further warfare. The Conference on Disarmament gave to the United States the leadership in the proposals for a warless world. The suggestions looking toward the remission of debts, whatever the ultimate outcome may be, provide a further opportunity for insistence that such a proposal cannot even be considered while the pathway to further wars is being cleared by this or any other device of financial reconstruction.

Ireland's Continued Tragedy of Self-destruction

APPEARANCES favor the view that the friends of Irish progress and independence are doomed to an indeterminate postponement of their hopes. The steps that seemed about to lead to a just and honorable treaty with the British government, whereby the status of a self-governing dominion was assured to Ireland, have up to the present time been thwarted by the mad infatuation of a little group of bitter-enders, of whom de Valera has constituted himself the leader. Whatever claim to the regard of the Irish people this agitator may have gained through the years, has now been forfeited by the folly of his irascible opposition to every measure of conciliation, and his determination to rule or ruin. No man was ever given greater opportunities of leadership. After his home rule campaigns in Ireland, he came to this country and was everywhere accorded the courtesies of a patriotic promotor of his country's cause. For more than two years he was supported in elaborate and sumptuous manner at the expense of the Irish cause, and was treated like a real leader. Since his return to Ireland his career has been one of pathetic stubbornness and folly. It was early seen that he could not properly represent either group of Irish in the negotiations at London, and this appears to have embittered him until at the consummation of the treaty for the creation of the Irish Free State he entered upon a campaign of reckless and persistent opposition to every form of arrangement which admitted any acknowledgment of the British Empire. In this he parted company with all but a small and belligerent faction of the Irish people. Since that time a sniping and ambush warfare has been maintained by these rebels, with such acts of murder and vandalism as the looting and burning of villages and towns, and the murder of such leaders as General Wilson and Michael Collins. When Ireland finally wins her place as a constituent portion of the empire, self-governing and free, she will have to forget the insane acts of some of her pretended patriots, and those of de Valera will be most conspicuous in this list.

Dr. Norwood's Impressions of America

DR. NORWOOD, of the City Temple, has been giving his impressions of America in a Sunday evening sermon which we are pleased to publish in this issue of The Christian Century. On the whole he puts us in good conceit with ourselves, if rather pointed, at times, both in praise and blame. He is generous, wise, well-balanced, and diplomatic, but his first impression was of our wealth which he thinks is nothing short of an obsession which has paralyzed our judgment; but he quickly adds, "We are both in the crucible of Almighty God." He thinks the European resentment of America is because they think our wealth was made out of the war, which is quite wrong. As a matter of fact, America spent more in the war than she made out of it, besides what she loaned to the allies. No, America is wealthy not because of the war—indeed, she is far poorer because of the war, since New York cannot hope to be rich if Chicago is burned down—but because of the fabulous resources of its country and the enterprise of its people. Wealth is our temptation, and it tends to materialism in America as everywhere else; but Dr. Norwood thinks that we do make good use of our wealth, both in private benefactions and in public institutions. At any rate, America has seldom had so interesting a visitor as the minister of the City Temple, and it could not ask for a gentler critic.

Dr. Torrey and "Kaiser Jesus"

IN the "King's Business," published by the Los Angeles Bible Institute, July issue, 1922, in an editorial signed by the initials of Rev. Keith L. Brooks, managing editor, there is a reply to an editorial in the "Christian Guardian," in which the writer denies that Dr. Torrey ever uses the phrase, "Kaiser Jesus." Following is a paragraph from the editorial:

> We have just one fault to find with this statement concerning Dr. Torrey. It is more than just a fib, an untruth or a prevarication. It is a pure concoction, yes, a bouncing big lie. We have asked Dr. Torrey if he could suggest any possible ground for such a statement being attributed to him and he replies that it has evidently originated in the inner consciousness of some Methodist editors. "There is no proof," he says, "that I ever referred to Kaiser Jesus." To say that he refers "in the most unhesitating way to Kaiser Jesus" makes it evident that the writer is determined, even at the cost of deliberate misrepresentation, to carry his point. Some people would even call him "unscrupulous."

This is clearly a question of fact, and we turn therefore to see whether or not Dr. Torrey ever has referred to Kaiser Jesus, whether in an "unhesitating" way or not. Dr. Torrey is certain that there is no proof that he ever referred to "Kaiser Jesus." Undoubtedly the currency of the reference is due to its quotation in Professor Rall's Modern Premillennialism and the Christian Hope, page 153. We go back of this, however, to the source from which the quotation was made and find it as follows:

> We may say we need a great democracy. They had a great democracy in France at the time of the great revolution, and streets ran with blood. What we need is an emperor, that will bring peace and that is not Kaiser Wilhelm, it is Kaiser Jesus.

This is a quotation from an address by Dean R. A. Torrey, given in 1917 at a conference held at Moody Bible Institute and published in the "Christian Worker's Magazine" of March, 1917. No correction of this ever has appeared. Dean Gray was the editor of the publication. There are the facts, and the jury will have to decide who has told the "big bouncing big lie," the dean of the Los Angeles Bible Institute and his inspired editor or the Methodist writer and editor. It is an ugly word to use and before it is spoken rashly the user ought to know the facts. Dean Torrey has made a great many addresses and has undoubtedly said many things that he has forgotten. Indeed, most of what he says is better forgotten. But his memory needs refreshing before he allows his editors to give the lie direct to their brethren.

"Two-foot Bookshelf" for the Children

A MODEL "two-foot bookshelf" for children, the books selected by the American Library association and the National Educational association, has been exhibited by the school of journalism of Columbia University. It includes twenty-five volumes, as follows: "Little Women," "Alice in Wonderland," "Robinson Crusoe," "Tom Sawyer," "Treasure Island," "Boy's Life of Lincoln" by Nicolay, "Jungle Book," Anderson's Fairy Tales, Aesop's Fables, Stevenson's "Garden of Verse," "Adventures of Robin Hood," "Tales From Shakespeare," "Boy's King Arthur," "Story of Mankind" by Van Loon, "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," "Verse for Young Folks" by Burton Stevenson, "Last of the Mohicans," "Christmas Carol," "Rip Van Winkle," "Mother Goose," "Hans Brinker" by Dodge, "Boy's Life of Roosevelt" by Hagedorn, "Hawthorne's Wonder Book," "Wild Animals I Have Known" by Seton, and the "Arabian Nights." It is a goodly list, albeit by no means complete, else "Huckleberry Finn" would surely have been on it, alongside "Tom Sawyer." Also, it is too soon to number "The Story of Mankind" by Van Loon, among the classics; and we should hesitate to vote for it, because, frankly, we do not like the way in which it deals with Jesus. Such lists are difficult to make, because they are usually made by those who, grown gray of heart, if not of head, are exiles from the enchanted land of childhood, and have forgotten the way to the tiny, mystic gate which admits them to the days that come not back.

Are Our Hymns Christian?

PROGRESS, during the past generation or two, in the social evaluation of religion is amazing. The fundamentalist reaction has at least served the good turn of bringing this fact into relief. Few dig among the sermons preserved from the past, but the religious sentiment of the fathers is more popularly exposed in their hymns, many of which are still standard in our modern hymn-books. The inadequacy of most of these to express the religious experience of normal persons of today is revealed in the constant necessity to compose and compile new collections. The so-called evangelistic songs do not count. Most of them express the most ephemeral, and some of them disordered or pathological, spiritual states. Their verse is often doggerel and cannot possibly endure. The music is often also quite as cheap and perishable. But, for other reasons, most of the standard hymns of one and two generations ago are also no longer satisfactory, not mentioning those of still earlier times. How few of Watts' and Wesley's hymns, on which many of those now living were religiously nurtured, express today's vital religious experiences! Some of them are preserved in honor because of youthful associations. But sit down with a collection of them, and analyze them with the absence of prejudice in their favor, such as you would accord a new composition appearing, for example, in the poetry section of a modern magazine. A genuine social note is scarcely to be detected in any of them. They are, for the most part, morbidly introspective. They encourage the soul to struggle through the present vale of tears, and almost invariably wind up in the closing stanza with a burst of longing for the bliss of a heaven far removed from any possible experience here and now.

The basic New Testament doctrine of the kingdom of heaven on earth, which is now the substance of all preaching which normal American citizens find reality in hearkening to, is unknown. Even the infrequent expressions which seem to hint at it are clouded by a context which shows that the conception really did not invade the inner shrine of the authors' souls. With all of the zeal of modern hymnologists and publishers to bring our hymn-books down to the actual religious exxperiences of today, they are still far in arrears. Sermons which dare to exploit the morbid introspection of many of the older hymns still in current use, would be delivered to empty pews, as many of them indeed are delivered, or to an array of aged and feeble listeners whose religious experiences are plainly a relic of a period which is not even a vivid memory among those of vital spiritual impulses today. Progressive preachers often either do not pay any attention to the hymns accompanying their sermons, not pretending to censor the sentiment of anthems rendered by the choir, or else they have through long toils come to realize the hopelessness of finding hymns which accord with the only sentiment which is acceptable and real to those who attend upon their preaching.

It is true that most of these hymns were once alive, and expressed not only the author's real experiences but also those of multitudes of his contemporaries. Thus rigidly stereotyped and preserved they serve a good purpose in showing us how far and in what direction we have come since that day. They satisfy an archæological curiosity, and, revealing as they do the way persons of vivid religious consciousness once felt and aspired, make us glad that we live now instead of then, and help us to gird our loins with new resolution to make the religion of today's kingdom of heaven more real and effectual.

Industrial Courts

EVIDENTLY we must try again. The present industrial courts are not insuring that industrial tranquility and public security which their sponsors promised and which the more hopeful public was glad to believe would result. The Kansas institution, which has been longest and most widely heralded, instead of fulfilling its promise, has converted Kansas into a storm-center of the industrial conflict. It boots little to advance the assurance that the plan would work if only the labor unions and the corporations would yield to its sovereignty and abide by its decisions. The fact is that neither party to the conflict yields the needful allegiance, and the public is still distraught with their rancorous strife.

The Federal Labor board is not vested with the sweeping legal prerogative of the Kansas court. Some may believe that this lack is a fatal weakness, and that its inability to command the situation forced upon it by the recent railroad and coal strikes is an indication that it should be given more power. This is one of the laws to which some would give more and sharper teeth. But the confidence that law and force will lead us out of this wilderness of distress is failing more thoughtful citizens. Are we on the right track with our industrial courts? Can the two embittered opponents in the industrial imbroglio be brought to terms by setting the courts upon them? Of course it is very wicked for anybody not to obey the law after our legislators have put themselves to the pains—and the anxieties of congressmen and senators seeking reelection in November reveal the poignancy of these pains—of engrossing it upon the statute-books. But the fact remains that the mandates or recommendations or pleadings of our industrial courts are not being heeded by these contestants when it chances not to accord with their interests to observe them.

What do we propose to do about it? Industry is on a war basis. How much will be gained by introducing a third party to the contest, and establishing and equipping it also on a war footing? Can a three-cornered battle be successfully waged? How much will be left for the third party, the public, if it is content to wipe up the field left by the two earlier and principal combatants? Suppose our industrial courts should succeed, what would they actually accomplish?

One of these two things: They would demonstrate that the third party to the conflict, the public, has superior rights as guaranteed by its superior power; it would prove able to take the field from either of the contestants who now fill the air with their clamors, and who make havoc for all by their self-interested striving. Or else, it would reduce to subjection the two parties now contending, compelling each and both to yield autonomy and initiative to the superior overlord, whose servants they must recognize themselves to be. The former would permit the warfare to proceed, while the superior power and right of the third party is asserted at intervals or upon the emergent necessity. The latter would insure the permanent subjection of employer and employe to the sovereign will of a dominating public, holding before them the constant reminder that they live and prosper only as they obey their overlord.

No, we are not on the right track. Peace won by this means and at such a price would be no peace at all. The dilemma is hopeless; either horn will pierce the vitals of society. We must quit organizing or treating industry as war. We must not continue to sanction by legislative devices which contemplate war as right or inevitable, the strife which both labor unions and organized capital press upon each other. Industry must clean its own house, must restore and maintain the joy of partnership, must insure the efficiency which is inseparable from independent initiative and at the same time eradicate the evil spirit of self-seeking.

How is this to be contrived? That is not our question; the public is not equipped with the implements and the skill of the technician. We may properly insist that industry shall find the way to fulfill these demands, in the sacrifice of which society must perish. That is its business, to keep the peace as well as to produce and distribute goods. Perhaps some legislation now prevailing needs to be modified; perhaps the forces of industry need a freer hand in solving their technical problems. But there ought to develop a stern and unswerving demand, pressed and accepted by all, that the parties to industry shall live and work in harmony. An executive or a group of executives who allow themselves to become embroiled must be recognized and should know themselves as inefficient ipso facto; they have failed at the very point where executive skill is primarily and finally to be tested, the point of the human relations. A labor union, accorded the right of conference and collective bargaining, which fails to reach a working agreement with other parties to the common task is ipso facto to be condemned, to be deprived of all sympathy or support, and to concede its own fault, however great its strength of numbers or indispensability to its branch of industry. The idea of the common service must become all-inclusive. For those left out of direct relation to industry to arrogate to themselves the role of umpire or overlord, assuming themselves to be the sovereign public, the be-all, and end-all of the social process, can only compound the fatal self-seeking which has already brought our civilization far enough on the way to wreck and ruin. Efforts to determine by nice judicial procedure which party to the strife is right and which is wrong are beside the point. The conflict is the evil thing. It will not be cured by the entrance of another combatant.

New Phases of the Missionary Adventure

THERE is no better proof of the inextinguishable vitality of the Christian religion than the ever-fresh manifestations of its power to adapt itself to new conditions, both in the lands of its long experience, and in the areas of its more recent appearance. It is the characteristic of a growing organism to be able to adjust itself to new conditions, and to develop new contacts and unexpected forms of manifestation. It is only a dead system that must be transported to new environments, and there left to enforce itself through the momentum of authority gained in other regions. A living faith is always making itself felt in new and startling ways, and is not likely to be cabined and confined in the definitions or the programs of the past.

Particularly true of the present period is the change that is taking place in the expansion of Christianity in the non-Christian world. From its beginnings Christianity has been a missionary religion. Unlike the ethnic faiths, it has set itself the task of expanding into the entire world. In contrast with Hinduism, Confucianism, Shinto, Parseeism, Judaism and other systems of racial limitation, it has gone boldly out into all regions, with an audacity which has never been equalled even by the two other great missionary religions, Buddhism and Mohammedanism. For though Buddhism has immensely widened its holdings since it was gradually driven out of India, its former home, and has now become a great force in lands like Java, Sumatra, Ceylon, Burmah and Japan; and though Mohammedanism has spread into India and Africa, where many millions of the Indian and Arab races are its zealous adherents; yet neither of these religions has ever penetrated Europe or America, save in the parlor clubs of novelty seekers, or in diluted forms such as Bahaism. But Christianity is making all the lands of the seven seas its fields of operation, and its influence as an organizing power extends further afield every year.

The past hundred years have been the great period of Protestant missionary expansion. The early church was quietly and persistently expanding through the Roman empire. The penetration of Europe went on slowly but surely during the middle ages. The crusades gave a different and unfortunate direction to the energies of the church for several centuries, and yet the impulse was not lost. The Reformation started the Roman church upon a new missionary career, especially in the distant east, though most of this enterprise was connected with one brilliant name, that of Francis Xavier. The expansion of the Spanish empire gave a great opportunity for the spread of missions, and members of the various orders, especially the Franciscans, the Dominicans and the Jesuits, pushed out into the new lands of America with eager ambition to convert the natives to the Catholic faith. Yet it must be remembered that these missions were not only means of expanding the area of the faith, but of enriching the church at home. The story of the California missions, for example, is romantic in many of its aspects, but it had its very definite financial side, in the remission of large sums of money from the mission stations to the ecclesiastical offices in Spain. Roman Catholic missions were alway profitable to the church. It was a long time before Protestantism came to itself sufficiently to take up the missionary task. But when it was once started it was pushed with remarkable zeal by a growing list of the separated groups.

The past century has seen communication established with most of the nations of the world. This has given opportunity for the missionary program. One after another the denominations have pushed into the non-Christian lands, and have established stations for the propagation of their special types of religious belief. In this manner Christianity has been introduced into most of the lands. This has been a very great achievement. But of course it has carried with it the limitation and misfortune of denominationalism. In regions where the mission stations were widely scattered, little damage could be done by sectarianism, for there were few contacts, and each society was left to its own ministries. But when contacts were established, and denominational rivalries were inspired, the scandal of a divided church came to expression in its most disastrous form. The disaster was usually modified by the good sense and Christian courtesy of the missionaries themselves, who were often wise enough to set denominational loyalty in subordination to the interests of the Kingdom of God.

In the attempt to avoid friction and to economize the resources of the churches in this vast adventure, some plan of comity and delimitation of territory soon became necessary. This has been wisely accomplished for many of missionary forces under the auspices of the Foreign Missions Conference. Yet it is true of course that there are denominations so contemptuous of cooperative obligations, and so little sensitive to the courtesies of Christian service that they regard themselves as bound in no manner by any form of comity, and as at liberty to push in wherever resources and inclination may afford them an opening. This spirit and procedure have led to some unhappy episodes on the mission field, and have still further illustrated the evil of a divided and uncooperating type of Christianity. But with rare exceptions these cruder forms of antagonism are disappearing from the mission fields.

The factor which is producing the new phase in the expansion of the church in the non-Christian world is the rising tide of self-consciousness on the part of the native Christians. The gospel has always promoted the spirit of responsibility and democracy. Gradually the nations of the far east have wakened to the desire for self-government, and are achieving it. In Japan it has reached the form of a constitutional empire, which is only a half step from a republic. In China it has taken the form of a republic which is not yet self-directing, but is feeling for efficiency. In India it is demanding an increasing share in the government which amounts to the attainment of a democracy. And if these are the political aspirations of these great peoples, what of their conception of missionary control? The churches have been in the charge of western missionaries, and the real sources of power have been the missionary boards located in Europe and America. Now it is the serious and increasing demand of the native Christians that they be given the privilege of controlling their own affairs. Deeply sensible as they are of the service rendered by the missionaries from the west, they have come to feel that self-respect and the welfare of the cause to which they belong demands a growing, and presently a full, measure of autonomy.

It cannot be doubted that there are several reasons why the native Christians are increasingly of this mind. The growing spirit of democracy is one. The pride of race is another. It is difficult for an educated Japanese to feel that he must accept the oversight of an American in matters of faith and conduct, which are as precious to him as they can be to the foreigner. It is hard for Chinese Christians, whose culture is millenniums older than our own, to be permanently happy under the auspices of American boards of direction. Even more difficult is the position of high caste Indian scholars when confronted with the prospect of a church organization permanently controlled from across the oceans. Does it imply that the faith of the gospel is so tender a plant that it must be nurtured by western hands, and cannot be trusted to thrive save among its customary interpreters? Moreover, where did Christianity begin, in Europe and America, or in that same Asia where it appears to need such oversight lest it go wrong? To whom does it really belong? Is it our possession, the people of the occident, with our theological definitions so different from those of early Christianity, and our hard orthodoxies, the result of German speculation, Scotch dogmatism, English conservatism, and American assurance?

As matter of fact, the more the native Christians know of our western Christianity, the more they are assured of the fact that it does not meet the needs of their people as does the Christianity of which they read in the New Testament. This is a faith they can understand. But this western compound of doctrinal niceties, ritualistic insistencies, disputations over the modes of administering ordinances, and infinite and bewildering varieties of organization, leaves the oriental baffled and perplexed, and wondering where in all this maze of definition and machinery the spirit of man gets a chance to find its holy companionship with God, of which the oriental makes far more account than do the more scientific and practical people of the west. And our denominational names and notions, our nervous efforts to keep the generations true to standards that have grown up through western convention and application to problems to which the east is an entire stranger, are as remote to him and his entire manner of thinking as the reason why a native Christian in northern Korea should be called a "Southern Methodist."

It is a joy to know that the real missionary leaders, both in the field and in places of administrative responsibility, are meeting these questions with statesmanlike ability and breadth of vision. They know that they hold no mortgage on the churches of the non-Christian lands. They understand full well that those churches are not going to be permanently of the denominational or of the western type. More than this, they are hopeful that in the free air of their fuller expansion they may yet reveal such new splendors of our holy faith as shall prove the world-wide character of the gospel of Jesus, and shall add new stars to the crown of his rejoicing.

The Light Step

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE was a Convention of Women, and it was holden in a place where folk assemble in Summer with a vast Inn and a great Auditorium. And there gathered women from Oklahoma and Arizona and the coasts of Maine and New Mexico and Georgia and Minnesota. And they wore Badges.

Now I beheld their Programme, and it was a thing that would have appalled the heart of any man. For it began at early morn and continued until dewy eve and then began again. And between the sessions were Regional Meetings and State Conferences and many such like things. And it lasted for Ten Days. I am a man who has seen many Conventions, and I know no man who could have attended this one and sat it out.

And the Programme dealt with Immigration and Americanization and Legislation and Sanitation and Education and all else in the heavens above and the earth beneath and the waters under the earth. And I am here to say that those women took the job Seriously, and stuck by it.

But one thing I noticed whereof I venture to speak. My room was on the Main Corridor leading to the Auditorium, and the women passed by it night and day. And if in all the two thousand of them there was one who walked with a Light Step, then of a surety she went in and out some other way.

For ths I observed, that when a woman hath her left arm occupied with a Portfolio of Reports and Recommendations and Resolutions and Nominations, there is not any way in which she can step lightly. She walketh with a stride that cometh down hard upon the floor. She walketh as if the Heel of the Woman must bruise the head of the Serpent.

Now I spake of this unto Keturah, saying, I am glad that thou hast a Light Step.

And she inquired of me saying, Wherefore shouldest thou notice how women walk? What is it to thee?

And I said, They shook the floor; and they drave sleep from mine eyes and slumber from mine eyelids.

And she said, Were they not good women, and ladylike in their deportment?

And I said, They certainly were. It would be difficult to get together two thousand men of greater intelligence or better behaviour. But why should they pound the floor so unmercifully? What had the floor done unto them?

And Keturah said, I suppose they were all so Busy, and so much in Earnest, and so eager to get from one meeting to another, they considered not their step.

And I said, The hand that rocked the cradle was the hand that once ruled the world, but the foot that smites the corridor holdeth the scepter now. But thou, Keturah, though thou be heavier than when I wed thee, for this I am thankful, that to thy many other virtues thou addest this, that thou dost walk with a Light Step.

VERSE

The Laborer

SURELY they must be wrong who say,
"God finished all before the seventh day."
For aye He lives; so He must work for aye.

All is not finished; He is working still.
The perfect Workman cannot lose His will
To better what He made, at first, so ill.

The Unseen Hand is moulding as of yore;
Be it of common or of precious ore,
Some things It fashions never tried before.

God does not like to leave me common clay;
He strives to make me finer day by day.
May I be plastic to His hand, I pray.

Tears

WHEN I consider Life and its few years—
A wisp of fog betwixt us and the sun;
A call to battle, and the battle done
Ere the last echo dies within our ears;
A rose choked in the grass; an hour of fears;
The gusts that past a darkening shore do beat;
The burst of music down an unlistening street—
I wonder at the idleness of tears.
Ye old, old dead, and ye of yesternight,
Chieftains, and bards, and keepers of the sheep,
By every cup of sorrow that you had,
Loose me from tears, and make me see aright
How each hath back what once he stayed to weep:
Homer his sight, David his little lad.

The Closing of the Churches

By John Andrew Holmes

WHAT an odd-looking volume it was! Surely this was the first time I had ever gazed upon its like, yet there it was last night upon a shelf in my own library. I arose and took it in my hand. "The Closing of the Churches"—such proved to be its title. Opening it, I noted that its year of publication was 1992—at first I could hardly believe my eyes. Possessed with a sense of doing a forbidden thing, I began perusing the book, and I read it through with feverish haste. While its contents are still imprinted upon my throbbing brain, I hasten to write this article. The singularity of finding that fascinating work at so comparatively early a date, even aside from the startling character of its revelations, seems to me to justify setting it forth for my readers rather fully and largely in its own words.

"As we near the close of the most tragic century in human annals"—so the foreword opened—"it is natural to look back over it, appraising its most momentous events. It has been my unhappy lot to live through almost its entire span. Born in 1910, I remember distinctly the glad news of the armistice closing what we have since learned to call the Little World war. I was thirty-five years old when the last state ratified the repeal of the Anti-Drink amendment to the American constitution, and when the Great World war broke out I had just celebrated my forty-ninth birthday. Now, in my eighty-second year, my mind is able to pass in clear review more than three and a half score years of what future historians may well term the Modern Dark Age. Being still strong and full of interest in my kind, I am now setting myself to write an account of what seems to me the central event of the period, so filled with catastrophe and hopelessness, in which fate has cast my lot. I hardly need to state that I mean the closing of the churches, which took place in 1933.

PUBLIC CALAMITIES

"The earlier tendencies of our murky century," continued the author, "logically led to this event, and in turn a long series of public calamities, some of which I have noted above, flowed out of it naturally, like water from an inverted pitcher. The repeal of the amendment abolishing the saloon was as sure to follow the lapse of the churches as its original enactment was due to their influence in the days of their power. With the passing of that influence and the consequent dimming of the higher perceptions, the old saw, 'Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die,' waxed exceeding popular, until, twelve years after the spiritual type of institution had been closed, the carnal one was reopened.

"Likewise, the beginning of the Great World war in 1959 is directly traceable to the failure of the fountain out of which had flowed the main current of enthusiasm for the cause of peace. With the locking of church doors, public sentiment against armed conflict had grown weaker and less effective, until with the fateful development of chemical and bacterial warfare society came to seethe with dismal apprehensions of approaching catastrophe and with the darkest suspicions and hatreds.

RISE OF CHINESE MILITARISM

"The immediate occasion of this dire struggle, which practically snuffed out modern civilization, was the unexpected rise of a vast and powerful militaristic empire upon the ruins of the Chinese republic. That nation of five hundred million souls, still essentially heathen, had not been greatly feared in the early days of the century. Rather, it had been openly insulted and put upon by all the great powers, with singularly little forethought of possible retribution. Though its multitudes were imbibing scientific knowledge from the west, with an inevitable liberation of power for evil such as the world had never imagined, nevertheless there was astonishingly little apprehension of what was destined so soon to befall.

"At that time the American churches were carrying on an ambitious campaign for winning the Chinese to the religion of the Prince of Peace, and it was felt that if this could be effected before that swarming eastern race had come to know its overpowering strength no harm need be feared from all it might learn of western science. Especially would this be true if in the meantime the western nations themselves could be brought to apply to affairs of state the gospel their people professed, instead of the provocative doctrine of military might which they had inherited from their pagan ancestors. But alas! the religious collapse of 1933 suddenly put an end to the spread of such high ideals among the Orientals, and it was only twenty-six years later that the civilized but un-Christianized hordes from the east commenced their dread march of destruction westward.

"But, pardon an old man"—the preface abruptly closed with these words—"for having run garrulously ahead of his story, which should first record the tendencies in American life leading to the discontinuance of public worship. To those tendencies the first division of this history shall be devoted."

TENDENCIES IN AMERICAN LIFE

Accordingly, in the main body of the work the author proceeded to sketch the principal currents of thought and life flowing through the first third of the twentieth century down into the dark gulf of 1933. After setting forth a mass of material of a rather pedantic character—as learned writers often take pride in doing before they permit themselves to become interesting—he went on to say:

"One thing prompting to that fatal step was the growing propensity to shallow pleasures. Despite increased leisure people gave less and less time to the church. Swift as came the increase of wealth, swifter still rushed in a swarm of artificial wants, until luxury begrudged even the traditional doles to the cause of him who was still called Master. Frequently families spent more in a single day on their pleasure cars than on the work of the church for an entire year.

"In due time, the sentiment had become general that this divine institution was costing too much, and while men were making no sacrifices for it, there is nevertheless a sense in which they were right, for exceedingly little of religious value were they receiving. In return for a year's support of the church the average man was hearing hardly more than a single discourse. The pastors pointed out that their hearers might enjoy a hundred hours of public worship at the same cost, but the people strangely preferred even less for their outlay than they were receiving, so that there was a sort of logic in their final conclusion that the churches should be closed.

DETERIORATION OF MINISTRY

"In all fairness it must be conceded," the book went on, "that even when people attended service they usually received little spiritual profit, owing to the deterioration of the ministry. More than a decade earlier, a large proportion of those who had laboriously prepared for the pastorate had already been forced out of the profession by economic pressure, and men had ceased to train their minds for so precarious a calling. For a time, a considerable number of devoted single women came forward into the broken ranks, but the prediction made by a writer in 1923 that within a decade 'clergyman' would be parsed as a feminine noun was doomed to unfulfillment. There was a feeling that the church was already over-feminized, and this proved fatal to the new movement. Rather, the ministry came to be composed of ignorant men, too frequently fanatical, who preached fantastic doctrines curiously derived from Daniel and the Revelation in preference to the vital truths which so abound in the teachings of the Christ. Such men were able to subsist as a sort of coolie labor, but they stimulated the emotions of the ignorant rather than fed the reflections of the thoughtful.

"In part responsible for this situation was the attitude of the cultured classes, who failed to assert their proper influence in the direction of religious affairs. Instead of entering the church in force and making it stand for a reasonable faith, they elected the easier course of looking on in derision from the outside, while its leadership passed over to ranting clowns and sowers of superstition. Former cowboys, retired baseball players and reformed prize fighters became the acknowledged oracles. Faith became the property of the ignorant and bigoted, and the spiritually-minded found little in the church services to satisfy the hunger of their souls.

THE CHURCHES CLOSED

"It is not strange, therefore," concluded our author, "that by 1933 there remained little opposition to the proposed closure of the houses of worship. Men had gradually ceased to deem them useful until, it is scarce too much to assert, the discontinuance of their activities took place by unanimous consent."

My readers can perhaps imagine with what depression of heart I perused the foregoing account of the declining vigor and ignoble death of the institution to which I had devoted my life. I tried to doubt my eyes, but I knew as well as that I was sitting there that I was reading authentic history.

Had the world not missed the church? Had it felt no need of the men who had formerly stood at the soul's horizon, stitching man's earth to God's sky? Had it felt no regret for its loss of those who had spoken as its embodied conscience? But I must urge my weary eye onward, even at the peril of finding in those weird pages that my life had been set apart to an errand trifling and bootless.

"At first"—this is what I read when I reached the second book of the volume—"at first the discharge of all clergymen caused their parishioners some inconvenience and mental distress. When parents lost a child by death their first instinct was to seek the consolation of the church, only to recall on second thought that no minister of religion was now to be found. In time, however, people came to think nothing of burying their dead without calling upon God, feeling, as they had come to put it, that there was really nothing to justify the sentimentality and other-worldliness which had formerly characterized funerals. 'When one is dead,' bereaved ones were in the habit of saying, 'why, that is the end of the matter.' In short, they had come to look upon death with the eyes of those unchurched masses, the brutes.

COLLEGES SHUT DOWN

"It was only after the lapse of many years, when the influence of the pulpit had all but vanished, that the most serious consequences came to light. Notable among these was the shutting down of the colleges.

"It was the church which had founded and maintained such schools. It was the church which had fired men with zeal for things of the mind, supplying the overwhelming majority of students and instructors in the institutions of higher learning and providing authors for four books of every five. No wonder it proved only a matter of time after 1933 until the academic life of America had almost disappeared!

"The high schools did not stand long upon the order of their going. People who had no children in such institutions—and they constituted the vast majority—objected to being taxed for other people's children. 'What is there in it for us?' said they.

"After 1960, such secondary schools as still remained open were maintained by a fixed charge for each pupil. Poor parents with large families, whose training had previously been provided on the basis of the strong bearing the infirmities of the weak, now found themselves unable to meet their share of the expense. Accordingly, their children remained at home, and this resulted in the early appearance of a large illiterate peasant class, which swelled every mob and added to the lawlessness of an evil time. The prevailing ignorance," I went on to read, "played into the hands of superstition. Spiritism, which the churches had unconsciously held to a minimum, now spread with astonishing rankness, and necromancers waxed fat off the credulity of the uninstructed.

"Formerly, people had contented themselves with such trifling tributes to superstition as knocking on wood and avoiding the number 13, but now they became obsessed with the notion that there was luck either good or ill in everything. In conversation, a person would frequently pause to point to his temple, to kick the earth with his left heel, to snap his middle finger or to wink three times with alternating eyes, all to avert the wrath of evil spirits. Many people replaced their radio sets with ouija boards, which commanded as much in some instances as ten thousand dollars apiece. While the Bible was still used for display as in earlier years, its reading was restricted to such sentences as first caught the eye when the book was opened at random. These were regarded as oracles. At length it became evident that the churches, far from having been to blame for such superstitious notions as had been found in many of them, had really formed the chief defense from such abuses of the religious instinct."

These revelations I read with open mouth. Though I had sometimes guessed that the churches were not without their value in some of these respects, nevertheless it came to me with something of sudden surprise to find my half-formed opinions confirmed by future history. But I pressed on in hot haste. I had hundreds of pages yet to read, and it is only with the keenest regret that I must narrowly limit my further report. Space fails me to set down what I read in the book about the world of industry, with its seven-day grind and its brutal, hopeless strife; of the demoralization of noble fraternal orders, which had derived their ethical power from the church, but which, deprived of her influence, soon revised their requirements down to little more than codes of etiquette; of the failure of human charity—for every benevolent society had learned to depend for most of its gifts upon those who attended churches; of the decline also of life insurance—for it was the spirit diffused from a multitude of pulpits that had led men to deny themselves in order to protect their families. Every man's question now seemed to be: "Where do I come in?"

BUSINESS SUFFERED, TOO

Indeed, business of every sort had suffered. Prosperity had depended—more than most men imagined—upon the public inculcation of Christian virtues. Church members had owned more than three-fourths of all the savings deposits of the nation, had held in their possession more than two-thirds of all the buildings, had guided the destinies of most of the large industrial concerns. The solid qualities which had for the most part produced such practical results had now deteriorated, and trade, which had been conducted on the basis of mutual confidence, was carried on with fear and difficulty. No longer might a man safely loan money. The lawyer, the broker, the banker, the clerk who gave him the key to his safe-deposit box—he had come to regard them all as proper objects of suspicion. The bulwark of men's confidence in their investments had been the religious principles of the community, and that bulwark had slipped. The narrative continued in part as follows:

"The cost of protection against evil-doers had increased ten-fold. Now that the church no longer stood as a sea wall against anarchy and violence, higher and higher the waves of lawlessness dashed up over the land. Even those who had formerly attended church now began to appear in the criminal courts. The result widely noted was what a writer at the middle of the century termed 'the deeper lawlessness.' There are many laws too delicate, too fine in their sentiment, to be written in statute books. There are laws aginst hatred and selfishness, laws against hurtful words, scowling faces, evil thoughts. There are positive requirements—of love, of moral courage, of sacrifice, of spirituality in all its forms. To such commandments, proclaimed from Sunday to Sunday, multitudes had yielded inward obedience. Few and insignificant indeed were the legal enactments compared to the ethical laws the ministers had published from their two hundred thousand pulpits, and the profounder lawlessness, which had come in after the voices of the preachers had all been hushed, was a matter of such public horror as even now I cannot contemplate without a sickening at my heart."

FATAL LACK OF UNDERSTANDING

The above paragraph seemed too much for the aged historian to set down in cold blood, for at this point he laid aside his dispassionate, scholarly manner, and broke forth in a passage surcharged with emotion, in which he upbraided his age for its fatal lack of understanding.

"What fools!" he exclaimed. "In making it our sport to disparage the church of Christ, we became blind to its essential beneficence. In articles and books—yes, even in sermons—we stressed its incidental imperfections, perversely oblivious to the patent fact that it was only by the torch the church herself carried we were enabled to descry such peccadilloes. Whatever else may be said, the church was the world's best hope. What other society maintained a numerous ministry to lead men out upon higher levels of unselfish living? The church enabled her servants to devote themselves to the pursuit and proclamation of the most vital truth. Most of those men incorporated it with their own spirits, made it warm with their heart-beats and gave it forth in both word and deed for the sustenance of all that was best in mankind.

"In public worship was effected that high interchange of values between the finite and the infinite in which no man is ever loser. Hearts were infilled and irradiated and the timbre of grandeur was added to men's minds. A great use of a great day made great souls. The church service fulfilled the deepest cravings of the human spirit. It afforded a vision, a satisfaction and a power such as without it we have failed to find. As no other institution it exalted ideals and motives. It purified emotions, built moral habits, bestowed comfort and peace and fed the fountains of hope. It was as if under its influence the milk of human kindness underwent on Sunday a sort of pasteurization, which kept it from souring throughout the heat and storms of the entire week.

"Today we have our eighty-story business blocks 'that reach the heavens,' as we like to phrase it, but in our blindness we long since tore down the only skyscraper ever built on earth. Gone the church, and with it visions and faith and comfort and power—yes, even more than these, for I have survived to look upon the third generation of the unchurched, with its contempt of the basic moralities and its hopeless destitution of soul."

Never had I suffered depression so profound as that with which I read this last sentence. I seemed hemmed in and pressed upon by the densest darkness. Long I sat there motionless, numb in mind, in hope dead. But at length, with the feeling of one in a coffin returning to a sort of life, I resumed direction of my faculties and turned to the next and final chapter. If the cup of the future contained still further dregs, I would drink them all.

What I found in that cup seemed nectar! The heading of the chapter read: "The World Emerges From the Long Tunnel." With a wonderful sense of relief, I quaffed the sweet refreshment of that chapter.

At length there was to be noted—so it set forth—a swelling tide of popular demand for the rehabilitation of the churches. Men were asking for it in the interest of education and of everything cultural in the life of society. Men were insisting upon it as the first step in a new campaign against the vile saloon of the times. Men were demanding it in the name of that mutual confidence which lies at the bottom of every revival of business. For the sake of industrial decency, in the name of protection from still another war, with the new and blood-congealing horrors which it threatened to loose upon a fearful world, in the interest of every personal virtue and in the hope that society might be lifted out of the bottomless morass into which it had slipped, the cry was rising for a return of the open church.

THE PEOPLE ASK FOR OPEN CHURCHES

Particularly was I struck with the historian's closing statement. It appeared that the people, laying aside their ouija boards for an evening, were to meet in their barracks, drinking dives, dance halls, motion picture theaters and pugilistic spectatoriums on the approaching Bull-Fight Thursday, formerly known as Thanksgiving Day, humbly to memorialize the American emperor—for democracy has never flourished in the absence of the Christian church—"that he might be pleased to order the reopening of those sweet fountains of happiness and prosperity, the houses of worship," which they solemnly pledged themselves to support by worthy gifts from their time and wages. Monster petitions, moreover, each bearing hundreds of signed names as well as names by the tens of thousands attested by crosses, were reaching the imperial palace daily.

After the sustained tension of the entire night, so hopeful an ending of the history must have somewhat relaxed my grasp, for as I closed the volume it slipped from my hand. With a loud noise it struck the floor, and when I opened my eyes—which had involuntarily closed for a moment—the book was gone.

In that hour I praised God that the churches had not yet been closed, that the Great World war had not been fought, that civilization had not collapsed nor the human spirit been exposed to starve for want of its appointed food. In that hour I prayed and said, "Thank God for the divinest institution that has ever been let down from heaven among men!" and anew I pledged my life to the service of God through his indispensable church.

The downfall of this high structure has often enough been prophesied, but it stands through all earthquakes. Wrecking crews have been called out times without number to haul away the debris after its expected crash to earth, but, though a succession of wrecking crews have perished and their wagons mouldered into dust, the spire of the church still serenely pierces the sky. Please God, it shall be so forever.

The Anglo-Saxon Myth and the Industrial South

By Edward C. Lindeman

A FALLACY is like a plugged coin; it serves the same purpose as truth until detected. The term "Anglo-Saxon" is a psychological plugged coin. It has come to be a symbol weighted with intense emotional significance, thanks to the pseudo-scientists who preach race superiority on one hand and sentimental but paradoxical brotherhood of man theorism on the other.

Certain northern owners of a southern textile mill have recently imported foreign-born workers from New England. In an expansive country like this, and considering the general mobility of Americans, this appears to be an innocuous fact. The Southern Textile Bulletin, the chief organ of the textile interests of the south, thinks otherwise and states its case in positive if not elegant terms: "The mill operatives of the south have for generations boasted that they were of pure Anglo-Saxon blood, the best on earth, and that they are not going to welcome the coming of Dagoes, Slav (sic), Poles and the scum of Europe with the knowledge that the infusion of their blood will in time produce a mixed race."

Economic forces prompting northern capitalists to utilize foreign-born labor in southern mills are in conflict with deep-seated racial prejudices. The textile industry as a whole has reached a crucial stage. Lack of labor troubles, nearness to raw materials, and a ready supply of cheap labor—these factors have brought about a gradual shifting of spindles and looms from New England to the southern states. Is the south destined to supplant New England as the dominant center of the textile industry?

ORIGINALLY A MIXTURE

The editor of the Textile Bulletin does not stop with a mild objection. He continues, "we do not counsel violence, but if violence is necessary to rid our mills of these foreigners, it were better to have violence now than to see our operatives forced to live and work along side a disreputable foreign element.—If the Ku Klux Klan must have action it seems to us that this is a fertile field. . . ."

In other words, the "angular" Saxons (as a facetious darkey once called them) are determined that the industrial south as well as the rural south shall be kept for their particular strain of the white race. This is the essence of Anglo-Saxonism. The most effective way of demolishing a pernicious symbol is to confront it with an insistent fact. The Anglo-Saxons were originally a mixture of Angles, Jutes, and Saxons who migrated from the continent of Europe to Britain in the fifth and sixth centuries. None of the migrating groups was pure in strain, and there were at least three wholesale admixtures succeeding the early migrations. To speak of Anglo-Saxons as a pure strain is sheer nonsense; it never was pure and grows less so every day. Of all the dominant groups the Anglo-Saxons are least pure. Perhaps that is one reason for their dominance!

The native white population of the southern states comprises about eighteen million people or two-thirds of the total. This is by no means a homogeneous group. A powerful strain of Teutonic blood has been interpenetrating the Anglo-Saxon blood for almost two centuries. When Louis XIV made war on the German palatinate in the latter part of the seventeenth century, he not only laid waste the ancient cities of Heidelberg, Spires, and Worms, but he also caused a migration of refugees to the United States. There are still counties in the south in which more than half the population is of this descent. The British people are themselves approaching in stature, color of hair and other outward traits the Mediterranean type from which they were first distinguished by the term Anglo-Saxon. To speak of pure races or strains in the modern world is to employ obsolete verbiage. Moreover, racial groupings never did indicate genetic lines of descent but merely physical and mental resemblances.

SOUTHERN CULTURE

From this viewpoint the present inhabitants of the south are far from homogeneous, for the other third of its total population is composed of eight million Negroes, one-fourth of whom already have admixtures of white blood. (There are a half million foreign-born whites in the twelve southern states and about seventeen thousand classified as "all others"). What is more or less homogeneous about the south is its culture, and this is what is usually meant when the term "Anglo-Saxon" is used. But, before the southerner can utilize the culture argument effectively, something approximating an intellectual revolution will need to take place. Culture implies ability to communicate. There are literally millions of southern people shut off from the remainder of the world by the sheer lack of tools of communication—the capacity to read and write. The foregoing statement omits consideration of others who can read and write but don't. But, this revolution will need to go deeper than the mere furnishing of the mechanics of education. The way will have to be made clear for new and provoking ideas. One of the essential tests of any factor of progress is its capacity to provide mental release. In a general sense, the best mental release is that which proceeds from new and fresh human contacts.

Deeper reflection upon this problem leads one to conclude that Anglo-Saxonism is but one of the involved factors. Race antagonisms are usually far more complex than the superficial contentions of partisans lead us to believe. The New England textile industry is crippled because of a persistent strike. One of the chief claims of the northern textile manufacturer is that he can no longer compete with the mills of the south because of the relatively lower standard of wages. Organized labor is responsible for all of this relative difference of wage scales which cannot be accounted for as competition in the labor market during periods of ascending prices. There is almost no organized labor in the textile mills of the south. It is reasonable to expect that an infiltration of foreign-born operatives from the north might eventually lead to more intensive labor organization in the southern mills. That would mean strikes and a general leveling of labor costs in both sections. Hence, a fairer basis of competition. Meanwhile the southern manufacturers insist that the New England claim concerning unfair labor competition is nothing more than a whine of the defeated. Perhaps the incident has no more significance than added evidence of the disintegration of competitive capitalism from within. At any rate, the textile industry is pathological and is in need of diagnosis. More drastic remedies than Anglo-Saxon mythology will be required.

Dr. Norwood on America

City Temple Preacher Gives Impressions Made by Recent Visit

IT is pure joy to me tonight* to stand again in this pulpit, and I feel it my duty and a privilege to set before you some American impressions and interpretations. No one can visit a great land like America without receiving many vivid and interesting impressions, but a just interpretation of those impressions will require considerable thought, knowledge of history, knowledge of life and, above all, intelligent sympathy. I realize tonight that I am speaking not only to folk who have not visited the United States, but also to many who have been there a great many times, and to a considerable number of American people themselves who will be in a better position than myself probably to estimate the value of my interpretations.

To me it often seemed an advantage during my visit that I happened to have been born and bred an Australian, so that I could be at the same moment a loyal subject of the British empire, and also in intelligent sympathy with the great American republic. I often reminded my audiences that their history and that of my native land were strangely bound up together. Australia began to live in the same decade in which the American people achieved their independence and set up their republic. Indeed the connection was closer, for the sordid fact is that you British people had been bestowing upon the American people a great number of convicts. When they achieved their independence they did not want them any more and you sent them out to Australia. I think you were more generous to them than to us, but with characteristic modesty they do not often mention it!

*Delivered in the City Temple, London, on Sunday evening, July 23, 1922, by Frederick W. Norwood.

But the folk who came to Australia in the early days after that first soiled shipment or two of derelict humanity, were folk in whose hearts were thrilling the same impulses that created the American republic. If you have cared to trace our history you must have observed that its development has been along strictly democratic lines, that it has been essentially republican with this happy distinction, that there has been no clash between the people and the government of the mother-land, and Australia has remained a contented and loyal portion of the British Empire. But in our thought and outlook as well as in our climate and our conscious youth, our insularity born of inexperience and the fascination which the future has rather than the past, we have been even more akin with the American people in many ways than with our own stock in these little grey islands. For my part I have loved the history of the American people as I have loved the history of my own race. Their great outstanding men, their Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, and above all their Lincoln have been as dear to me as if they had been my fellow countrymen. So that with me it was not mere diplomacy, but natural and instinctive sympathy which enabled me to describe myself oftentimes as a younger son of the British empire and a younger brother of the American republic.

MISUNDERSTANDING

Almost all nations believe they are misunderstood by other nations. There are many Americans who think the British do not understand them, there are many British who think they are misunderstood by the Americans. The fact of the matter is that when we visit one another we are first of all conscious of our differences. We pass over our similarities and dwell upon our distinctions. It is only comparatively few people who realize that the differences are like the foam upon the ocean wave and the similarities like the great deeps of the sea itself. Mere closeness of relationship does not mitigate this mutual misunderstanding. There are no differences so great, and sometimes so unbridgeable as those which occur within the family itself. During the war-time it was my constant and consistent observation that every separate unit in the army believed itself misunderstood. There were quite poignant cleavages at times between the men of the overseas dominions and the men of the motherland in spite of close friendships and identity of aim.

Perhaps the very first impression that comes to one on arriving in America is the impression of her wealth. When he steps off the gangway of the great ocean liner at New York the European seems to be in a new world. Everywhere the people are well dressed, nowhere scarcely is the sign of poverty. Of course there is poverty behind the glitter of New York as behind the solidity of London. There are poor people in New York who cannot earn more than eight pounds per week and hardly manage to live upon it, but probably there is no country where the general level of comfort is higher than in the United States. I often told my American friends that America is the millionaire among the nations and then I would remind them that millionaires are seldom popular. That may be prejudice, it may be unfair, but it is very human. Hungry, hard-pressed people almost always have a feeling of resentment towards people who are lapped in luxury, and comparatively speaking America is lapped in luxury and Europe is hungry.

CAPACITY FOR IDEALISM

I used to plead with the American people to see to it that they did not lose the love of other peoples. They do not deserve to lose it. They are most lovable, most generous people. Surely there cannot be a race anywhere upon earth that is more spontaneous in its generosity, is capable of rising to higher heights of philanthropy, has the capacity for more splendid waves of idealism than the great American people. They have many things to their credit. They were the only nation for instance which refused to soil their hands with that dirty Boxer indemnity. They have been magnanimous in their treatment of Cuba and far-seeing in their attitude towards the Phillipines. They have poured millions of money into devastated Europe and the name of America is beautiful in the minds of people who would have starved without her. They do not deserve to lose the goodwill of other races, and yet,—it is a fact that to a great extent America's prosperity rests upon the war. Men do not hesitate to say,—they say it frequently in conversation,—that those years of the world's bitter woe were years when money was easy to make in America. A smitten world turned to her for stores and munitions of war; let it be said for her that when she came into the arena there was no stint concerning money, but it must be remembered that her material gain, so far as coin is material gain, was due very largely to the world's distress. It is no wonder then if the great republic of the west lies for the time being under the shadow of the resentment of many people. I do not think we ought to blame her over-much, we certainly ought not to blame her people as individuals.

There are many people, and many of them are in America itself, who think that the great republic should have come earlier into the war. We knew that we were bleeding while America was becoming our creditor, but it is foolish to be churlish concerning her wealth today. We Britons should remember that there have been many times in our history when Europe has made the same charge against ourselves. It is true to say that the American policy at this moment is quite similar in character with the British policy of the last three or four hundred years.

As far back as the days of Henry VIII it became the acknowledged and deliberate purpose of Great Britain to hold herself aloof from the complications of the continent. Go back to the Napoleonic struggle, the last great struggle which is in any way comparable to the Great War. You remember when the Holy Alliance, the League of Nations of that time was attempted, which also made great professions of good will, it was England who stood aloof and left Europe to welter. It was in those days that the phrase, "The policy of splendid isolation" was coined in England and since those days until the last great struggle it has been the British watch-word. So the American people are only guided by the same motives which actuated our fathers. We may blame them for their aloofness, but let us remember the world has often blamed us for the same thing. Personally, I regret that the United States did not stand in with that great attempt which we call "The League of Nations." It was in her bosom it had been nurtured, it was upon the lips of her leading statesman that the ideal found adequate expression, it was to her that the world turned in its anguish and need. It was not perfect, indeed as we think of it soberly after the passage of several years we cannot help feeling that just as it stood it was impossible of achievement, and yet there are many of us who think that if America had remained in rather than out we might have remedied its anomalies, perfected and intensified its vitality and have been facing the future with greater confidence than we are at this moment.

And yet we must be fair and acknowledge that since nations are not composed of saints, but of ordinary human beings, what happened is not astonishing. The thing to do today is not to gird at one another. We Europeans must give our attention not to the cajoling of America, but to the rehabilitation of Europe. No one looking at Europe from afar could be expected to have any very great desire to meddle in her affairs, and if it is not the ideal attitude it is very natural that America stands aloof. It is our great responsibility to keep on laboring for the readjustment of the European tangle and the finding of a way out of that impasse into which the world's short-sightedness has plunged it and we shall succeed better if we cultivate a spirit of tolerance and goodwill even with the nations who do not see eye to eye with us.

APPROPRIATIONS

There is something fictitious about American wealth after all. If you listen you will hear the dull ring of metal. Thoughtful people are quite conscious that American foreign trade is dwindling away. Europe with her depleted currency cannot easily trade with this powerful nation. There is a Nemesis after all. Piles of wealth hidden away in the coffers of the state are not always a sign that all is well. Sometimes indeed it is a temptation to extravagance. You have not to be long in America before you discern that the obsession of their wealth has paralyzed their judgment. The clamor for government grants is heard in every state as also at Washington. The expenses of government are advancing by leaps and bounds. Out of her very prosperity America is forging the shackles of debt due to reckless demands upon the governing bodies involving the imposition of taxation which will almost strangle her within the next generation or two.

Senator Borah in an able speech made at Washington on July 6th, speaking of these incessant claims for government appropriations, said:

"There are any number of measures of the same general nature pending before the congress and before the state legislatures. If you care to search the files of the congress or survey the activities of the state legislatures you will have no difficulty in discovering at once the peril which confronts us as a people. If all the measures which propose appropriations were passed it would take a mortgage upon the brain and the energy of this people which a thousand years could not lift."

One way or another there is a principle of balance in this old world of ours. The great lesson humanity has to learn in these dark and terrible times is the lesson of its solidarity. For a while, in a specially privileged country, facts may be hidden from the multitude, but in a little longer the economic laws, which are the laws of God after all, will bring home the truth even to the dullest that God has made humanity one, and that the prosperity which seems to be in antagonism with the adversity of others is a fictitious prosperity. Humanity is like the body. No part of it can be happy and wealthy while the other parts are diseased any more than one part of the human frame can be at peace if one of its members be smitten with decay.

RACE PROBLEM

Perhaps the second impression which America makes upon the visitor from England is the impression of its insularity. To one who has been in the habit of reading the English press suddenly dropped down into the midst of the American press it seems as if they had lost the greater part of the world. Local news absorbs the minds of the great majority of the people. America, it seems to me, is self-centred; that is the impression she makes upon the candid stranger. But when one interprets the impression one feels charity. How could it be otherwise? Here is a great country, separated on the right by 3,000 miles of sea from distressed Europe, and on the left by four or five thousand from awaking Asia, a great country whose territories are as wide as the Atlantic Ocean itself. It is as far from New York to San Francisco as it is from New York to Liverpool. A great country, having within herself all the resources which her people need, a great country all a-throb with energy and still tearing open the treasure houses of nature,—it is not surprising if they are possessed with a sense of their own needs and are giving themelves without distraction to the development of their own country.

But yet a little further reflection makes one think that there is no longer in this world such a thing as national insularity. I used sometimes to tell our American friends that I thought they had been a little careless with their Monroe Doctrine. I know they fashioned it in 1825 and by means of it bade Europe keep her hands off. It is true to say that since that time never with her armies or her navies has Europe seriously threatened America, and yet there is more Europe in America than anywhere else. It makes me think of those rabbit proof fences we have in Australia which the farmers insert six inches into the soil so that the rabbits will not be able to get through and ravage the crops. But the rabbit is really a very intelligent creature, and somehow or other, whether accidentally or not, he begins his burrow a bit further back now and eventually gets through without knowing there was a fence there. While it is true that America has held Europe off governmentally, yet Europe has been flooding into America for many years now in its millions. There are more Russians in America now than ever faced the bayonets of the armies of Napoleon. There are more Spaniards, Portugese, Italians, Poles, Frenchmen, Irishmen, Swedes and Negroes than any other country possesses within her borders.

To me as a humble thinking Christian it seems that in the providence of God we are not to be allowed any longer to live in hard and selfish insularity. One way or another the race problem will break in, and in the world today there is no problem so compelling, so overwhelming, so challenging as that of the readjustment of human relations between jangling but inseparable civilizations. In this respect it seems to me that Great Britain and America have the same herculean task. These little grey islands, almost microscopic in size, have become the nerve center of a great empire far flung, comprising almost one quarter of the surface of the globe. Under the shadow of our flag there are grouped at least forty different nations, but America has the same problem between the Atlantic and the Pacific and though these other races do not threaten her with massed armaments yet under the democratic forms of government they form separate "blocks" of people and they are quite aware over there how perplexing is the problem and how great the task. We have no need to throw stones at one another, we have rather need to stretch out hands of sympathy one to the other. We are both in the crucible of Almighty God; and neither one nor the other can eventually survive except as it can find the way of a greater tolerance and breadth of charity and become truly commonwealths of free peoples.

ATTITUDE OF AMERICA

I come now to the last great question I have to ask and attempt to answer, and it is this: What is the attitude of America towards the great question of the peace of the world? I prefer to put it that way rather than ask what is her attitude towards the League of Nations or the Hague convention or any other specific program. I prefer to put it that way rather than ask what is the attitude of America towards Great Britain. After all, why should we expect a completely pleasing answer to that question. Why should we expect that the millions of Spaniards and Russians, Poles, Frenchmen, Irishmen, and others who have been crowding into America for the last fifty years should have the same devotion towards Great Britain as we have ourselves. Were we not Russia's most inveterate foe in the long years following the Crimea? Did we not smite Spain down in the days of her world-wide supremacy? What did we do when Poland was being carved up by the shears of an avaricious Europe? There are blots on our escutcheon with regard to a nation nearer home. One thing I am thankful to say, that never while I was in America did I hear one word about Ireland derogatory to Great Britain, though I do not say there are not quarters where you could hear such things. I remember a friend telling me once that you could gather a crowd of eight or ten thousand any day in Madison Square if you talked about the wrongs of Ireland; I do not think you could do that now. I think there is a feeling that the problem is Ireland's problem and that she must justify herself, and she will. She has not been able to breed statesmen in these stormy years, but only agitators and rebels,—it is no wonder, if when the need for statesmen suddenly arises you have few and the way is blocked by extremists. You must have patience with Ireland, she will win her own way through amid the travail of her soul, but at least we may be thankful that our hands are off her and we have made a definite attempt to give to that people the freedom which they claimed.

THE QUESTION OF PEACE

But still they are there in the great republic, and why should we be continually asking what is the attitude of the United States towards Great Britain? There are some parts of our own empire where that same question could not be answered with great confidence. There is a deeper question than that; it is the question with which I am most concerned, and that is what is the attitude of America with regard to the peace and goodwill of the world? To that question I answer without a trace of hesitation, the heart of that great people beats truly for the peace of the world. There is surely no people anywhere that is less militant in her outlook or more open to the claims of humanity. Again and again, especially in the great universities and colleges, looking into the eyes of young men and young women on the threshold of their lives, I pleaded with them that whatever science they took up or neglected to take up, on no account should they fail to give their best thought and judgment to the problem of world peace. I used to tell them that it was the infant science of the world. It has hardly yet been established as a science. There is not in all the world a text-book which is universally acknowledged as an authority. There has not yet been woven out of the long experience of the race a body of maxims universally accepted, and there is not yet an organized combination of men which is admittedly giving leadership to the whole of the world. We have had the peace treaty of Versailles and the supreme council. We have had the League of Nations, the Washington conference and a whole series of conferences of which that at the Hague is the last up to date, but there is not as yet a recognized body to which the world looks for leadership. No nation has ever yet made peace a part of its policy. What we have called peace has merely been an interval between wars. Every nation has had her war department, no nation has yet had a peace department. Before the war half the revenues of this country were devoted to war expenses; never in the history of any nation has the half of one per cent of the revenue been devoted to peace as W. T. Stead challenged us to do twenty years ago.

All our national insignia, coats of arms and emblems are militant in character. Not until God Almighty allowed us to be half shattered and blasted upon the battlefields of Europe did men seriously wake up to ask themselves whether these complex and ever recurring questions could only be blindly and blatantly settled by the brutality of war or whether there was not a better means of arriving at justice and recognizing human brotherhood.

NEW WORLD COMING

It is the world's infant science. My faith in the hidden purposes of the Great Supreme is that down beneath all the chaos and turmoil of our time is this irresistible divine purpose which is forcing the race to give its brain at last to the problem of human understanding. I believe there is nothing, if the brain of man sufficiently desires it, that will not become eventually possible. I believe that all of us are in the crucible just now. There is in fact only one thing to live for for those who see clearly, and that is the great cause of human brotherhood. All religion that is vital today runs down into that. All politics that are not mere maxims and survivals of a dead past should make that way. All questions of trade and commerce, that do not root themselves at last in the cause of world brotherhood, are spurious questions, vital only because men chatter like monkeys in the forest and do not see and think like the sons of God.

There is a new world coming! It is coming like a day of the Lord. The kingdom is among us and we are being tested in the silent secret fires of fate. All over the world today there is rising up a new nation, a nation which is no longer swayed by national prejudice and by clattering definitions, but a nation that is inter-racial because commonly human. For my part, I have come to it long ago. I will call any man a fellow-countryman who seeks the well being of the race, and I will refuse any man the hand of fellowship though he stand under the shadow of the same flag whose life and whose influence are being given to the disintegration of humanity and to that hideous and brutal thing we call war.

I have come back from the great republic thrilled and cheered because it was manifest to me that everywhere when a man got down beneath the surface and touched the deep human note there was a wondrous response from hearts that had bled. Oh! could I reach the ears of statesmen I would say to them, Tremble, if in your policies you have not any consciousness of that dumb heart of the race that hates you because of your policies of racial division and your shibboleths of a blasted civilization. Tremble if your heart is not beating in unison with the great common heart of man which is demanding peace in these days as never before since the world began.

Can the Church Promote Social Reform?

RECENT reports show that the churches have made striking gains in membership, wealth, generosity and fine buildings. This was true not only last year but it has been true in the last decade. Progress has been substantial and regular, unmarked by a great evangelistic revival of religion, or tidal wave of holiness over the nation. The war seems to have neither brought a wave of deep religious fervor nor any great recession of religious interest. In the old world, however, revolutions in the Central European countries have thrust break-ups through the ecclesiastical lines as well as the political. Adjustments are being made in the church and the state to bring about a more modern and democratic type of organization and creed, for as the toiling masses come into a larger measure of political power they turn away from the churches that were part and parcel of the old monarchical organization, and their labor organizations show distinctive marks of Christian idealism in leadership and in programming. No great social movement gets far without religion in its soul and in a democratic state that religious interest either will reform the old ecclesiastical organization or create new forms to express itself. Even the Russian Soviets are said to be attempting to engineer a "reformation" in religion after the manner of our Protestant reformation in the west. Such a religious reformation is inevitable in Russia whether under Soviet direction or as a spontaneous spiritual movement.

The one outstanding phenomenon in the religious world, from a social standpoint, is the undoubted tendency of the democratic movement to draw away from the established churches. Everywhere they feel that the established churches are too much part and parcel of the old political organization. If the Bolsheviki would change their phrase from "religion is the opiate of the people" to "the orthodox church has been the opiate of the Russian people" they would express an undeniable truth. And the same could be said in Germany and Austria-Hungary. It is quite worth our while to inquire how much basis there is in all countries for the charge of many labor leaders and intellectuals that the churches furnish little more than an opiate for industrial unrest.

Reformation and Redemption

We read very often that Jesus was not a reformer, but a redeemer. Why the antithesis? Is not a redeemer a reformer? Let conversion be as mystical and cataclysmic as it may yet the redeemed man has been reformed or made over. He is the same flesh and blood, the same brain and mind, the same heart and soul, but changed in purpose, ideals and convictions. His reformation may amount to a transformation but transformation is only a high degree of reformation. In our more modern times, under the culturing influences of religious education and character training we have less and less of the mystical and cataclysmic type of conversion and transformation and more and more of the daily reforming of the growing, changing life. The very processes of development are those of reformation for the sake of growth in grace and truth. We grow our Christians as the Master himself grew in grace and wisdom and in favor with God and man—as they grow in stature.

When we have a catacylsmic change in society we call it a revolution. Revolutions are not in high favor as a rule, at least not until they have been won, and even then those who are scions of the old favored orders never grow quite reconciled to them. Periods of reformation and renaissance mark epochs in history; they are forever the glory of the peoples who benefit by them.

Yet the reformer is perpetually looked upon as a common nuisance and a sort of pestilential fellow. He is always trying to change something; if only he would not be trying to make a change we would tolerate his ideals and even read his philosophizings with pleasure, providing of course that he made them entertaining with artistic expression. If he will stick to philosophy and the writing of books, providing the books are profoundly general in their statements, we will support him by large endowments. But when the philosopher turns practical reformer and goes onto the hustings to turn his abstractions into concrete realities he becomes a "hare-brained" radical and a perverter of the established social order.

Safe and Sane

Tom Johnson once disclaimed being a "reformer". He was never anything else but the term was in such disrepute that he sought to stabilize public opinion by the denial. There is a "lunatic fringe" as Roosevelt called those of the more emotional temperament, and their effervescence often makes the sober, sacrificial work of the real reformer difficult. But those who live in ease and profit from the regular and established order of things are usually inclined to look upon every one who works for a reforming of partially developed social attainments into better ways as in the "lunatic fringe". These smug recipients of the best things of the times stand in grave fear of any sort of change that would tamper with their goodly estate. They are an ossified crust, as far to the right of the highway of progress as the "lunatic fringe" is to the left. They may keep the ritual well and artistically but will tell you frankly, when any social change is proposed that looks toward a better social order that "you cannot change human nature"; thus we will always have war, the masses will always be ignorant, men will always drink intoxicants, and social mal-adjustments will always be with us. They believe in the power of the gospel to "convert" an individual but not in its power to transform codes, customs, institutions, social habits or human prejudices—at least not those of our times.

Amos said that he who was prudent will keep silent in such a time. Christ and Amos were not noted for that type of prudence. Neither was looked upon by the officiary of church or state nor by the recipients of the good things of their time as "safe and sane" leaders. But then we are not all Amoses and none of us is Christ. There is a safe and sane method. But it is not the method of do-nothing-ism, nor of dwelling deep under the covers of profundity, nor distilling glittering generalizations nor administering as an "apostle of sweetness and light" while multitudes eat the bread of bitterness. We have turned the priest into the teacher but we have also been inclined to turn the prophet into the institutional administrator.

The Church and Social Reform

Now let us return to the first paragraph in this editorial. Right while the church is greatest in numbers, wealth and generosity the Christian part of the world is plunged into the most terrible cataclysm of death and ruin in the history of mankind. It was not the pagan but the Christian world that indulged in this holocaust of death. The German military machine precipitated the war but Lloyd George says "we all drifted into war". Dr. Rathenau asked whose hands were clean in all Europe though he acknowledged those of the Prussian were reddest. Here in America where there is the largest gain in church numbers and wealth and where generosity outruns all others we are in the midst of inter-necine strife that stops industries, calls out armed guards, puts into the mouths of well dressed citizens the most incendiary remarks about their humbler brothers, and threatens the driving of deep class cleavages into the body politic. A Christian employer recently said "when we seek a better way how much do we get from our pulpits that show us the way and lays upon us the imperative to do it?" Then what happens to the man in the pulpit who puts the imperative into his preaching? Others in the pew warn him to "preach the old Jerusalem gospel."

It is a real dilemna and one not solved by a phrase. How far can the church as an institution go in such troubled times? It is just as human and errant and biased as its leading members. If the membership is all on one side sharp things can be said on that side, but few are willing to either pay or pray there when the pulpit expresses convictions far aside from their own—and their own are usually based upon personal interest. Church history does not do much to convince us that the church as an institution can do much more than administer the moral gains made and registered in the current codes. It usually divides as its members divide on moot issues, such as the abolition of slavery, or becomes advocate as an organized whole when the moral conviction becomes well consolidated, as in temperance reform, or holds aloof until the moral advance is overwhelming, as in political and industrial issues.

One thing seems clear and that is that the spirit of prophecy must be kept alive. The church moves up to consolidate the lines when an advance has been made in social reform. In that there is safety and the assurance of undying victory. But the advance itself must be by those hosts of moral courage within the church who join battle out in the thin front lines where freedom of action is great and the advance is by ones and two and companies until the battle is plotted for the slow, methodical advance of the rank and file.

British Table Talk

London, August, 7, 1922.

At the moment my headquarters are the Free Church Camp for Public Schoolboys, near New Milton, which is on the Hampshire coast facing the Needles. Echoes of the big world become faint before they reach camp. We are a republic complete in itself, a royal nation and a peculiar people. Life becomes a very simple and wonderful thing, when we go to camp—fifty public schoolboys, about a dozen undergraduates, and three or four senior men. Those of us who have had a long experience in these days of "fresh air in the sun and the rain," often wonder whether the secret will one day be lost. But it never is lost. And today there are hundreds of men doing bravely their share of the world's work, who saw the vision splendid in these camps.

A Day in Camp

Bathing, breakfast, and then very brief "chapel"—a hymn, a few words read, two minutes' comment. After the officers' meeting, tent inspection, and then one long round of games and sports, with bathing at every pause. When evening comes, a short football game, and then a riotous sing-song. In the course of this the camp paper for the day is read, "The Needles" is its present name. It is entirely light and aspires to be humorous. I must have written tomes of stuff for such journals—dramas, serial stories, interviews, and other things; none of these gives me more pleasure to remember than a drama in five acts which an old friend and I wrote—he is now a professor, teaching theology—it was called "You Never Know" and was partly in the style of Shakespeare and partly in that of Sophocles. However, age is creeping on, and I am no longer able to do such giant deeds. After sing-song, there is our evening worship in the course of which some officer says a few words upon the things which all of us, even the youngest, know to be the foundation of our little happy society. At no time in the year do we come nearer to the heart of all things. At no time does the eternal Lord become more real and near to us. No attempt is made at buttonholing, but there are a great company now in all parts of the earth, who made vows in camp which they are now translating into service. And every year the number increases of those who have got through into the eternal world, men who have lived in "simpleness and gentleness and honor and clean mirth."

Lord Northcliffe

The reports of Lord Northcliffe's health give very little hope. It is accepted as certain that even if he lives, he will never play his former vigorous part in the public life of the British empire. At such a time it is becoming to dwell upon the achievements of his life, which are not matters of controversy. Without doubt he was a man with an almost uncanny power of reading the public mind, and he built up his position by a life of incomparable industry and efficiency. All journalists agree that he was a journalist to the tips of his fingers. It is more than a quarter of a century since a gifted friend told me that he was leaving his school to join the staff of a new paper, The Daily Mail, pledged to stand for imperialism. Since that day Lord Northcliffe has been a force in Great Britain, which no statesman could ignore, and without question he had a real faith in the British empire. Like Cecil Rhodes in this, he had a genuine idealism, blended with an almost cynical indifference to certain other concerns on which he was content to give the public what it asked of him. Little is known of his religious beliefs, but there is good reason to suppose that he was sympathetic toward the work of the church where it seemed to him to be playing a vital part in the drama of the nation. When Father Dolling was grappling with the problems of East London, he found a good friend in Alfred Harmsworth. If over the story of his public life, he had to choose an inscription he might say:—Write me as one who loved the British empire.

And Other Things

The Sadhu has departed once more for India. He says of Mr. Gandhi that "he is a good man but he is not out for religion, he is out for home rule." The Sadhu puts down some of the difficulties in India to the fact that India had been without any concern till lately in politics, but now some of the interest once given exclusively to religion was now diverted to nationalism. . . . The premiers are meeting today in the latest of our critical conferences. Very few of us know much of "exchanges,,' and there is reason to suppose that even statesmen are floundering out of their depth. The one thing we do seriously want is a stable Europe, which would free us to do our work, but a stable Europe is almost the last thing which we are encouraged to expect. But I hope that no American thinks that we shall fail to pay our debts; the suspicion that this is possible hurts us. We borrowed for the sake of our allies, but shall not dishonor our signatures, even if we are left by our debtors as a disappointed creditor.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Heart of the Scriptures *

HAVING already referred to the event recorded in this lesson, the reading of the law by Ezra; we will go a bit deeper into the significance of the occasion this morning. The people were deeply affected by the illumination of the scriptures. I remember, one summer, going on Sunday morning to divine service on the Mauretania. The captain of the ship, a most unusual man, read the lesson. His voice was deep and rich, his personality powerful, I recall how I was stirred by his reading. Under the spell of that service I went out on deck and wrote one of the best sermons I have ever produced. Now something akin to this, only in a greater degree, happened when the people gathered and heard Ezra read and explain the law ("And they gave the sense".)

But there is more than this, more than mere personality, there is the heart of the scriptures. I cannot think of the people becoming very enthusiastic over rules and regulations, it cannot be that the recitation of statutes and ordinances alone created this profound situation. It was God in it all; it was the deep religious note, and remember that religion means the attempt to live completely, fully. Here was a group of people just back a few months from exile, here was the holy city partly rebuilt, here were enemies outside the gates and perhaps some within, here were families broken by the sending away of foreign wives, here was the setting for a new start, a second chance at life, here was the memory of old sins, the budding of new resolves. Now Ezra brought God to them at this moment, life was focused, direction was given. Those divided, struggling souls were united and harmonized; those inferior feelings were swept away and superior emotions took their places; those unhappy states were changed into blissful satisfactions, in a word, peace with God. It was a conversion experience pure and simple.

They found God; we need to do that same thing. The one hopeful fact in human nature is the hunger for God, instinctive or not; we are made for God and our souls rest only in Him. When we find the essential thing we respond to it. Last week there came into my hand a tract by Gerald B. Smith, my former teacher at the University of Chicago, a man who has helped me, by his remarkable sanity, over many a rough place in the road. The title of this tract is, "A Christian Test of Christianity." He shows how Christians split up into groups, Protestants, Catholics, orthodox, liberals and the like. Each group must be distinguished by an adjective. These adjectives cause all the trouble. It is not enough to be just a plain Christian, but we must be either the kind of Christian who accepts a certain theory of the atonement, or of baptism, or of apostolic succession, or of inspiration. The essential thing is to be a Christian. Either one is or is not that. A certain type of living indicates whether one is or is not a Christian. The Christian test would seem to be found in Jesus' words about ministering. Jesus was surely the Son of God because his life proved it. Nothing else counts. The man in the street considers nothing else. Paul's missionary motive led him to become a great servant. His life proved him a Christian. What type? Who cares for the type when Paul is essentially, vitally a Christian, a man like Christ. In "Painted Windows" a certain bishop is referred to whose mind is brilliant, but who cares little for folks and who does not make you think of Jesus Christ. There is the heart of the business, a Christian must remind you of Christ. Why do you think that St. Francis was a Christian? Do you have any doubts about that? He was a Catholic, well what of it? Why do you call Bishop Gore a saint? Is he not an Episcopalian? Yes, and what of that? Why do you think Shelton, who was killed in Thibet, was a Christian? Why do you doubt the Christianity of some men? Here we are at the heart of the matter. Why not drop all the separating adjectives and just be plain Christians? Why, this would be revolutionary. Lives would count, creeds would fall into the discard. "So shall ye be my disciples, if ye bear much fruit." Demonstrate Christianity.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Religious Services Held on Ellis Island

The Croxton committee on welfare work recently visited Ellis Island, and one of the results of the visit is a program of religious worship on Sunday. Three services will be held each Sunday henceforth. The first is at 9 o'clock, for Roman Catholics. The second is at 10 o'clock, for Protestants, and the third at 11 o'clock, for Jews. The Protestant services are allotted to the various denomination of major strength in New York. The denominations that will provide religious services will be Baptist, Congregationalist, Episcopal, Methodist, Presbyterian and Reformed. The month of July was allotted to the Lutherans and next year this denomination will have two months, February and September.

Bohemians Breaking Away from Rome

The extent of the Protestant movement in Czecho-Slovakia has been variously estimated, but at last definite figures are coming through. The government statistics are being gathered and already a defection of 1,111,343 has been registered. On this basis it is computed that two million people who were enrolled as Roman Catholics in 1910 are now separated from the church. In Greater Prague the Roman Catholic population is now only 53 per cent of the total whereas it was 92 per cent in 1910. The Protestant church has had 19,000 accessions in this city alone. In many other cities the defection has been almost equally marked. The number of those enrolling as without any religion has made a vast increase in the period as well as the membership of Protestant churches. The old system of authority in religion was broken up with the end of the Austria-Hungary empire, and the people are now candidates for a religion.

Mormon Strength in America

The Federal Council of Churches formerly published the strength of Mormonism in this country as 1,647,170. These figures are challenged by the Light on Mormonism, an anti-Mormon journal of Cleveland, O., which asserts that the Utah Mormon organization no longer furnishes statistics and that its strength is 550,000. The Reorganized Church of Latter Day Saints is more generous about statistics and asserts its membership to be 94,000. The Utah Mormons report a net increase last year of 22,779, of which all were children in Mormon homes except 7,113 who were classed as converts. This is probably fewer converts than most people have supposed were made in a single year.

Missionary in Grave Peril

The conditions under which missionaries work in Mohammedan countries are vividly set forth in some recently published letters from Miss Augusta Gudhart, an American Lutheran missionary at Kurdistan. She witnessed last autumn the death of a French Lutheran missionary, Rev. George H. Bachimont, at the hands of soldiers who were bent on extorting money from him. The Kurds stripped Miss Gudhart of every scrap of a garment, and only the fact that she had buried a trunk full of clothes kept her from grave suffering. She was impressed into the duties of a nurse by the authorities, and compelled to sign a letter of thanks to them when she left.

Church Secretaries and Helpers

In these days of developing church activities there are frequent calls for various types of workers to fill positions which the growing life of the larger churches has created. Many pastors are feeling the need of someone to act as personal helper in conducting correspondence, providing material for the church paper, using an addressograph and mimeograph, keeping church files and such other things as are incident to a busy church office. It is usually desirable that such a person be available also for a limited amount of calling and perhaps for some work in the church school. In the past there has been very little call for people in any way trained for such service, but calls are increasing and young women possessing in any degree the qualities necessary would probably find it a very satisfying and rewarding form of Christian service. Doubtless there are people qualified to fill such positions. Certainly there are churches that are calling for such helpers. There is no bureau of information

Chinese Endorse Industrial Standards

AMONG the important actions of the National Christian conference which inaugurated a new era in the history of religion in China, by giving birth to a Chinese church under active leadership, was the elaboration of an industrial policy on the part of the Chinese church. Five commissions were appointed prior to the national gathering. One of these was given the task of working out a statement of the social duty of the church. The report of this commission was the only one which received the consideration of the full assembly.

The indictment of the present system in China was made by Miss Agatha Harrison who said: "Your committee has inquired into the industrial situation here in China and now faces the tremendous fact that with few exceptions the factory system is being built on the bad foundations of child labor, long hours, inadequate wages and working conditions that are a menace to life. Does the church stand for that? For cheap lives and cheap labor? Let us put ourselves in the place of the growing army of men, women and children in industry and view our responsibility from that angle. Can Christianity have any appeal to them if it does not touch a condition which is a negation of Christianity?"

Miss Harrison in speaking in behalf of the commission proposed that the Christian movement in China should stand for at least three things. These she set forth as follows: (1) No employment of children under twelve full years of age. (2) One day's rest in seven. (3) Safeguarding the health of the workers by shortening working hours, improving sanitary conditions, and installing safety devices.

In the report of the commission on the "Message of the Church" given by Dr. T. T. Lew, he said: "We hereby call upon the church to mobilize all her forces to work for the regeneration of the home, of economic conditions, of political standards, of educational, industrial and commercial life, in thought and in practice, through the spiritualizing power of Christ, and to accomplish it at any cost and at whatever sacrifice the church may suffer. We need not enter upon palliative superficial work, but work backed by the principle of the infinite value of each human being. With this international standard as our goal, there is an immense work ahead. The church then can go forward courageously, rallying all its splendid educational, health and social service facilities for dealing with the problem and resolutely planning all its future work in the light of approximating this standard."

The ultimate and hearty endorsement by the entire body, of the three points recommended, marked one of the highest points of the conference. Three days later, the North China Daily News devoted two columns to an editorial on the conference which had then closed. "It is now possible," said the writer, "to gauge, in some measure, the value of its work and to see the trend of its influence on the future of the missionary movement in China. The outstanding feature has been, as we forecast in an article on the subject when the conference opened, the emergence of Chinese leadership in the movement for the Christianization of China. . . . Next to Chinese leadership the most important point discussed was the improvement of the social conditions of those employed in the large factories with especial reference to the interests of women and children." The closing sentence of this editorial is a sober and convincing statement. "If the National Christian conference can expedite the grant of the Magna Charta to Chinese workers, it will not only have justified its existence but will have marked a mile-stone in the progress of reform in China."

Kentucky Presbyterians Want Union

It is in such border states as Kentucky and Missouri that the sectional divisions of the religious denominations are most deprecated. Many towns will have a northern and a southern Presbyterian, Methodist or Baptist church. In the Transylvania Presbytery in Kentucky, the laymen of the National Presbyterian church and of the Southern Presbyterian church have formed a Layman's association to work for the union of the two denominations. At a recent meeting of the association reports were received from the two assemblies with regard to union. The National Presbyterians were reported as having acted sympathetically with regard to the union proposals, but the Southern Presbyterians failed to give a very cordial reception to the proposals.

Presbyterian Secretary Will Go to Orient

Dr. William Hiram Foulkes is secretary of the Presbyterian New Era movement which has been a successful agent in raising large funds for the benevolent work of the denomination. He is being sent to the orient to secure first hand knowledge of the Presbyterian enterprises there, and his itinerary includes the Philippines, Japan, Korea and China. This is his first absence from active service since Dr. Foulkes took up his work with the New Era movement four years ago. He will be back in the United States some time in November. He is also under obligation to visit the Presbyterian enterprises in Europe some time during the coming year.

Racial Question in Process of Solution in South

Long years of racial friction in the south have led to pessimism on the part of many people as to the possibility of any solution, but the organization recently of a Commission on Interracial Cooperation is the first hopeful sign of a solution. Leaders of the two races have come together for conference, and through them a program of peace is being worked out. This commission recently held its annual meeting at Blue Ridge, N. C., John J. Eagan of Atlanta, presiding. Dr. Will W. Alexander, director of the commission, pointed out in the opening address that it has no program of race relationships to put over on any section or community, but that it only suggests a simple and effective plan by which the best people of each state and community may solve their own problems by the method of frank conference and cooperation.

Dollar a Day for a Dollar a Week

Recently the various secretaries of ministerial relief and pension funds met at Kansas City. Prominent in this group was Dr. Joseph B. Hingeley, secretary of the Methodist board. The Methodists, unlike most denominations, have a non-contributory system. The churches must provide for all ministers in the conference, including pastors, superintendents, bishops and retired ministers. If there is a deficit, all classes of ministers share the deficit pro rata. Even with the vast endowment funds of the Methodist church, however, retired ministers receive a sum too small to live on in comfort. Dr. Hingeley is now proposing to graft on his non-contributory system an additional pension plan. He proposes that a minister shall pay into a fund a dollar a week until he is sixty-five and then draw out a dollar a day the rest of his life. Ministers are often victimized by fake investment companies. In this connection Dr. Hingeley says: "Methodist preachers who have made bad investments in order to provide for old age are a great host and are with us today. A smooth agent says that all is right and pictures glittering profits, and soon all is gone. A book advising agents how to promote a certain speculative enterprise classifies the best ministerial prospects in two groups: Presbyterians and Episcopalians, because they receive larger salaries; Methodists and Baptists, the "easy marks." In this age of ecclesiastical Ponzis, and oil stock promoters, a reliable plan for conserving ministers' savings on the basis of strict acturial computation and wide experience would insure them against old age, disability or poverty.

Aeroplane Changes Conditions in Mission Lands

No one appreciates the modern means of travel and communication more than the foreign missionaries. Particularly in Persia have communication and travel been very difficult. Recently the American mission press at Beirut received an order for Christian literature from Mesopotamia in two days, whereas the usual communication would require three months. The order was brought by aeroplane. The radio and the aeroplane will aid greatly in coming years in bringing isolated Christian workers into effective contacts with the outside world.

Presbyterians Use Lantern Slides

The Presbyterians are finding the stereopticon a most helpful means of aiding visualization of the various great common tasks of the denomination. There are now sixteen lecture sets on the work of home missions, the most recent addition being a set on "Navajo Land." The foreign board has fifteen sets besides three short sets for use with juniors. The board of education has three sets, the Board of Missions for Freedmen two, the Board of Publication and Sabbath School Work four, the Board of Temperance and Moral Welfare three, and the New Era movement five. Nine depositories have been established in various parts of the country in order to decrease shipping expense on the slides. During the busy season the slides are in constant use.

An Important Announcement

Boston University School of Religious Education and Social Service announces the publication of an edition of an invaluable manual for pastors, building committees, and Sunday-school workers who are responsible for the building, remodelling or equipping of a church plant or parish house. The manual is entitled:

STANDARDS FOR CITY CHURCH AND RELIGIOUS EDUCATION PLANTS

This book is the work of many architects, builders and religious education specialists. It was prepared at great expense. It contains a wealth of information not obtainable elsewhere.

The book lists 112 essential elements in an ideal church and religious education plant and establishes standards for each item for the guidance of building committees and architects. A score-card has been devised for the measuring of church plants on the basis of the standards. The 112 items are grouped under six headings as follows: I, Site; II, Building or buildings; III, Service Systems; IV, Church Rooms; V, Religious School Rooms; VI, Community Service Rooms.

The preparation of these standards marks an important epoch in the development of church and church school architecture. Building committees and all who are in any way responsible for the building or remodelling of church plants should have this volume. It is bound in boards. Sent postpaid for fifty cents.

THE GOLDEN VANITY

By E. Barrington

This two-part story recounts with great charm and humor the romantic adventures of the Gunning sisters, whose fortunes and whose beauty remain a tradition to this very day.

GEORGE MOORE TALKS WITH CHICAGO

Mr. George Moore wrote the record and sends it to us for printing; but nobody, we understand, has asked Mr. Husband's permission. Perhaps it is fortunate that he is an advertising man.

THE LETTER LAW AND THE GOLDEN RULE

By George W. Alger

Mr. Alger believes that law and public welfare are drawing nearer together. His reasoning is cogent and his argument most interesting.

THE JUNGLE OF THE MIND

In close parallel to the Atlantic's paper on delirium, in the August issue, is this new article telling in vivid detail of the oppressive illusions of insanity, by one who has but recently threaded their mazes. We have been at pains to establish, through competent medical testimony, the accuracy of this remarkable paper.

The Living Age Brings the World to America

—WHAT IS THE LIVING AGE?

THE LIVING AGE is the oldest weekly magazine in America (now published under the auspices of the Atlantic Monthly Company), in which you will find translated, not 'interpreted,' the most able and enlightening discussions of Politics, Finance, Art, Literature, Science and Travel that are to be gleaned from the World Press. In THE LIVING AGE you may read just what the people of Europe and Asia are thinking and talking about from week to week.

WHAT ARE ITS SOURCES OF INFORMATION?

All the periodicals of ALL THE FOREIGN COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD—Great Britain, Ireland, France, Germany, Switzerland, Japan, China, Russia, and the others, large and small—find their way to the office of THE LIVING AGE. There the Editors, each an authority in his own particular field, glean the important news of THE WORLD for you.

WHAT DO ITS READERS SAY OF THE LIVING AGE?

The following comment, just received, is typical: "No other publication that I know of opens so many doors to other lands and literatures as THE LIVING AGE. To read it from week to week is to understand both sides of every international question, to get the best thought of the best minds everywhere, to become truly a citizen of the world."—George Seibel, Editor, Pittsburgh, Pa.

THE MIND IN THE MAKING

By JAMES HARVEY ROBINSON

James Harvey Robinson has done for the mind of man what H. G. Wells did for the history of the world. "The Mind in the Making" is a brief, vividly written outline of the mental experence, heredity, and possibilities of the human race. Suppose you were sitting with your head bent on your knees and your arms clasped around them in a box just large enough to hold you in this position. Suppose it was in your power to make the walls of that box slide back, so that you could stand upright and walk about? The mind of man, if Mr. Robinson is to be believed, is cramped into such a box, and the sides of the box are his own fears, hereditary instincts and inhibitions, irrational beliefs handed down to him by savage ancestors and intense, egotistic hatred of criticism. To read such books as "The Mind in the Making," and follow the lines of thought they suggest, is to feel the walls expand. ($2.50)

PREACHING IN LONDON

By JOSEPH FORT NEWTON

Dr. Newton was known as "A Preacher-Ambassador" when minister at the historic City Temple, London. A noted editor has spoken of him as "an interpreter of England and America to each other." He was never more happily such an "interpreter" than in the pages of this volume, of which he says, by way of introduction: "The City Temple ministry was undertaken as a kind of unofficial ambassadorship of goodwill from the churches of America to the churches of England, and as an adventure in Anglo-American friendship. It was a great privilege to stand at the crossroads of the centuries at such a time, a teacher of Christian faith and an interpreter of the spirit and genius of our country to the motherland. This 'Diary' records observations, impressions and reflections of men, women and movements, of actors still on the stage of affairs, of issues still unsettled, and of beauty spots in one of the loveliest lands on earth." ($1.50).

PAINTED WINDOWS

By "A GENTLEMAN WITH A DUSTER"

With the same facile pen with which he revealed the vices and virtues of England's great and near great in "The Mirrors of Downing Street," and with the same healthy, constructive directness with which he attacked the decadence of modern society in "The Glass of Fashion," the famous "Gentleman" (Harold Begbie) turns his fire on the churches. In "Painted Windows" he shows the present chaotic condition in the churches. He chooses as his vehicle the twelve leading British clergymen of all denominations and through a searching character study of each of them, he turns the spotlight on the strength and weakness of modern church practices. Pulpit and press will take sides with and against "Painted Windows." It will be condemned, criticized, praised and quoted. Everybody who is anybody will read it and discuss it. ($2.50).

MODERN READERS' BIBLE

(Abridged, in Two Volumes)

By PROF. RICHARD G. MOULTON

The first volume, the Old Testament, is just from the press; the second volume, the New Testament, having been published some months ago. The final volume contains six sections and covers the entire Old Testament. By this great work, which has long been a favorite as published in many small volumes, Dr. Moulton has done a world of Bible readers a valuable service. Solely by omission of text that is of the nature of documentary appendices and minor passages whose removal renders the main purpose plainer, Dr. Moulton in these two volumes makes one-third of the Bible text, given word for word, convey the meaning of the Bible's whole contents to the general reader better probably than the complete Bible has ever been able to do it. (Each volume $2.25).

THE EAGLE LIFE

By J. H. JOWETT

There is a never-failing freshness and joyous assurance about everything that Dr. Jowett writes. He draws spiritual refreshment from the springs of the Old Testament even as he draws from the New. Many thousands there be on both sides of the Atlantic who fain would hear this great Christian teacher, but failing this are grateful for his books, to which they turn again and again for sustaining advice and comfort in hours of depression and times of trouble. This new volume of studies in Old Testament texts takes its title from one of the forty-eight chapters. ($1.50).

FIFTY-TWO SHORT SERMONS FOR HOME READING

By W. ROBERTSON NICOLL

This delightful collection of brief sermons by the editor of "The British Weekly" can be used for evening worship in the home. It will also be very suggestive to the minister who is looking for sermon subjects. Dr. Nicoll's unrivalled acquaintance with literature is revealed in these very original and polished little discourses. ($1.75).

The Detachment of the Church

IT is disconcerting that at this critical moment official religion should be so completely detached from the vital issues of our civilization. It is easy now to discern the inherent function of economic forces in the making of our society; with industrial forces at each other's throats civilization cannot survive unless the issues thus brought forward can be resolved. And religion or what is officially recognized as religion, must stand even more remote than government, a silent or at best a fussy spectator of events. The alienation of labor from the church has long been lamented, though all too little has been done about the lamentable fact. The church has maintained an intimate relation to capital. It commands money in ever-enlarging volume, and capitalists rank large and many in its membership. But even its capitalistic affiliations leave it remote from the present industrial crisis, for the contest is only remotely now between capital and labor; it is between labor and management. Management of the industrial program is about as effectually indifferent to the church as is labor. Capitalists, detached and passive stock and bond holders, still show a certain devotion to the church. But it is a side-issue or no issue at all with both of the active forces in the industrial deadlock of today. The church is to a degree alive to social and industrial questions. That is, it supports with a certain dignity and fidelity official investigators who from afar appraise and comment upon the passing phenomena of the industrial conflict. But the active forces give scant heed to such ministry. Women constitute two-thirds of the membership in the churches, and perhaps more than half of its active workers. What women? Particularly and strikingly the leisure-class women. Not, at any rate, the women active in industry. Their detachment from the church is almost as complete as is that of male industrial workers. Official religion thus appears to be a sort of social club of non-producers. And that in a society which is enormously and basically industrial. We have asked so often what the church proposes to do about such an anomalous state of affairs that it seems futile to ask again. The point of comment just now is the new stage in a direction along which we have long been moving. Until recently the church was more or less intimately related to at least one of the active forces in industry. Now its detachment is almost complete. The determining issues of our civilization are being handled by those who, neither on the labor nor on the management side, enter into its councils, and into whose councils it cannot enter. This cannot be the permanent and proper place of religion in a democratic or any other kind of stable society.

The Reopening of the Schools

THE early days of September present the inspiring spectacle of an army of childhood and youth making its way into the portals of the schools and colleges. Nowhere else in the world is this spectacle quite so general and so satisfying. It is true of course that the American people do not measure up to their full responsibilities in the way of devotion to public education. Statistics show that the United States is sixth or seventh in the list of the nations in the matter of literacy. But this does not imply lack of interest on the part of our people. It only means that thus far we have not carried the principle of popular education completely through, and that many sections of the country are still unprovided with efficient means of public instruction. But the number of children and young people thronging to the schools and colleges is greater every year in proportion to the total population, and at the same time the equipment for their educational experience is more ample and more timely. It is an adventure in which all are called upon to participate, for a child's education cannot be achieved apart from definite and considerate interest on the part of his parents and the community in which he lives. Only by the complete cooperation of all factors in the community can we achieve that first-rank place among the nations to which our opportunity and our wealth entitle us; and only in that way can we lift the average of American intelligence from about the sixth grade, where it stands at the present time, to a level really competent and satisfying.

Is the Industrial Atmosphere Clearing?

ALMOST two months have passed since the beginning of the industrial turmoil which has precipitated the utmost confusion in the area of transportation and has left the nation still in doubt as to its fuel supply for the autumn and winter. The president's activity in this emergency has been commendable. With great patience and earnestness he has projected various plans for the solution of these controversies. Thus far one cannot affirm that much headway has been made. Almost every day there has been promise that a settlement was about to be reached, and still the conditions are those of an impasse. The road is blocked by the unwillingness of both capitalism and industry to study the question through and fix upon an equitable method of settlement. Each believes that it is able to crush the other and to secure its own will. The result is that enormous losses are being sustained by both groups, and the burden of infinitely larger losses is falling upon the public, which is always the innocent bystander and the victim of such an argument. The president now turns to Congress in the hope of finding some assistance there, but it is questionable whether Congress, with its many divergent minds, can offer any solution of the question which experts have attempted to settle with the president's assistance. The situation is proof of the fact that we have not gone very far as yet on the way to national adjustment of our most difficult and baffling questions, and that the duty of the church in the emergency grows ever more impressive as offering perhaps the only solution in sight.

The Whole Gospel Includes the Social Gospel

A FALSE antagonism is being created by certain conservative leaders between what they call the social gospel and the gospel for the individual. The whole gospel includes both. The kingdom teaching of Jesus, the various parables about rich men and many other sections of the gospel teaching deal not with the individual man, but with society as a whole. The sacramentarian is of course interested only in his ceremony. The Disciples evangelist is eager to administer the rite of baptism that he may count one more convert, and the Episcopalian high churchman tests himself also by various ritual acts. The rescue mission worker is often satisfied to snatch some brands from the burning without realizing the truth so long taught by Dr. Graham Taylor that thousands in the great cities are under a more terrible fore-ordination than that taught by John Calvin. These are fore-ordained to filth and ignorance and damnation on account of the very conditions of city life. Perhaps a certain type of Christian social worker may have been responsible for the suspicion of the ultra-evangelical. The worker who believes that nothing is necessary to save a man except good food, a pleasant house, and money to spend, has much to learn about life. Every life has its own individual problem to solve. Men must be taught reverence and self-control. They must be shown the great disciplines of prayer, devotion to God, and service to their fellow-men. The whole gospel of Jesus Christ not only includes the feeding of the multitude but it contains the injunction that we must be born from above. One could wish that some of our social workers were more concerned with souls and with the individual need. There is a far deeper need that the conventional church worker should see that he can never make his world Christian without evangelizing conditions as well as men. The man who works in a steel mill twelve hours a day is damned by a great corporation. The comprehensiveness and the catholicity of Jesus would give the church of today much of the power he had among men.

The Woman Preacher and the Churches

PERHAPS the Friends were the first of the modern denominations to permit women preachers, though the Wesleyans in the early history of their movement in England had some women pulpiteers. With their dogma of sex equality, the Quakers saw no ground whatsoever for refusing the ministry of a woman. The Disciples of Christ have from the beginning of their movement had some women preachers, though they have never become numerous. This has not been due so much to any prejudice in the churches as to the lack of women with ministerial training. Probably the colleges in former days gave scant encouragement to women to enter the sacred calling. United Brethren, Methodist Protestants, the Christian Connection and many other small denominations including Unitarians and Universalists, have ordained women. It is only of late that the larger denominations have shown any disposition toward a more generous attitude. Presbyterians and Episcopalians make no provision for the woman preacher, but women are now being licensed in the Methodist Episcopal church. This question must ultimately come back in the end to the question of efficiency. If the churches find a woman leader can command audiences, lead community enterprises and do the work of the ministry acceptably, women will be employed. If on the other hand the long racial experience of woman as a home-maker in any way incapacitates her for public speech, community leadership, and other ministerial functions, she will fall behind in the competition of modern life. The more liberal bodies propose that the question should not be settled by any kind of church law, but by the experience of the churches. Inasmuch as thousands of churches are today without any kind of religious leadership, the experiment with women preachers is bound to be tried in a great many communities, provided any considerable number of women take religious training in the theological seminaries.

Old Thrillers Do Not Thrill

NOT long ago a collection of old time dime novels, including all the classic Diamond Dick dead-shot thrillers, was placed in the New York public library—not, however, without hesitation and unusual caution. Even a certain society whose business it is to protect the public from literary infection was puzzled, but, happily, did nothing more than frown and shake its head. For it was expected that there would be a rush of boys to read the adventures of Hair-breadth Harry and his pals. But, as it turned out, not a boy appeared, as was true when William Allen White arranged a parade of dogs in Emporia, Kansas. The old thrillers were scorned by the new boys. Instead, only men, to the number of more than one thousand, by tally—men middle-aged, dignified, grey-headed—came to inspect the collection; while in the next room a baseball collection attracted, on an average, nine thousand boys a week. What is the meaning of such a phenomenon? Not that boys are no longer boys, but that their interests are different, and they do not go back to the past for their exploits. They turn to baseball, to the out of doors, to radio for adventure, showing how the times change, and all things, even boys, change too; but only in their interests, not in their essential nature. "It's like renewing youth," said a bewhiskered pirate, as he looked fondly at the Beadle books that made his heart beat like a drum in days agone. No, to renew youth we must go forward; and that is no less true of the church.

The End of the Vacation

THE coming of September marks the turn in the road which leads from the vacation days of summer to the strenuous and urgent period of autumn. With the beginning of the fall season, the year actually begins. By a misadventure of the calendar we set our new year's day in the middle of the winter, whereas everybody knows that actually the new year comes with September, and marks the exchange of the leisurely activities and vacation pleasure of the summer for the serious and purposeful work of the autumn. That means that new plans must be devised; it means that programs outlined through the summer or projected in a tentative way during the previous year must be put into operation; it means that the loins must be girt and the lamp lighted for new enterprises; it means that the spirit of adventure and achievement is now stimulated by opportunities and the examples that the autumn season offers. It ought to be the best of years. It ought to be entered upon with satisfaction and enthusiasm. It can be made largely what one wishes by the spirit of consecration to high obligations and the blessing of God.

The Cynical Cunning of the Turk

ACCORDING to reports from the Near East, the madness of Mustapha Kemal in killing off the Christian minorities has a sinister and cynical method in it—devilish in its cunning. For, in every massacre of Greeks and Armenians, so far as possible the young children are spared, and are allowed to take refuge in the orphanages maintained by English and American funds. There they remain until they are twelve or fourteen years of age. Then the Turk takes an interest in their future; the boys are forcibly Islamized—not an impossible feat at that age—and trained for the Turkish army; the girls are sent to harems. For sheer cynical deviltry nothing in recent times has surpassed this method of using the children of Christian parents, kept alive by Christian mercy, to swell the ranks of Turkish armies and harems. All of which shows how futile it is to hope for relief for Armenia until the political power of the Turk is broken, as the allies promised to do at the end of the war. But the Turk is master of an infernal cunning, an adept in playing one nation off against another, appealing the while to the greasy greed of each, to accomplish his ends. So the ghastly crucifixion of Armenia drags on indefinitely, a martyrdom unparalleled in the annals of humanity, both in its terror and its long-drawn horror, witnessed by a "Christian" world tied by its own selfishness, and ham-strung by the cunning of the unspeakable Turk.

Unethical Religion

IN the closing chapter of a collection of very incisive essays on our industrial age, the author declares a conviction which is now being so generally shared as to constitute a veritable revival of religion among publicists, namely, that the supreme need of the age is not fundamental material structure, nor managerial efficiency, nor other mechanical features of the industrial order, but rather the application of the impulses and realities of religion. But this author goes far towards spoiling an otherwise powerful presentation by quoting with apparent approval an energetic captain of industry to the effect that what holds him in leash, restrains him from the scandalous brigandage which our economic order permits and in which hosts of his associates freely indulge, is not regard for the laws of the land, not sensitive consideration for the rights of others, not beautiful theories about society and the duty of the individual to the community, but finally and conclusively what he styles old-fashioned, straight religion.

It would be interesting to make a thorough analysis of this industrial magnate's psychological processes. Something is at work in him which he is pleased to call religion, and which the mentors of his youth doubtless also esteemed to be religion. What is it? In less hackneyed phrase, what is the spiritual or psychical impulse which restrains and guides him? Is it fear of an avenging deity? What is he apprehensive that his deity will take vengeance on him for? Is his the same deity who offers the assurance that "inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me?" Manifestly not, for, according to his own statement, no such considerations move him. Is he applying to his daily experiences certain rigid formulas of conduct strictly inculcated in his youth, and fixed upon his early plastic memory so indelibly that they now persist as the measure and standard by which duty is gauged? Perhaps so. This conclusion would seem to harmonize with his declarations.

But, presumably, he is fairly well advanced in years. Are the mottoes and copy-book formulas of 1882 the conclusive and sufficient guide of a citizen who holds under his control delicate and tremendous economic and social forces in the industry of the American republic in the year of grace 1922? Of course, we are all convinced that certain ethical and religious principles are fixed and inflexible. They are as good for 1882 or 222 as for 1922. But the query is worth repeating, Is a religion formulated in maxims and mottoes current forty years ago the kind of religion we expect to renovate our enormously complicated and highly sensitized industrial civilization of today? If our industrial magnate is not applying his formulas in recognition of the rights of his fellow-citizens, and his duty as an intelligent member of an increasingly complex community, what is the test by which their vitality and sufficiency is being determined? Do they gain their sanctions alone from the circumstance that instructors, parental or other, under whose tutelage he chanced to fall as a youth, were pleased to advance them as the soul and essence of religion? This would seem perilous, or at least short of conclusive, when the religious pedagogy of four decades ago is scrutinized. Perhaps he fell into the hands of wise tutors, and perhaps he didn't. The bare chance that he did would seem an insecure basis for his so confident assurance, and, what is more to the point in the reckonings of society, would seem a hazardous guarantee of his sufficiency as an arbiter of economic destinies which our publicists are rightly discovering to be seriously imperilled by the lack of religion.

Because this lack is so manifest and so serious, it is important that we avail ourselves of religious impulses and forces which shall actually measure up to the momentous demands of our society. If there is any revelation of history more plain than another it is that dependence upon the injunctions of an unethical religion are disastrous. Of all ages in humanity's progress, the present would seem the one which could least well dispense with this prime quality in saving religion. Surely none of our publicists wishes to delude himself and the rest of us into the hope that virtue will be found for today in a code which puts full-grown captains of industry under rules of thumb, leaves them heartless and unafraid before the sacrilege upon common human rights in industry, permits them to remain oblivious to the deepening and widening sense of obligation of the individual to society as the holy brotherhood, or comfortable in any of the assurances of a religion which divorces its formulas from the needs and aspirations and malignant injustices of the human fellowship of this day. Let us go on, now that we are started, in the assurance that religion is the great need of our day, and find a religion which will sincerely and bravely face the obligations of a social order in which righteousness, and justice of man towards man, and love of brother of whatever rank or station, shall inspire all of its sanctions and crown all of its impulses and achievements.

Who Are the Spiritual?

ONE of the most misunderstood and overworked terms in the vocabulary of religion is the word "spiritual." It has been employed in all the periods of church history to denote certain qualities that were supposed to be attractive, desirable and unusual, qualities that marked particular individuals as possessing the graces of the Christian life in a unique manner. Some eminent saints have been credited with the quality of spirituality in a superior degree, and there are people in nearly every group who acquire the reputation of being spiritual in virtue of certain elements of personality which they exhibit.

What is it that marks an individual as spiritual? As generally defined it would be a combination of qualities such as would include mildness of spirit, amiability, a manner that conveys the impression of piety, the air of an emotional enjoyment of religious experience, a certain fervor of utterance on themes connected with the holy life, a touch of saintliness in language and behavior.

Are these really the qualities that define spirituality? Might not one exhibit all of these traits of character, and still be far from the possession and manifestation of the spiritual life, as it is portrayed in the sources of the Christian religion, and in the literature of the holy life? Is not something much more vigorous and efficient demanded as a definition of spirituality than the mild and mannered emotionalism which so frequently passes under that term?

Perhaps it is not possible to put into a single category all the elements that go to make up the spiritual man. The term eludes definition by its very fulness of meaning. It is the inclusive description of the noblest and strongest factors in the Christian character. It is the sum of the elements that makes one an efficient interpreter of the ideals and the program of Jesus in the world. One would have to labor long and seriously to contrive a definition that would pass muster for so lofty and all-inclusive a quality. Yet it may be possible to set down some of the constituent items included in this term.

The spiritual man is the intelligent man. The men and women of whom this quality could be affirmed in special degree have been those whose minds were trained by all the apparatus of education at their disposal. If the spiritual leaders of the ages have not been the great scholars they have at least availed themselves of all the values of self-discipline, so that their knowledge has been matured and certified, and their capacity for long and vigorous thinking has been brought to competence. It would be quite impossible to substitute any amount of amiable good will and emotional fervor for the robust and sterling qualities which hard and patient study contribute to character.

The spiritual man is one who is marked by an inclusiveness of interest which makes him as open-minded and hospitable to truth as the great souls have ever been. He is eager to know all the facts, and to be emancipated from the danger of narrowness and prejudice. That is the reason why the men of most marked spirituality have never been happy in the limitations of parties, sects and factions. There is something incompatible between partisanship and the spiritual mind. This is the point at which so many admirable men fail, and barely fail, in the realization of spirituality. They have piety, unction, emotion, and a flow of holy speech. But too often these are discovered to coexist with narrowness of mind, prejudice against men of other points of view, and incapacity for real cooperation.

The spiritual man is marked by purity of motive. He has the mind of the spirit, which is the mind of Christ. He is incapable of selfishness. He asks nothing for himself, but everything for the cause of righteousness in the world. Like Paul he can discern only one great objective, and that not the success of his party or clan but the expansion of the truth to which he has devoted his life. Like St. Francis no other appeal is comparable to that which urges him forward in the divine adventure of realizing for himself and his fellowmen the ideals of the kingdom of God. This does not mean that he must live an ethereal life, out of all contact with the common things of the social and industrial order in which he lives. It means rather that these common things are by him invested with eternal interests, and he is incapable of making them the absorbing theme of his soul. His spiritual attitude will be entirely consistent with cheerfulness, and leadership in all worthful adventures of domestic or community life. He need be no recluse; he cannot be a misanthrope. But his ability to bring happiness to others will be all the greater for his purity of motive, which sets above all other considerations for him the great objectives of the kingdom of God.

The spiritual man has a firm faith in the divine purpose as it discloses itself through the centuries. That is the reason he cannot be a pessimist. For the same reason he cannot be a victim of any of the theologies of despair, like literalism, fundamentalism or millenarianism. When men tell him that the world is growing worse, and that the end is about to be reached, he has but to summon his reserves of knowledge, and reflect that the same voices of depression have been raised with the same futility in all the previous ages of the growing world. Spirituality is incompatible with doubt, discouragement, pessimism. Men have sometimes gained the reputation of being spiritual because they exhibted always the marks of gloom. But it was not the sign of a spiritual nature half as much as a bad temper or a poor digestion. No one can carry the tokens of a shadowed, gloomy spirit who has entered loyally into the majestic plans of God for the world. Those plans have not gone far as yet toward their realization, because the world is very young and crude as yet. But they are on their way, and the church of Christ is the interpreter of those plans, and their guarantor.

The spiritual man is the one with clear and trained mind, breadth of interest that is all-inclusive and in no manner parochial, purity of motive that discriminates between the first rank things and the second best, and confident faith in the expanding and triumphant purpose of God disclosing itself through the ages. Add to these qualities whatever of gentleness of spirit, amiability of behavior, fervor of speech and depth of religious emotion you will, but know that the great saints, the real moral leaders of the ages, have never substituted the softer qualities for the more substantial ones. They have been the men in whose natures the trained mind, the broad vision, and the disciplined will have taken precedence over the emotional nature and the play of pietism. The day of the spiritual has not passed. It is needed as truly today as in former years. It is as truly present in the church as in the centuries of the saints. If it is submitted to more critical assessment than formerly, it is only because it is too valuable to be misinterpreted, and too much in danger of being overlooked if it does not appear in the conventional guise of a less discerning generation. A fresh study of the Christian sources will reveal the essentials of the spiritual life. It will also make plain the fact that these essential elements of spirituality are the qualities most needed in our own time.

The Approach to Perfection

A Parable of Safed the Sage

ONCE upon a time there was a man who said within himself, Go to, I will buy an Automobile. And he bought one which cost him three sixty five f. o. b. Detroit. And it got him where he desired to go, and it got him back, and he got his money's worth out of it. But his friends joshed him, and inquired how he was getting on in his courtship of Lizzie, and the time came when he thought that he could afford something better than a Ford. And he spent more money and got another car, though whether he got a better one I know not.

For I hold this to the credit of Henry, that he took what was in danger of being a rich man's toy, and made it so that the Automobile is not the badge of a Class Distinction in America. And for that he deserveth a Star in his Crown, and whatever there is for him in this Free Advertisement.

Then after a space of two years did this man weary of his more expensive Car, and he said, I have run that thing two years, and the Ford three, and it is time I had a Real Car. And he inquired the price of the Very Latest Model of the Most Expensive Car. And he bought it from his Local Dealer at a good round price f. o. b. Detroit. And he said, I will run up to Detroit, and save Freight on the thing. For this do men offset a large extravagance with a Small Economy. So he went thither, and he got his New Shiny Car. And he was introduced to the President of the Company.

And as he got in, and took hold of the wheel, and set his foot ready to step on the Gas, he said unto the President, I suppose thou now dost feel that this Latest New Model of the Best Car in the World hath reached Perfection in the manufacture of Automobiles?

And the President of the Company answered and said unto him:

Thinkest thou that the Bulky, Clumsy, Noisy, Expensive Junk we now are selling to thee is Perfection? Forget it. When we learn how to make a car that combineth all the good points of all the cars now made, in a machine that shall weigh Less than a Thousand Pounds, and sell for Less than a Thousand dollars, and run an Hundred and fifty miles on a Gallon of Gasoline, then we shall be entering upon the beginnings of discovery as to the Manufacture of Automobiles. Think not that we are near Perfection. Thine Automobile is as good a car as is made; but it will soon be as Obsolete as an High-Wheel Bicycle.

Now I considered this matter, and I said unto myself, There are folk who claim Perfection, and think they have attained it; but the folk I know who seem to me to be nearest unto perfection cry out in their humility, God be merciful to me a sinner. And I think Perfection both in Automobiles and in Character is to be attained by those who know that they lack it.

And the next best thing to Perfection is Progress.

VERSE

Poetry

GOD made the world with rhythm and rhyme:
He set the sun against the moon;
He swung the stars to beat in time,
And sang the universe in tune;
He gave the seas their mighty tongue;
He gave the wind its lyric wings—
And the exulting soul of song
Was woven through the heart of things.

Today this wonder was revealed
In singing colors, swift and plain.
I heard it in a daisy-field,
Under the downbeat of the rain;
The surging streets repeated it;
The cars intoned it as they ran—
And then I saw how closely knit
Were God and Poetry with man.

Prayer

GOD, though this life is but a wraith,
Although we know not what we use,
Although we grope with little faith,
Give me the heart to fight—and lose.

Ever insurgent let me be,
Make me more daring than devout;
From sleek contentment keep me free,
And fill me with a buoyant doubt.

Open my eyes to visions girt
With beauty, and with wonder lit—
But let me always see the dirt,
And all that spawn and die in it.

Open my ears to music; let Me thrill with Spring's first flutes and drums—
But never let me dare forget
The bitter ballads of the slums.

From compromise and things half-done,
Keep me, with stern and stubborn pride;
And when, at last, the fight is won,
God, keep me still unsatisfied.

LOUIS UNTERMEYER.

The Last Adventure

ALL forms of life are endless; each frail vase
Is emptied o'er and o'er—but filled again;
And never tangled is the wondrous maze
Of nature's melodies through endless days—
And yet forever new and sweet to men.

Gleams hint that life upon some future waits;
The worm cannot forecast the butterfly—
And yet the transformation but creates
A step in the same Nature which now mates
Our own—and may life's mystery untie.

Mayhap the butterfly this message brings:—
"The law, uncomprehended, I obey;
Although the lowliest of earth-bred things,
Even I have been reborn with urgent wings,
And heavenward fly—who crept but yesterday."

In life's fair mansion I am but a guest;
And life will bring fulfillment of the gleam.
I trust this last adventure is the best,
The crowning of this earthly life's behest,
The consummation of the poet's dream.

If We Have Not Learned

IF we have not learned that God is in man,
And man in God again;
That to love thy God is to love thy brother,
And to serve the Lord is to serve each other—
Then Christ was born in vain!

If we have not learned that one man's life
In all men's lives again;
That each man's battle, fought alone,
Is won or lost for everyone—
Then Christ hath lived in vain!

If we have not learned that death's no break
In life's unceasing chain;
That the work in one man well begun
In others is finished, by others is done—
Then Christ hath died in vain!

The Social Gospel in the Country Community

By C. M. McConnell

THE social gospel was being discussed recently in a country store and one of the store box saints directed this remark to the pastor, "What we want you to preach is Christ and Him Crucified." To this was added the further advice that an old fashioned revival was sadly needed. With this we most heartily agreed, for the saint giving the advice lived in a new house with a bath room, a water system, a power washer, and other modern conveniences, while the tenant on his farm lived in a little, unpainted, unsightly, old fashioned house on one hundred and seventy dollars a year. The "him crucified" should have referred to the tenant. Yes, a revival was in order there, with a good mourner's bench and a social gospel interpreting the social teachings of Jesus.

Today we received a letter from a thoroughly good Christian who lives in a community where the majority of the church members claim they have not sinned for years and where holiness has fairly reeked for thirty years. In the letter this comment is made, "We are moving along about as we have moved for the last thirty years or more in the church, wrangling within and wrangling without, biting and devouring each other. This time the Sunday school picnic occurs at the time of the camp meeting, which gives offence to some who do not believe in picnics for the Sunday school." If anyone thinks the social gospel is not needed in the average country community he should visit any country community and find out the facts.

PERSONAL EXPERIENCES

The farmer has taken his religion pretty seriously. He has been face to face with the great forces of nature and has wrestled with them in his struggle for a living. This grim battle with the sunshine and the rain, the hail and the cyclone, drought and blight as well as the soil itself has developed a sense of the power of God. The farmer is strong in his faith in God and as one shrewd farmer remarked to me at the close of an autumn day when the sun was sinking below the western pasture field, "It always seems to me that the farmer can come a wee bit closer to his creator than any one else can." In the average country there is a deep piety and a rigorous and vigorous type of religious life. Much is made of the observance of conventional worship and the doctrines and creeds are held with a surprising tenacity. The commandment to love God is the first one the farmer obeys and if that were all the gospel involved, the country community might well be regarded as on the way toward salvation. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" implies a social gospel. The theology for the social gospel will be necessary as a corrective for the varieties of belief which now plague the country community.

Personal religious experiences which mean much to country folks have a social significance. "For their sakes I sanctify myself" implies a social motive for this much abused doctrine. It would be interesting to attend an experience meeting where those for whose sakes we have been sanctified gave testimony of our experience. It is a test of our faith to believe in God whom we have not seen but it is often a severer test of our faith to believe in some neighbors whom we have seen too frequently. To include in the list of neighbors we must love as ourselves the one with whom we quarrelled over the line fence and the dealer who undersells us is a kind of doctrine which may not be popular. In the country community where life is lived in an open and transparent way the application of the gospel to every human relationship is no easy thing to do. If we are to have a new social order which is Christian throughout this difficult task will have to be accomplished.

ATTITUDE TOWARD LAW

The social gospel must be applied not only to the relations between individuals under the terms of the commandment to love our neighbors as ourselves, but all of our laws and customs and the very structure of our community life will also have to be tested by this same commandment and its implications. If the rural social order were fixed and unchanging from one generation to another there would be little value in any consideration of our Christian duty in respect to the conditions under which we live. Laws are continually changed by amendment or repeal. Customs are subject to the changes in the industry and population of the community. The speed regulation of ox carts must be changed for automobiles. A host of new social sins have emerged from the conditions existing in rural life of today and we need to consider them as carefully as we ever weighed the personal sins of individuals.

The state is a rather fixed social order. We have nailed down some customs and have made them law by a vote of the majority of citizens in the local community or nation. The value of these laws to the community can not be estimated. Without them the community would be helpless in a chronic state of anarchy. The social gospel takes account of laws and tests their humanity continually. Human rights must be placed above property rights in the making of laws in a country community. Legislatures must give as much consideration to human beings as to hogs and cattle. We are sorely in need of some good legislation touching child labor in the country, compulsory school attendance, tenantry, health and sanitation and other great human considerations.

The attitude of the individual to the state and its laws and officials is subject to consideration by the advocates of the social gospel. Some backward country communities are practically without the law. In an eastern mountain neighborhood the marriage laws have been largely set aside and along one country road two miles in length there are eleven families living under a common law marriage. The isolation of the farm offers a temptation to the bootlegger and many a barn is a home brewery. Law enforcement is difficult when the officials are called upon to arrest neighbors. The financial inducements for office holders in country communities are so small that few care to hold office. As a result the government of the community is in the hands of the unfit all too frequently and there are small town bosses who would make a ward politician of a city shed tears of envy. Witness the vote selling in an Ohio county a few years ago where two-thirds of the voters were disfranchised.

We do not mean sharply to criticize the citizens of the country or point them out as the chief of sinners for they are not alone in this attitude. On the whole the rural communities have the safeguards of the moral interests of the nation and credit is due these stalwart defenders of righteousness at the polls on many an occasion when the cause seemed lost. We are here calling attention to the fact that the farmer is a powerful factor in law making and such power is only safe in the hands of men who are converts to the social gospel of Jesus. Good citizens can not read their Bible and pray and attend church and then husk corn on election day or worse than that vote the party ticket with the same devotion they give to their church. In the days of farm blocs and powerful lobbies for farm organizations it ill befits us to overlook the social gospel for the country community. There is grave danger that the leadership of the political life of the community and nation be allowed to go into the hands of those who have a selfish motive.

CHILD LABOR

The other day the supreme court of the United States declared the child labor law unconstitutional. How many of us overlooked this decision as we scanned the paper for the price of hogs? A great many of us who did read it probably sighed a passing sigh of sympathy for the children in the dusty, whizzing cotton mills, or for the breaker boys at the coal mines. At any rate we did not recognize at once our share in this decision. Now we do not want to give the impression that farm boys and girls should be pampered and protected and allowed to grow up in idleness and ease. We appreciate full well the value and necessity of work, both for the child and the farm. At the same time we have not overlooked the boys and girls who have been kept out of school to work on the farm by some good, religious parents. We can point to many a pinched-faced, under-developed boy and girl who have had the life worked out of them in the corn field or cotton field to save a hand.

All of this has been within the law both of the court house and custom. Colts run in the pasture until their muscles harden and their backs can stand the strain of work. Boys on some farms are harnessed up to tasks far beyond their strength and years or at the expense of schooling. There are over a quarter of a million children between ten and fifteen years of age who are "farm laborers working out" and over a million children between ten and fifteen years who are "farm laborers on the home farm." We do not make such a ridiculous statement that the work done by these children is all harmful or that they are in need of legal protection. We do hold, however, that too many of these thousands of rural children are being deprived of the very fundamentals of childhood and that some are actually exploited. Investigations carried on in cranberry bogs, sugar beet fields, and cotton fields, proves that the above conclusion is based on actual facts.

MORAL DANGER

Our chief interest here lies in the relations of child labor to the spiritual life of the children on the farms and in the villages. Anything that interferes with the development of the body or mind of the child is a moral handicap. In the long hours and hard, heavy work of the farm, with its lack of wholesome recreation and social life, there is a moral danger which must be faced. We can safely say that country child labor in large sections of the United States today carries with it a real denial of education. We have thought that illiteracy in the United States was chiefly in foreign born sections. This is a mistake, for the foreign born are chiefly in cities and illiteracy is greater in the country than in the city. Literacy in this case is the ability to write; when we consider that the smallest country school can teach that it is clear that the children where illiteracy is common are simply not sent to school. We have here a situation which law, custom and an enlightened community conscience can well take into account.

There is a "labor and capital" situation on the farm and in every community. We have merely hinted at the child labor problems which arise out of the employment of children on the farm. This labor problem is one that has also to do with the seasonal laborers, the hired hand and the tenant. A living wage and human working hours and conditions are possible in farm labor. The hired man is entitled to a chance to develop his human and spiritual capacities. The British labor party has adopted a policy for agriculture which may not interest us now, but the time will come when the farmers will have to face the same problems. We can agree surely with this, "The party holds that the securing, to every agricultural laborer, of an adequate living wage, continuously sufficient for the full and healthy maintenance of himself and family is of first importance."

The increase of tenantry in the United States in recent years is something that gives us all a great deal of concern. We are not here comparing tenants and landlords as to their personal worth, nor are we making any class distinctions. On this score we hold that there is no difference. The last census shows thirty-eight per cent of renters on farms in the United States. The effect of this on the community is serious. Consider the short tenure, two years on the average, and consider what this means in the building up of a community. What does it matter if we move out of a community quickly and easily? In this case we have a break down of homes, schools, churches, and community life. Families have no loyalty to speak of under such conditions, for as a shrewd writer has put it, "It takes a heap of living to make a home."

Just about the time a tenant family gets settled and acquainted the term of renting is over and the stakes are pulled for another move. A stable, permanent community life cannot be built in this manner. Our present tenantry laws and customs give little or no incentive for a tenant to improve the soil. Some new system will have to be worked out whereby the tenant can have a more secure tenure and also share in the permanent improvement of the soil. The relations of tenant and owner have to come under Christian influences and must be reviewed by the Christian conscience of the community. There is here a fine opportunity for the practice of Christian justice and unselfishness.

Our present system of marketing of farm products is wasteful and competitive. It is little short of a sin against God and men to have a crop rot in the ground fifty miles from hungry people. The cornering of the market in food is just as bad. The wasteful methods of distribution and marketing are the outgrowth of the conditions of yesterday in the country and have no place in modern times. We need a new system of marketing which will bring a fairer return of the sale price to the producer and a more just distribution of products to the consumers. In all of this the farmers can make a contribution to the Christian spirit of the community. There is no use to try cooperation in marketing or production until it has been founded upon the great principles of justice and brotherhood and unselfishness of Christianity. These are the very fundamentals of cooperation and they have to be taught by every institution of the community if any progress is to be expected in Christian cooperation in the marketing and distribution of farm products.

PROPERTY

Property is the storm center of the social and economic order both in country and city these days. The things we possess and our attitude toward them are in fact the great tests we have to face in our Christian living. The rights of property too many times overshadow the rights of human beings. Property can hardly be said to have rights at all in comparison with human rights. The right to hold property as a steward is not questioned. For convenience and stability we need some arrangement whereby we can own things in our own right. Every bird has his own feathers and every horse his own hoof. To add hoof to hoof and feathers to feathers at the expense of the other birds is where the issue arises. To add acre to acre and pile up possessions is the practice which now needs revision at the hands of those who must live in country and village.

Property has enslaved us and there can be little religious spirit in a country community where the chief concern is the making of money. This is a more dangerous type of worldliness than the amusement tendency. Jesus pointed to the solution of this problem in the words he spoke to the rich young ruler and on many an occasion he set forth the principle of Christian stewardship. We are merely the stewards of our possessions and we can only hold them as trustees for the community and for those who look to us for help. A correct Christian attitude toward property would go further toward the creation of a Christian community than any other one thing.

Jesus taught us to pray "Thy kingdom come in earth as it is in heaven." The social gospel in the country community means the bringing in of this kingdom of cooperation, love and brotherhood.

Opium Religion

By Arthur B. Rhinow

We necessarily treat the news coming from Russia with reserve. If all the reports coming from that land of gloom and mystery were true, Mr. Lenin has more lives than a cat. But there is no reason why we should not comment on the news. Sermons have been preached on texts whose authenticity is questioned by the critics.

We are told that placards have been displayed in Russia, telling the people that religion is the opium of the mind. Therefore discard religion.

This has shocked many, and it certainly is a striking expression. The propaganda department of the Soviet seems to be efficient. What would it not do in case of war? We pity the enemy as we stop to think of it. For example, a slogan like "Kill the Calf," meaning the golden calf, a gentle innuendo against plutocracy; to which the other side might reply with "Bare the Beast," offering an opportunity for acrid punning. Then, indeed, would the leaders regret having disparaged religion. For a certain kind of religion has always been a factor in mesmerizing the masses into cannon-fodder bravery. Think of what they might draw on in the apocalypse in preparing for world conquest.

All this I ponder as I leaned back in the old morris chair, and my eyes began to blink. There were shadows on the wall, and presently I became aware that my old friend, the Guide in many reveries, was with me. We know each other too well to indulge in effusive greeting.

"Surely that is a false statement," I asserted inquiringly.

He knew I referred to the statement that religion is the opium of the mind. He seems to understand me so much more readily than others. He smiled.

"Come with me," he said, "and I'll answer you."

In a moment I was in a study. A slender young clergyman sat in a chair, and looked up eagerly at his brother minister, who was turning the leaves of a book aimlessly.

"That is one of my textbooks," the young man volunteered. "I matriculated today, and the course begins on Monday. We shall take up the modern trend of philosophy."

The other man frowned.

"What do you want to take up such studies for?" he asked, with towering authority. "You have the whole truth in the Bible. Don't bother about anything else."

The Guide looked at me, and I began to understand.

"That is opium religion," he said. "He has lost the open mind, and with it the open soul. His assurance is narcotic. Who knows only the Bible, does not know it. The Bible touches all of life, and all of life touches the Bible."

Suddenly the scene was changed. The interior of a magnificent church. Arches and domes and beautiful windows. Candles and incense. Now the people bow the head and repeat the Lord's Prayer. After the Amen, one almost hears a pious sigh sweep over the entire congregation, and yet nobody has given thought to the petition of the prayer.

The Guide turned and our eyes met. I understood. That was opium.

He took me into a large room. Many articles were there. Fetishes, totems, idols, amulets. And all along the sides were shelves and shelves of books, most of them looking like editions de luxe, and all of them covered with dust.

"What are they?" I inquired.

"Those are Bibles that are never opened," he informed me. "Their owners believe they are religious and under the care of Providence because they have a Bible in the house."

I nodded. I understood.

Next I was taken to a little garret room, poorly furnished. Before a book sat a man who was reading like one famished. As he looked up, I saw that his cheeks were flushed, and his eyes were aglow with bigotry. Presently a little woman entered the room. She looked spent. He raised his head, and I interpreted the expression on his face as a mixture of resentment at having been disturbed and the pleasure of seeing his wife.

"Ah, if you knew what beautiful thoughts are in this book," he said ecstatically. "They are heavenly."

"Beautiful thoughts!" she inveighed, as in desperation. "Why don't your beautiful thoughts make you do something? Your religion just makes you drunk. And I must make a living for you."

Then the Guide took me to a portrait gallery. It was peculiar in that every portrait looked like a picture of Siamese twins. One face was proudly poised on fine shoulders, every line indicating confidence and initiative; while the other face, of the same man, was expressive of servile yielding and imitation.

I asked for an explanation.

"These are men who are successful in their professions. There they think for themselves. They have individual opinions on matters of politics and sport and business; but on matters of religion they do not think for themselves. In that realm their pet mottoes are: "My father and my grandfather were Methodists ,and that's why I'm one." "The church says so; that settles it." "The priest says so; I accept." "This passage of Scripture is enough for me."

It was an interesting gallery; but we could not stay.

Next I beheld a man leaning languidly against a tree on a very high precipice. Before him in the valley lay the city. On one side of the stream were mansions; on the other hovels. There was hauteur and hatred and crime. In the far distance a battle was being fought.

But the man saw none of these. His mind was fixed on a vision of peace and bliss he saw in the sky; and he muttered to himself, "This alone is real."

We seemed to travel through the air. Then I saw millions and millions of people. They looked like sheep having no shepherd. They could neither read nor write. On their faces I saw the expression of stupid piety. Priests and monks moved among them. They were dressed in long robes, and some of the people tried to kiss the hems of their garments.

"This is called the God-fearing people," the Guide remarked.

"Why, this is Russia," I exclaimed.

And I awoke.

A Journalistic Genius

By Lynn Harold Hough

Following is the second of a series of impressions of various English personalities written by Dr. Lynn Harold Hough, pastor of the Central M. E. church, Detroit, Mich., who is touring Europe.—The Editor.

ONE does not see Sir William Robertson Nicoll in London this summer. He is in his own land—in Aberdeenshire. But when one enters the offices of that powerful organ of public opinion, The British Weekly, one seems to sense the presence of the masterful journalist who has guided its destinies for thirty-eight years. Once William T. Stead declared if anybody should tell him that W. Robertson Nicoll could play a violin standing on his head he would at once reply that no doubt it was true. And the reader who follows the manifold activities of Sir William is fairly startled by their range and quality. As already intimated he is a man of Scottish birth. He received his university training at Aberdeen. His father, as we know from his own gracious and beautiful tribute, was in a very rare and complete sense a man of books, and the son walked in the steps of his father. It was in religious journalism that he found himself and very early he revealed the happiest capacity for the pungent and revealing phrase and almost uncanny insight into the mind of the public which makes the difference between a keen journalist and a man of journalistic genius.

My own first contact with the British Weekly was at the time of the death of Prof. A. B. Davidson many years ago. And the completeness and adequacy with which the life and achievements of the great scholar were treated, the fashion in which just the men in all the world from whom one wanted to hear words of reminiscence and words of estimate were marshaled for these tasks struck me as little less than pure journalistic magic. It was as if some editorial Aladdin raised his lamp, commanded the slave of wonder whom it summoned, and lo, his bidding was done. At once I added the British Weekly to my list of friends.

I have seen Sir William only twice. On one occasion, which is still vivid in my memory, he appeared to speak words of affectionate tribute to his friend, Sylvester Horne. It was at the afternoon memorial service at Whitfields. The slight figure of the great editor, his low musical voice made for delicate effects in small rooms and not for the reaching of great assemblies, and the sense of a great interpreter of men paying worthy homage to a masterful leader, are in my mind today as I look back. The other occasion was one afternoon, a little before the outbreak of the war when I had a talk with Sir William in a London office. His mind was playing all the while with a quickness and a resiliency which filled one with surprise. He touched every subject with an instant instinct for the usual approach and the perspective which would put the matter with a revealing clearness. I shall not forget some very individual and illuminating comments made by Sir William on Robert Browning's poem, "Fifine at the Fair."

Sir William has maintained an interest in technical Biblical scholarship and has kept in contact with the work which the really significant men are doing. His relation to the Expositor has been both the expression and the opportunity for the development of this interest. The British Weekly constantly contains treatment of notable books of scholarship by men who have a right to speak. The long and intimate friendship between Sir William and Dr. James Denney, professor and principal, illustrates this side of his life. As one reads Dr. Denney's letters to Sir William covering a period of years and written with a certain vivid friendliness expressing itself in a style where reserve and freedom are both to be found, it is quite clear that a very ripe and completely equipped technical scholar was ready to write of all matters of Biblical and theological scholarship to the great editor with the completest intellectual respect.

SERVICE AS EDITOR

Not long ago a volume of Sir William's editorials in the British Weekly was published under the title, "Princes of the Church." It was a series of really memorable estimates of great leaders of the churches, state and free, written usually at the time of their death. This volume reveals all the wonderful ability its author possesses of interpreting a man in such a fashion that the work seems to be done from within rather than from without. It has discrimination as well as this subtle insight and you feel as if you have taken a plunge into the very religious life of an era when you have finished the book.

In the great series of volumes which he edited Sir William brought the opportunity to men of eminent ability and adequate discipline. And nobody knows how many keen young scholars he has discovered and helped to find their public. With very clear and understanding eyes Sir William watched the moving of the armies when the great struggle regarding critical scholarship in its application to the literary materials which make up the Old Testament and the New came on. He believed in the open mind. He believed that there are some things which criticism can not touch. These two convictions he put with memorable power into the little volume, "The Church's One Foundation." He has rendered a great service in helping men to find a place where they can preserve their relation to the eternal realities of the Christian faith and at the same time keep their entire intellectual candor and be ready to treat every question with scientific analysis and unhesitating readiness to follow wherever the truth leads.

With all his critical acumen, Sir William has the most hearty and noble powers of appreciation. He has helped many a hard-pressed man to live by his hopes rather than by his fears, by his beliefs rather than by his doubts, just because he has refused to make the British Weekly an organ of distinguished cynicism and has made it a vehicle for the creation of noble enthusiasms and for the quickening of the loyalty which unflinchingly follows great men into the struggle and sacrifice which great causes demand. The Christian church lives in the imagination of multitudes of people with a new and royal splendor because he has used the language of the court in describing the high meanings of the kingdom of God.

IN THEOLOGY

There is a shrewd practicality—lodged somewhere in the mind of Sir William. Such writing as Claudius Clear's Letters on Life reveal him as a wise guide in the midst of the strangeness and the unsuspected meanings of this wonderful adventure of human living. In fact, for years quantities of people all over the English-speaking world have looked week after week with unabated relish to the mental quickening and the practical guidance of a wide-ranging mind with a curious gift for finding and telling just what the readers want to know, as they have given to them in the Correspondence of Claudius Clear.

In theology Sir William has been an influence for the vitalizing of all thinking regarding the great doctrines and at the same time for the maintaining of the insight that certain great facts and truths are essential in the very organic life of the faith. He has done much to keep in men's minds and hearts and in their consciences a sense that while it is easy to say crass and mechanical things about the Cross yet it is true that in the profoundest sense the moral and spiritual meaning of Christianity is determined by its message. He is a good representative of the sort of man who, while alive to the finger tips and feeling the slightest quiver of every modern movement is yet all the while feeding his own spirit upon those great verities of the faith which have constituted its deepest message in all the ages. He has more than a touch of the mystic about him, and many of the editorials in the British Weekly regarding the life of devotion have a spiritual distinction as well as a restrained beauty of expression which speak with a disciplined charm to the very heart of the reader.

Sir William keeps his eyes bent on the whole pageant of the passing world. He is an interpreter and a guide to multitudes of people. Sometimes he is a leader in great and daring adventures. The Passive Resistance movement against the enforcement of certain obnoxious features of a memorable education bill found him and the British Weekly at the very front of the fray. Governments quite understand that his support or his opposition is a matter of far-reaching significance. He is one of those who believe that in situations of almost unparalleled difficulty and complexity Mr. Lloyd George has done well by his nation and in some respects has come very near to achieving the impossible. It is not too much to say that one of the most powerful and effective supporters of the present government in many an hour of tense and bewildering difficulty has been the British Weekly. Sir William has felt the pulsings of that great movement of the spirit which it is rather the fashion to call the social passion. He writes of this theme with a certain sense of the human values, the heartbreak and the pain, the hope and the fear of multitudes of individual people, which takes the whole subject out of the merely academic realm and brings it into the very region of the actual experience of men and women

When one writes of Sir William I think he should begin with his literary style. His paragraphs have a quiet and steady motion and there is often a subtle melody playing back of all his sentences. He can write phrases memorable for the happy wedlock of long separate words which really belong together and he can write paragraphs moving with quiet grace or with austere distinction or with mounting splendor. His characterizations are sometimes of the sort you cannot forget, as when he once said: "No doubt Carlyle was a proud and scornful peasant of genius." With all this his writing has a curious way of carrying the reader along.

Sir William once referred to the distinguished and difficult style of Woodrow Wilson. His own style is surely distinguished. Just as surely it is not difficult. He writes of themes of great abstractness and difficulty with a sort of friendly concreteness which holds the reader without his being conscious that he is being taken in difficult ways. Take it all and all it is a matter of deep congratulation that such writing has been the daily food of multitudes of readers all over the English-speaking world for so many years. I have not spoken of the notable writers, such as Ian Maclaren, to whom Sir William gave their first opportunity, nor of the others, such as Sir James Barrie, whom he was among the first to hail. And there are no end of other things which have not come within the view of this article. The trouble is that you have to talk about everything in order to talk about this extraordinary man.

Yesterday afternoon I sat in one of the editorial rooms of the British Weekly going over some editorial utterances of 27 years ago in connection with a lecture on Robert William Dale, which I am to give in Birmingham next week. The very rooms seemed to carry the spirit of the chief who from this center has wielded such far flung power And as one turns over the yellowing pages of the Weekly as it appeared in other days one has again a sense of how imperial a thing is human speech and how royal a thing is the gift of the writer.

Battling for the Lord on Boston Common

By Herbert Atchinson Jump

"David departed thence and escaped to the cave of Adullam. And everyone that was in distress and everyone that was in debt and everyone that was discontented gathered themselves unto him."

BOSTON'S intellectual cave of Adullam is to be found on the Mall of Boston Common every Sunday afternoon. Thither resort many who are in theological distress or who feel that the universe is in debt unto them or who seethe with social discontent, and in various speech they have it out with one another. Under the long-suffering trees each Sabbath afternoon a dozen open forums are carried on, and far more than a dozen soap-box orators hurl words and ideas about in reckless fashion.

It is a motley but fascinating carnival of free speech. Anybody in the world by applying to the proper city authorities may have a tree and an hour assigned to him, and at that place and time he can open his mouth and win as much of an audience as the merits of his presentation can claim. And he is free to discuss any subject that was in Horatio's philosophy or out of it. Mormonism, single tax, socialism, trades unionism, premillenialism, evangelical Christianity, agnosticism, Ireland, new thought, Russian liberty, Armenian atrocities—these are all notes you may hear sounded on a warm Sunday afternoon by speakers of more or less ability. In revolutionary times the boys of Boston demanded of the British general their rights to skate on the Common. On ground thus hallowed to liberty earnest zealots and wild-eyed cranks side by side now enjoy weekly their rights to talk. Nor does the city nor the American republic suffer in consequence. Rather Boston seems to be proud of her tolerance, and not infrequently a crowd numbering up in the thousands will divide itself among the various meetings, the listeners drifting from group to group as impulse urges, and often when a speaker has finished his turn his audience will separate into a half dozen informal committees and still stay to discuss.

Who constitute the modern Athenians that resort to this open-air temple of free speech to tell or hear new things? On the whole a most interesting lot of folks, a good cross-section of our American people. Not a few women, scores of young men and girls either newly married or soon to be, never a luxuriously dressed company but distinctly prosperous in appearance, foreign faces of Jewish flavor or Slavic lineaments predominating, always two or three clergymen conspicuous by their raiment and their apparent wonder at the whole business; but an aggregation on the whole serious-minded, willing to listen, demanding fair play for the speaker and also for the questioner who is never long absent.

MODERN ATHENIANS

On a recent afternoon when I was able to enjoy as I have often done before the experience of a few hours in this honest company of truth-seekers, the largest group was held by a well-organized Mormon meeting. Several attractive and well-dressed girls and a couple of clean-faced young men did the speaking for the Church of the Latter Day Saints. "If you want society to be filled with love, if you believe that marriage is not only for time but for eternity, then come, join the Mormon fellowship." But alas, at the very next tree an anti-Mormon orator was running a close second so far as the statistics of his audience went, and as you listened to his lurid words you realized that nothing fouler, more debasing, more un-American, more brutal existed on God's earth than this same Mormon church.

The Social Labor party had a series of excellent interpreters of their faith. "Who owns this country? You do, the working people. Your labor made the nation. Then why don't you appropriate it and run it to suit yourselves instead of being dragged round as victims bound to the triumphal car of capitalism?" But here again the antidote speaker was near at hand, for the next tree was held by a quiet-faced woman, intelligent in speech, winsome in her controversial manner, who apparently simply from a brotherly love filling her heart and a social sympathy guiding her conduct was here as a capable defender of the political statu quo. "What government is depends upon you, you men and women. If you send the right sort up to the state house, you will have clean and capable administration. If you send up politicians and scoundrels, you will have to pay the bills. Talk about overthrowing our political system is quite profitless so long as the men who do the overthrowing are no wiser nor more unselfish than the rascals that are thrown out." With an unvarying serenity, a swift wit, a close knowledge of what the rebel mind of America today is thinking, she stood there on the Common that afternoon like a lighthouse shining over a turbulent sea.

THE AGNOSTIC

But to me as a minister the most rewarding group was one that had gathered round an agnostic and a Methodist preacher. Which one owned the tree originally by the permit in his pocket, I did not learn; but when the evident keenness of interest on the part of the crowd had captured me as one more auditor, the two men were having as pretty a debate as you ever listened to. Both were tensely in earnest. Their faces were white with feeling and their speech had teeth to it. The scientific agnostic was pleading for liberty. "You don't have any of it in the church," he shouted. "I once was inside and I know. But now I am outside, and I stand for the rights of a soul to seek and find truth wherever it exists, no matter what any moss-covered church may command."

For a quarter hour I listened in, and the Methodist preacher clearly not trained in the modern religious outlook, was but weakly holding up his end of the argument. Then the group broke up as the defender of the faith retired. But meanwhile an impulse had arisen within me, born in part perhaps of some reminiscences of university days when I was once a Yale debater against Harvard, to try my intellectual weapons against this altogether worthwhile antagonist. So I slipped into step along side of him and began:

"I was interested, my friend, in what you were saying. And I agree with you more than perhaps you would expect a churchman to do. But my main criticism of your position would be, you are condemning a church for its past mistakes as though it were guilty today. You are crying down a religion for faults and bigotries and imperfections which it is slowly but surely sloughing off."

He was not at all loath to continue the debate evidently, and as a matter of fact what happened was that he and I organized a meeting all by ourselves. We slashed back and forth in perfect good nature on the high themes of faith and science and religion for more than an hour, while an audience of nearly two hundred tarried to listen and occasionally interject a question. The writer is by no means certain that he did any credit to his debating instructor of many years ago, but he sets down herewith the course of the argument simply as a document of the times. My agnostic friend was an excellent specimen of a type of negative mind with which the church must learn how to deal. And having preached for the Lord at a church service in the morning of that Sabbath, I wondered whether it was not ordained of Providence that I should battle for the Lord in debate in the afternoon of that Sabbath. At any rate my readers can exercise their own intellect upon the positions stated by my opponent, and doubtless they will be able to frame a nobler and more unassailable apologetic then came to me on the spur of the moment.

CHRISTIAN DOMINATION

"No," vigorously retorted my friend. "I know what I am talking about even though I don't profess to know anything about God. Religion never did the world a bit of good in ancient times or in modern times. The world has been under the domination of Christianity for two thousand years, and what do we find? Hate everywhere. Bloody war. Wealth grinding the faces of the poor. If this is the best sort of a world God and his religion can make in all these centuries, I call him a pretty poor stick of a God. And as for the church, it tries to kill intellectually every searcher after truth today just as it used to try to burn his body or lop off his head as a heretic."

"Are you sure that is the case with the Protestant church," I ventured.

"Yes, it is. The Protestant church believes in orthodoxy, doesn't it? Orthodoxy means to take the Bible literally just as it is written. And the newspapers every week tell of how the church has cast forth some young preacher who was trying to do some real thinking for himself."

"But those same papers never tell you, my friend," I answered, "that while one preacher was suffering persecution for his liberality, there were fifty preachers just as liberal and up to date as he who, so far from suffering persecution, were enjoying the hearty favor of their congregations. As matter of fact, the majority of preachers in Boston pulpits this very Sunday morning were not Bible literalists. As matter of fact, the folks who have joined the Protestant church in Boston in the last year were never asked at all what creed they accepted, whether it be liberal or orthodox. The church is no longer giving intellectual commands to the brains of its members. It uses the creeds of the past not as fetters upon thought but as the tools of thought. To pick out a single conservative church as a sample of what the whole Protestant church is as though one were to point to a single graft-ridden city as proof that America was a failure. 'The church' is a pretty big term, as 'America' is a big term or 'Harvard university' is a big term. A wide variety of thought and method can exist under that big term, but final appraisal of merit or blame ought to be made only when the general tendencies of the institution are considered rather than isolated individuals or incidents."

ON WILLIAM J. BRYAN

"You can't convince me, though, that the church is liberal or will let anyone in it be liberal. Take William J. Bryan, for example. Who knows more about the church than Mr. Bryan? He is the finest spokesman the Protestant church has had in recent years. And of all tommy-rot I never heard anything worse than his man-out-of-mud theory of creation. Your church has never believed in evolution, doesn't believe in it today, will not let inside its pulpits anyone who believes in Darwin or in evolution."

Here I interposed, "Again, my friend, you are making a man-of-straw church which isn't at all like the real article. I have been a preacher for 22 years and I have preached evolution all the time. Practically all the young men that came out of our New England theological seminaries this year to become preachers have a philosophy built upon evolution."

"That's not so. It can't be so," he indignantly rejoined. "No man has a right to stay in the church who believes in the teachings of modern science. These teachings are all against the church creeds, and what does the church amount to if it doesn't have fixed and stationary creeds which its preachers and members have to subscribe to? It has to have definite dogmas to exist. There is nothing but chasing will-o'-the-wisps unless religion holds to its creeds."

"No," I urged vigorously, "religion is a way of living, not a certified set of dogmas. It doesn't tell a man that such and such a thing is truth but that he should aspire toward the truth and not be surprised if his appropriation of truth differs in some details from his fellow-Christian's appropriation. And as for definiteness; the Mississippi river is not fixed and stationary; it is moving all the time; but it is a pretty definite and satisfactory river just the same. The church doesn't chase will-o'-the-wisps but it does chase eternal ideals. It never quite catches up to them but the ceaseless pursuit is the glorious doom of Christianity."

"Ideals?" he sneered. "The noblest ideals humanity knows it got from the infidels. It didn't get them at all from the church. All progress has been pushed along by the unbelievers. Where would America have been if it hadn't been for Thomas Paine and Thomas Jefferson who kept God out of our national constitution? If God had been allowed in the constitution, we shouldn't have had anything but a continuous Spanish Inquisition during all these years since the nation was founded. Never, never, never has the church allowed its disciples to think for themselves with real liberty."

CROWD DISAGREES

"I grant you that through many years this was the case. But I am urging that it is so no longer the case except in sporadic instances."

"This crowd doesn't believe you, though," he countered triumphantly.

"I'm not so sure of that," I retorted. "It looks like an intelligent company. Let's put the matter to vote." We did so, and if you will believe it, only three hands went up to support the statement that there was intellectual libery in the church today. The hands on the other side were too numerous to count. So I laughingly admitted that this crowd was against me, but I could find crowds that had more first-hand acquaintance with the church that would show a majority on the other side.

At this point I discovered that it was nearly time for my train to leave, so I announced that I should have to close the debate for the present. "Is not the very fact, my friend," I asked, "that you and I can talk these matters over in this good-tempered fashion a proof that we have moved far, far away from those days of bigotry and persecution of which you speak? I am a Christian preacher but I am not hurling sulphurous epithets at you, a confessed unbeliever, am I?" I started to worm my way out through the close-pressed crowd when a new voice was heard. It belonged to a tall chap in a brown suit, with evident simplicity and sincerity on his naive countenance.

"Just one minute," he called out. "what is this Dar-win you are talking about?"

DARWIN

A roar of laughter greeted his question. "You poor nut," contemptuously snapped my antagonist, "If you don't know now what 'Dar-win' means, I couldn't tell you in a week of Sundays."

And still another voice was raised. "I've got a word I want to say right now. Mr. Man, you are all off in your statement that the infidels wrote the constitution of this country." We turned and saw the flashing eyes of a sharp-nosed individual who was evidently thoroughly angry.

"The fact of the matter is, the constitution of the United States of America was founded in all its important features on the principles of the Baptist church."

Amid the second roar of laughter excited by this sally I slipped off to my train. And a glorious sunset was limning against the western sky the spires both of the liberal New Old South church and old Park Street church, long known as "Brimstone Corner."

Who Won the Coal Strike?

THERE is a certain sporting instinct in us all that takes a keen interest in the question of "who won" in a big contest of any kind. The coal strike has been a gigantic contest with 600,000 men on one side and hundreds of millions of money on the other. Now it is settled. Both sides claim victory; the miners that they won a clean cut victory, the operators that they won a compromise. The big question is "what did the American people win or lose?" In such a contest this question far transcends the sporting interest. It is quite possible for both miners and operators to have won and the public to have lost.

This is the fifth big coal strike since inter-state collective bargaining was adopted in 1886 and is the second longest in duration, 20 weeks, as compared with the 1902 strike which lasted 23 weeks. But this one involved 600,000 men and the other only 140,000. This strike was by all odds the greatest in volume and the most adequate in point of morals. It involved more men, more capital and a larger industrial public than any strike on record, not excepting even the big British strikes. The 1902 strike was confined to anthracite and was ended by the mediation of President Roosevelt, who remarked when he determined to intervene that he supposed it would be the end of him politically. The men got a 10 per cent increase in wages, the operators a stabilized three-year contract, and the public a start toward a new conscience on its own responsibility in such conflicts and a deep repugnance to such assumptions as that voiced by "God's Providence Baer" in saying that a wise Providence had committed these vast properties to the few because they could manage them so much more wisely than could the people.

A Little Strike History

Peace ruled at large, though of course with many local walk-outs, until 1919 when the miners asked for a raise equal to the increased cost of living caused by the war. President Wilson compelled arbitration by use of unrepealed war-time powers and the award was a compromise raise of 27 per cent in wages, or about one-half the amount claimed. This award called for a meeting between the operators and the miners' representatives before its expiration on March 31st of this year. The refusal of the Southern Ohio and Western Pennsylvania operators to comply with this provision brought on the present conflict. These operators claimed that their competition was no longer with the Illinois and Indiana fields but with those of Eastern Kentucky and West Virginia, and asserted, with a solid foundation of fact in their contention, for freight differentials had put Chicago territory under a handicap to them, that they could no longer enter agreements in the old "Central Competitive Field."

There were also two other big, unmentionable facts. One was the non-union status of the West Virginia and Kentucky fields and the other was the overwhelming influence of such Pittsburgh open-shop interests as the U. S. Steel corporation with its vast coal holdings in both Western Pennsylvania and West Virginia. In other words, back of the refusal to come into the conference according to agreement was the militant open-shop, bust-the-unions movement with the biggest and most powerful single employing concern in America in the background. How little ethical factors counted is shown by the refusal to keep the agreement and come into conference, for coming into the agreed conference did not imply a necessary continuation of the old scales and conditions nor even a continuation of the so-called "national" or "Central Competitive Field" type of agreement. Had ethical considerations counted for an iota the conference would have been held and withdrawal could have come through regular and moral methods. To contend, after the breach of course, that the miners had called many strikes during the two years of the agreement, is only to beg the question. On the one hand two wrongs never made one right, and on the other the various walk-outs referred to had been over local differences and never was over the "national" agreement to which they were in this case collective parties.

Settlement Defers Day of Judgment

The settlement has only deferred the day of judgment. Unless some way out is found, every bone of contention buried for the present will be dug up next March. The miners win on two points for the time being; they keep the old wage scale until April 1st, and they retain the "check-off" unchallenged until that time. There is no assurance that the Southern Ohio and Western Pennsylvania operators will all accept the terms of the Cleveland conference, and therefore a blow may be registered tellingly against any continuation of the "national" collective bargaining agrements. So on the third point neither side wins. Under the old Central Competitive Field agreements the actual contracts were set up district by district, i.e., Illinois and Indiana, hence each district signed separate agreements, always in conformity with the "national" agreement. That has now been done in both of the above states under the informal Cleveland agreement, and the smaller outlying districts, such as Iowa, are falling in line. President Lewis of the miners was very effective in his strategy when he prevailed on a minority of the operators to come into informal conference. The Coal Age acknowledges that the end comes because "concessions offer profits." As a matter of fact concessions usually do offer more profits for everybody concerned than does fighting. The difference is that the principle is ethical while the practice, as noted by the Coal Age, is wholly opportunistic.

The miners have been out 20 weeks. That does not mean they have lost 20 weeks' wages. That would only absorb their average of lost time for the past year if they could now work every day during the winter. Car shortage and other rail troubles will cause losses in time,—very sharp losses until the railroad strike is settled—but these 20 weeks are the time of a big slack in their employment. Newspaper estimates of millions lost to them are sensational but not scientific. The operators make their annual profits largely out of the autumn and winter mining. They will lose little if anything at all because they will raise prices, and every rise in the price of a ton at the mine will be largely clear profit. These facts do not in the least imply collusion, as Judge Anderson and some writers have concluded, but they do mean that the parties to the contest may lose little, that the big operators may even make money by it, and that the public at large may lose heavily.

What Hope for the Public?

The Cleveland conference calls for a fact-finding commission made up of men satisfactory to both sides and approved by the president. It provides that by January 3, 1923, they shall meet to attempt to offer a solution of the difficulty that is due to arise again on April 1st when the agreement expires. Neither side likes the idea of a governmental commission without official representation from the organizations. The operators secured an injunction restraining the Federal Trade commission from making just such an inquiry, and the miners protest against the bill now before Congress providing for an independent governmental commission. The operators do not want to be compelled to state profits and reveal methods of management. The miners think it is a blow at collective bargaining in that it will possibly lead to some such a labor board as that provided for railways. The clear headed public will see no hope in any other type of inquiry.

It is a problem for engineers. In the early days of the strike the Social Service Commission of the Federal Council of Churches and the Catholic Social Welfare commission joined in petitioning the president and congress to set up a federal inquiry into costs, wastes and profits in the coal mining industry that there might be an adequate basis of facts upon which to base permanent agreements in regard to wages and prices. They petitioned that the investigators be competent engineers without interest in the industry. They do not want labor leaders who will stress one side nor business men who will stress the other but competent, impartial technicians who will represent the public. Such a fact-finding commission, endowed with power to examine the books of both operators and mine unions, could give the public a scientific basis for proposals that would work toward permanent ways and means to mine and distribute coal. It is a question of even more importance to the public at large than to either of the parties directly involved in strikes.

The present wasteful method cannot go on nor will it ever be improved by scrapping the unions or restoring a competitive struggle as a means of reducing waste. A very powerful operator can advocate the latter but the public knows that that is just what brought them to the present state of affairs. There are some types of business that cannot serve well under unlimited competition. Business recognizes this fact and enters into "gentlemen's" and other types of agreement and combination to prevent it. What business does as a means to its own profit the public will have to do for its own protection. Cooperation within a competitive order usually results in mutual profit for the cooperators. Competition within a cooperative order will stimulate service to all.

British Table Talk

London, August 14, 1922.

SINCE my last letter death has been busy among us. From the ranks of public men whose names are known to everyone Lord Northcliffe and Arthur Griffith will be missing. There is no need for me to add more to the notes which I sent a week ago when already it seemed certain that Lord Northcliffe could not return to Fleet street. He was only 57, but in his comparatively short life he had not spared his energies and the body has a way of claiming its revenge for the impossible strain put upon it by men like Alfred Harmsworth, who toil like Titans and never give themselves rest. He filled a place of his own time in the history of British journalism, and it will be as a journalist and not as a statesman or an orator that he will be remembered. One who writes with authority, Mr. E. T. Raymond, has given this vivid picture of the man:

"But to those who knew him, the man himself was more interesting even than his achievements, or rather they were chiefly interesting as a revelation of his personality. He had a most remarkable power of impressing himself, without effort, on men who were at least his equals in intellectual endowment; and, though he might be sometimes unjust and occasionally ruthless, he was capable of inspiring the sincerest affection, as well as admiration, in those who had watched his progress, from the time when he was merely a mannish boy—an extraordinarily handsome one with his fine features, his large wide grey eyes, his fresh complexion, and his downward-tending fore-lock—to the time when he was a boyish middle-aged man. For almost to the end the boy persisted, and one of the 'stunts' in which he delighted would revive something of the sheer joy with which, in his earlier years, he would almost dance round the first copy, wet from the machine, of some new journalistic baby since grown big."

Arthur Griffith

If it were not always the same, one might be tempted to dwell upon the tragic loss to Ireland through the sudden death of Arthur Griffith, but it is always the same story in Ireland. Of the Celts it was said "they went out to battle and they always fell." In the story of Ireland whenever something good is near, there is always the tragic blow. Arthur Griffith was the most solid and statesmanlike of Irish patriots. Throughout the negotiations which led to the treaty, and since, he has been on the side of sober and conciliatory statesmanship. He owed his position more to his powers of reasoning than to any rhetorical gifts. He was ready to talk "business," while de Valera was breathing forth rhetoric. The loss of such a man cannot but be a serious blow to the Irish government. The king has sent a gracious message of sympathy, and the prime minister, who had a great respect for Arthur Griffith, has written: "My admiration for his single-minded patriotism, his ability, his sincerity, and his courage has grown steadily since I met him first, less than a year ago." It is possible that this death may call a halt to the civil war. It might do so, but it is never safe to prophesy concerning Ireland, where the unlikely always seems to come true.

Mr. G. K. Chesterton Enters the Roman Church

It will not greatly surprise readers of Mr. G. K. Chesterton to learn that he has been received into the Roman Church. Few converts from Anglicanism will have less to withdraw than he. Indeed for a long time it has been easy for readers to imagine that he was a Roman before last week. But only last year he presided at a meeting of the Anglican society—the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel—and in spite of rumor, it was possible till last week to deny that he had left the Church of England. Now he has gone over the boundary line, and all that this means he promises to expound himself. His work "Orthodoxy" has always seemed to me not only a most exciting but a most weighty defense of the Christian faith. It is not at present before me, but I imagine that there is little if anything in it which he will need to recant. It deals with the Christian faith as it is held by all who profess and call themselves Christians in every church. Some of us will not cease to be grateful to this writer with all his fantastic blend of the Fleet street journalism, the mystical poet, and the jolly knight-errant. I should imagine that I am almost all the things which G. K. C. hates—a Protestant, a Dissenter, a total abstainer, nevertheless I read and learn much from him, and I shall be anxious to hear from him why he has crossed the frontier.

Colonel Philip Lewis and Mr. John Chown

Our missionary forces have lost two men from the first line, both of them laymen, who came by different ways into the service of the world-wide kingdom of God. Mr. Chown was a leading Baptist layman; himself a stock-broker he had recently retired from business and was hoping to give himself with all his powers to his work among the Baptist churches, of which he was president. Strange that the Congregationalists should have lost this year a president and an ex-president and now the Baptists have lost their president! But before Mr.

Chown was elected to the chair of his denomination, he had been chairman of the Baptist Missionary society, for which he had toiled for years without sparing himself. No one except those within such a society can imagine how much time and labor such laymen give. . . . Colonel Lewis surrendered a position of great importance in the army in order to become secretary of the National Laymen's Missionary movement. His military record won him the D. S. O. and the C. M. G., and it was no small sacrifice which he made when he undertook his new task last autumn. In 1909 the strong feeling came to Lewis that the Foreign Missionary Enterprise was central to the church's ambition. At the staff college at Camberley he started study-circles for officers, and together he with others worked their way through "The Reproach of Islam," and other books. At the end of the war he longed to do something constructive as a Christian officer, and when the way opened, he became general secretary of the National Laymen's Missionary movement. Last week he was announced to preside at a schoolboys' camp, but in Brittany on July 31st he was drowned while bathing, and all that is left of his desire is the record of a few months' service and the memory of a heart which was longing to serve his Lord in the greatest of all enterprises.

Summer Conferences

It is vain to attempt any record of all these summer conferences. We call them "summer" out of courtesy, for summer vanished in May and has not reappeared. They have however certain common marks; they share the same blend of hilarity and devotion—they are always times of great laughter and noble vision. A Sunday school teachers' conference, for example, was held at Seaford at the foot of the Sussex Downs. It was a time of rare fellowship in study, and at the close the members of the school held a frivol, in which they were all in fancy dress. Pharaoh was there, and Charlie Chaplin, and one very successful impersonation of a Sunday school teacher of fifty years ago, and many others from many lands and ages. Perhaps the reader will wonder at such an association and will be surprised to hear what is nevertheless the truth that these teachers were never nearer to God than they were in that week. Joyousness and sanctity go together.

> "They went about their gravest deeds
> Like noble boys at play."

At our camp of schoolboys we share the same open secret. Where the presence of God is enjoyed, there are the springs of all mirth. Those who seek first his kingdom have all the other things added—among them laughter and mirth.

A Congregational Quarterly

The Congregationalists at the moment have no newspaper, weekly, monthly, or quarterly. The Wesleyan Methodists have two weekly papers, the Baptists have at least one, and the other denominations have their organs of one kind or another. But the Congregationalists who have, I believe, eleven colleges have no journal. This lack is however to be met in part by the issue of a quarterly in the competent hands of Dr. Albert Peel who has recently come to London; he is one of the most gifted scholars in the denomination, and through the quarterly he will bring to bear upon the life and thought of these churches the wisdom of its best minds, which have not indeed been wanting but have lacked the opportunity, now given to them.

The Weakness of Nationalism

In his peculiarly exact yet awkward language Baron von Hugel has been analysing "nationalism." These are its weaknesses: (1) a gregarious imitation of thoughtlessness; (2) narrowness and intolerance of types merely because they are not the nation's own; (3) the proneness to increase still further the antipathies, chief caused by long injustices in the far-back past (4) the keeping of even noble characters at the level of a predominantly materialistic patriotism. These weaknesses, the baron sets out to show, are to be checked and transcended by Christianity which, for example, to the soul tempted to imitate thoughtlessly the accepted national type, offers another set of living models, above all the figure of the overlord and master Jesus Christ. There is no question more vital now than the attitude of the Christian church to nationalism and Baron von Hugel not for the first time has brought his fine analytic skill to the help of the whole church. His articles are appearing in The Challenge, which in September is beginning a new chapter in its gallant and adventurous story.

The Way to Reach an Hundred

"Between sixty and ninety," Dr. Smith says, "religion becomes more precious than ever. Many of my over-a-hundred-years-old correspondents have mentioned this fact as contributing to their reaching an advanced age, that they were brought up by pious parents in the fear and love of God. Their simple philosophy of life may be summed up thus: They lived very simply, went to bed and got up early, went to church every Sunday, and were at peace with God and man. In fact," says Dr. Smith, "their lives were just the ideal lives which any doctor would sketch out for anyone who consulted him as to the best way to reach an hundred years of age."

EDWARD SHILLITO.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Insulting God*

MALACHI means messenger (3:1). The author is unknown, the book nameless. The writer is a prophet, although one in whom the fires burn low; his ethical ideals are none too high, and he settles his problems by an appeal to the apocalyptic, he goes up into the clouds. This is an easy but unsatisfactory way out. While not the last of the Old Testament prophets, probably, this book may well close the canon, for prophecy has about reached its end. The setting would seem to be that of the Ezra-Nehemiah period for the same problems are at the fore: foreign wives, neglect of the payment of tithes and carelessness about worship and the laws. Edgar McFadyen places the book at a time just previous to the Ezra-Nehemiah era, or about 460-450 B. C.

While the majority of the ethical ideals are of the current Jewish type, such as the suffering of Edom being a proof of God's love, Malachi strikes some high notes. Strong words are spoken about giving, although rather from the priestly angle, that of a preacher anxious to maintain the offerings, rather than that of the prophet, eager for the morals of the people. The offering of blemished or lame beasts stirs up his wrath. Religion has fallen to a low ebb; the people are insulting God. Doubt reigns among the people as to the very moral order, God does not seem to care, he does not interpose to help his chosen. The prophet says that the people must return unto God and he will return unto them and that the best way to indicate the sincerity of their return is to start tithing once more. Try that and the blessings will come. This may seem to be an inverse order to some. "We love him because he first loved us." "All things come from thee, O Lord, and of that which is thine own we return unto Thee." God is writing the names in a book; it pays to be good because he will spare his faithful. Altogether the ethical notes are not particularly noble.

The main contention of the book, however, was deeply needed. The appeal may have been as high as the people could appreciate. When we see the devastated city, the ruined temple, the foreign influence, the lack of what we call "faith," the neglected ritual, the deadening sins, we can feel the force of some strong man calling the people back to God. "You are robbing God," he cries. "You doubt the moral order, you feel that God has deserted you; look what he has done to your enemy, Edom, does that not prove his love for you? You have neglected to pay the tithe, no wonder he has ceased to bless you. Bring in the tithes and see what he will do for you. Return to the God you have ignored and insulted." Such an appeal would go home. It could be understood. I had a man in one of my churches who stoutly maintained the thesis that God always took care of the people who were liberal with him. He said that it paid in dollars and cents to give freely to the church. He was prosperous and generous himself and he had an interesting lot of facts to back his contention. He also had scripture. He quoted Malachi. He insisted that the righteous did not beg bread. There were some good, poor people who were much hurt by his arguments. Many of those who practice tithing will tell you that prosperity follows the system. It's a hard blow, however, for the man who starts tithing and then finds the opposite true. Can you pay a man in cash for doing his duty? Does not a spiritual life demand spiritual rewards? "The wages of sin is death, the free gift of God is eternal life." This business of tithing looks like a safe bet financially, to hear some of these men talk! That many generous men like Kennedy, Wanamaker, Inslee, Colgate, have given away fortunes while other fortunes poured in, is true. One philanthropist said: "I just shovel out and God shovels in." That may be the system. But can you guarantee it in all cases? That it worked well with Baldwin, the locomotive manufacturer, no one can doubt; also with his successor. Did any generous man ever suffer want? Here is a real question. On the other hand we all know hundreds of men and women who insult God by offering him the crumbs. "He is God of all or not God at all." This is true. Our little gifts are an insult to the Almighty. A nine cent gospel will never convert the world. A cheap religion is the cheapest thing in the universe. It is not worth bothering with. This may be the very lesson we most need.

Bible Society Makes Profit on Bibles

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: To appreciate fully inaccurate statements regarding cost of producing Bibles for the American Bible society one should refer to The Christian Century of June 1st, page 700. Mr. Mann makes "wholesale denials" of statements made to show that the society's books are sold at more than cost of manufacture despite appeals for money, which state otherwise. The books in question were all produced by me, as superintendent of publication, and data concerning actual manufacturing costs is in my possession. Feeling the society morally bound to live up to its professions, I presented figures on each book made under 1921 contracts, showing margin between actual cost and selling price, to the publication committee. The society professes—its books are distributed at the cost of manufacture,—not including the overhead and marketing costs necessarily added in commercial publishing,—and always without profit.

But in practice—Actual cost of Brevier No. 117 under Chicago contract:

Paper	10.77
Printing	7.25
Binding	21.5
Family Record	2.9
Jacket	1.4
		43.82
23% depository, sales-room, superintendence, etc.		10.07
36¾% actual cost		16.11
		70.

Result:—costing 44c; selling 70c.

Sixteen cents on 50,000 books yields $8,000, and the 23% nets $5,000—total $13,000 on less than a year's supply of this single book. I ask Mr. Mann whether he can reaffirm that this is sold "at cost of manufacture,—not including overhead or marketing costs?" Profits show on nineteen other books in my memorandum. Secretary Haven writes: "Every month the current accounts of the society are audited by two members of the board of managers," and an annual audit is made by auditors "paid by the corporation which engages them." What would be thought of a bank whose books were examined by its own directors, and whose annual examination was made by auditors of the bank's own selection and at a time most convenient to the institution?

My figures for issues, taken from the record, stated: "For twelve months ending October, 1920." The Record, the society's official bulletin, reported no foreign issues. Corresponding profit on books issued in other parts of the world effects no reconciliation between professions and practice. In the Continent for May 18th Mr. Mann states issues of the society have been 5,000,000 for each year of the society. The organization is 105 years old. Five million copies a year amounts to 525,000,000. In the society's report, 1921, page 16, total issues for 105 years are 141,729,340. Mr. Mann exagerated to the tune of 383,270,660 volumes. The yearly average would be only 1,349,803.

There was no translation cost on any issues named. The books were printed from old plates, for most part King James version, and translation must have been paid years ago. Besides, the society's catalog states that translation does not enter into cost of books ,and its appeals say "its books are distributed at cost of manufacture.—not including overhead or marketing."

Concerning gifts from denominations, the society produces figures for an earlier and less profitable year. Why? See Presbyterian hand book, 1921, on page 8, figures for the year ending March 31, 1921—those I used—are $64,470. Gifts from other Presbyterian bodies should increase this materially. The society's "present catalog prices are based, in the majority of cases," we are told, "on costs prevailing in 1919" (war figures). Why did the auditor base his report upon 1919 figures, long out of date, while much more advantageous contracts prevailed?

I will be glad to meet representative men from any of the denominations contributing to the society, and present, in person to such as are delegated, not only a complete statement of facts, but undeniable evidence to sustain it.

In Defence of the Klan

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have read with interest an editorial in the issue of The Christian Century dated July 13th, "Shall we Ulsterize the United States." I regret that so many unkind statements are appearing in the public press, because they are detrimental to the best interests of the nation, its government, its best citizenship, and the knights of the Ku Klux Klan.

Regarding the relationship of the Masonic fraternity to the Ku Klux Klan; it is a well known fact that Masonry does not affiliate with any organization, secret, secular or ecclesiastical, Masonry has its own work and attends strictly to its own business. It may be of interest, however, to know that more than 75 per cent of the membership of the Ku Klux Klan are Masons. I am a member of Scottish Rite Free Masonry, 32nd degree, and the Ancient Arabic Order Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, and attend every meeting of the Masonic bodies possible. Therefore I know whereof I speak concerning Masonry.

I am glad that the work of Masonry is now regarded as a worthy work by thinking people everywhere. Yet there are still some who damn secret societies of every kind as works of the devil. Yet Masonry has become so well established that the enemy dares not attack it openly. Under cover, however, it is denounced as a "pagan order, the ancient and most dangerous enemy of the Holy Catholic church." Masons are characterized as "vicious criminals" and charged with being enemies of "the school, the church and the state." Masons take warning! The present opposition against the Ku Klux Klan is a veiled effort to use the well organized public press to injure the Masonic fraternity via the Ku Klux Klan.

Has it ever occurred to the thinking people of the United States that the enemy against Masonry is the same as that now scattering broadcast persistent rumors that the Ku Klux Klan is a "gang of lawless rough necks, thieves and murderers." If such absurd and wicked charges have been made as above stated against the 3,000,000 of America's best citizens, the Masons; is it not probable that the charges made against the Ku Klux Klan are equally false and absurd?

To a klansman, the charge that the Ku Klux Klan is an un-American, unpatriotic organization, is perfectly silly and absurd. Ever since the Congressional investigation of the Ku Klux Klan; the "Ku Klux Kreed," and the objects and purposes of the order have been plainly set forth above the signature of Colonel Simmons, the Imperial Wizard of the Invisible Empire of the Knights of the Ku Klux Klan. Section 3 reads as follows: "This order is an institution of chivalry, humanity, justice, and patriotism; embodying in its genius and principles all that is chivalric in conduct, noble in sentiment, generous in manhood and patriotic in purpose; its peculiar objects being: First—To protect the weak, the innocent, and the defenseless, from the indignities, wrongs and outrages of the lawless, the violent and the brutal; to relieve the injured and oppressed; to succor the suffering and unfortunate, especially worthy widows and orphans. Second—To protect and defend the Constitution of the United States of America, and all laws passed in conformity thereto, and to protect the States and the people thereof from all invasion of their rights thereunder from any source whatsoever. Third—To aid and assist in the execution of all constitutional laws, and to preserve the honor and dignity of the state by opposing tyranny, in any and every degree attempted from any and every source whatsoever, by a fearless and faithful administration of justice; to promptly and properly meet every behest of duty 'without fear and without reproach.'"

Admitted that the klan is a secret order. So are the Masonic, Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, and scores of other orders. Why discriminate as "owlish" the Ku Klux Klan when all of these organizations hold secret meetings

A great many raids, mobs, etc., have been masqueraded under the guise of the Ku Klux Klan by those who are the sworn enemies of the nation, the church, the school; and would bring reproach upon the klan in every way possible. These same enemies are bound under an oath, "to denounce and disown any allegiance as due to any heretical king, prince or state named Protestant or liberal, or obedience to any of their laws, magistrates, or officers. * * * To make and wage relentless war, secretly or openly, against all heretics, Protestant and Masons, as I am directed to do, to extirpate them from the face of the whole earth; and that I will spare neither age, sex or condition, and that I will hang, burn, boil, flay, strangle, bury alive these infamous heretics." (I cannot quote the remainder of the oath because of its obscene fiendishness.) And yet these are the people responsible for the absurd false propaganda now being circulated against the knights of the Ku Klux Klan. Why do intelligent people in this country prefer to line up with them in this un-Christian, un-American, absurd propaganda? Jesus said: "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." May the time come when the American people shall believe the truth about the knights of the Ku Klux Klan, instead of the insidious propaganda now being circulated against it by the enemies of our school, our church and our state.

A Wonderful Story—Simply Told

THE OUTLINE OF SCIENCE

Edited by J. Arthur Thomson
English Scientist and Author

HERE is the supreme publishing achievement of the year. In one logical flowing story it tells you of the progress in all the fields of science since the world began. It reduces the whole subject to terms so simple that the layman can clearly understand. It covers this vast amount of material completely and authoritatively—yet so concisely that it can be contained in four volumes. It gives you a collection of nearly 1,000 accurate and graphic pictures illustrating the text clearly. Of fascinating interest and profound educational value to every man, woman and child.

This great work does for science what H. G. Wells' "Outline of History" does for history—and the Thomson books are much more attractive both as to contents and make-up than Wells'. These four volumes will give a better all-around view of modern science than a hundred volumes on the specific sciences. The remarkably fine illustrations in themselves almost tell the story.

To be completed in four volumes. Three volumes are now ready at $4.50 the volume.

A Suggestion: Send for the first volume (adding 15 cents for postage), and then decide—as you will—that you must have the entire set.

If you wish all the books, send $5.00, and you may pay the balance in 30 and 60 days.

(Do not order more than three volumes now. The final volume will not be out until October.)

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Reservations Being Made for Glasgow Convention

Preparations are already being made for the World Sunday school convention to be held in Glasgow beginning June 18, 1923. Mr. James Kelley, chairman of the Scottish committee, reports that St. Andrew's hall, which will seat 3,500 people, has been engaged as the place of meeting. Two thousand delegates have been assigned to North America. Members of the nobility will serve on committees, and the universities of the land will recognize the presence of the visitors. Those making reservations at this time deposit twenty-five dollars, which is refunded in case of a change of plans at least thirty days before the convention.

Missionary Reports Burning of Bibles

Rev. A. C. Douglas, a Presbyterian missionary at Medellin, Columbia, in a report made recently to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions tells of the burning of Bibles in a town in Columbia. The missionary was making his first visit with his stock of Bibles when a merchant offered to buy his entire supply and distribute it among the people. Once in possession of the books, he made a great public bonfire with the assistance of the priest and burned the books. The missionary took a picture of the scene, but was not allowed to secure any partially burned leaves for the priest stayed by until everything was consumed.

Presbyterians Issue Magazine on Jewish Work

The task of Christianizing the Jews has been undertaken by the Presbyterian Home Mission Board with fresh vigor recently. A quarterly magazine has been started called "Our Jewish Neighbors." It is edited by Dr. John Stuart Corning. Among the methods of propaganda used by the board is a novel tableau called "The Hand of God in Hebrew History." This tableau will be used in local missionary societies in illustrating the work of the board among the Hebrews.

Noteworthy Catholic Church in Chicago

The Church of St. Thomas the Apostle, now in process of erection in Chicago for a parish of Roman Catholics, will cost three-quarters of a million dollars, and will have as a unique feature contributions by artists, sculptors and architects of national reputation, some of them will come to Chicago from distant parts and maintain themselves at their own expense. No stock art work will be put into the building. Everything will be the individual creation of some artist who loves the church.

Reformation in Ranks of Orthodox Church

Freedom from state control has made possible revolutionary changes in the methods of the Orthodox church of the orient. The leaders of the Church of England profess to see in Russia changes analagous to those which took place in England four hundred years ago. The Orthodox church will not abandon the episcopate nor will it change its creed, but under the leadership of Patriarch Meletios the changes of method are very striking. The latter professes to believe that when the changes are complete the barriers to union with the Church of England and the Church of Sweden will be removed, if not indeed with the Protestant communions of the west.

Church of the Nazarene Has Large Growth

The Church of the Nazarene is one of the latest of the denominations to be born, but it has made rapid progress in many parts of the country. With the modernization of the Methodist Episcopal church there has been a field for an organization which emphasizes old-time Methodist attitudes and doctrines, though the constituency is by no means exclusively Methodist. Since 1919 the increase in its churches has been 900 per cent and its membership 600 per cent, if its own figures are to be taken at face value. It uses interesting publicity methods to bring its message home to the people, and in many western cities one may see its exhortations emblazoned on fence boards and rocks.

Question of Psycho-Therapy Stirs Episcopalians

The Episcopalians are now discussing divine healing with a great deal of interest, for a commission on divine healing is about to present a report which would commit the church to this treatment. This is vigorously opposed in a recent issue of the Churchman. The work of that unique character, James Moore Hickson, has for the past three years been regarded by many rectors as a valuable counter-movement to Chris-

Churches Receive Large Accessions

WHILE a recent issue of the Nation proclaims the death of the church, an announcement based on statistics from Germany and Czecho-Slovakia, the Federal Council of Churches issues statistics with regard to American churches that are of the most encouraging sort. Instead of being grounds for pessimism, they are proof that the churches of this country are meeting with unprecedented success. Rev. Charles L. Goodell, secretary of the Federal Council's commission on evangelism and life service is responsible for the following statistics: "The Congregational church records for the year ending May, 1922, a total of 78,365 new members, 45,875 of these having been received on confession of faith. This is a net gain over deaths and removals of 19,046—the largest gain in all their history. The net gain for the preceding year was 10,959.

"The Disciples of Christ report the reception of approximately 125,000, 75,000 of these being on confession of faith. This is a net gain of about 35,000. The Disciples' commission on evangelism estimates that fully 75 per cent of their churches with pastors held at least a week of special evangelistic services during the year, and declares that last Easter Sunday was the greatest single day for additions to church membership in their history.

"In the case of the Methodist Episcopal church, whose statistics are dependent upon reports of both spring and fall conferences, it is not now possible to give a final statement. For the calendar year 1921 the net gain was 92,301. For the last decade the net gain was 1,255,091. In the Methodist Episcopal church south the net gain in membership for the year 1921 was 82,216. For the quadrennium 1918-1922 there was a net gain of 162,093—the largest gain recorded in any quadrennium in the history of the church.

"The commission on evangelism of the Northern Baptist convention states that about 90,000 baptisms were reported at their convention in June. When to this number is added those received by letter a very large increase in membership is indicated.

"The Presbyterian church in the U. S. A. reports for the year ending March 31, 1922, a gross gain of 169,778 including 93,259 on confession of faith, 65,324 by letter, 11,195 restored to membership. This is a net gain of 34,557. The Presbyterian church in the U. S. (south) records for 1921 a total increase of 42,258 of whom 24,369 were received on confession of faith. The net gain for the Southern Presbyterians is 20,541.

"The United Presbyterian church received in 1921, 22,892, of whom 10,356 were on confession of faith. This is an increase of more than 5,000 over the figures for the preceding year. The Reformed church in the U. S. had 24,542 additions, with a net gain of 2,708.

"The Protestant Episcopal church reports for 1921, 59,706 confirmed, with a net gain of 15,787. The record of the United Brethren shows an increase of 41,164, of which number 31,658 were received on confession of faith. The net gain for the year is 13,222.

"Five Years' meeting of the Friends shows a net gain of 424 for 1921 as against a loss of 239 the year before. The Moravians report a gross gain of 1,718 with a net increase of 323. The Seventh Day Baptist churches received in 1921 274 new members.

"Other churches from which definite reports have not yet been received will undoubtedly show similar results."

tian Science. Bishop Manning of New York is said to be sympathetic with the work of the divine healers in the Episcopal communion.

Minister Goes Into the Highways and Hedges

Rev. Branford Clarke of Brooklyn has recently prepared himself to preach the gospel in what he believes to be a new testament way. Dedicating his life to those in the "highways and hedges" he has fitted up a Ford chassis with a miniature pulpit and organ. Inside are living quarters and above all is a wooden cross. Rev. Clarke will tour the country and preach wherever he can gather an audience. Among other opportunities is that of addressing the pilgrims who are to be found in the numerous automobile camps throughout the country in the summer time.

Southern Baptists Will Send Clothing to Russia

The women of the Southern Baptist church have adopted a new objective for this year. On Sept. 3 they gathered clothing in great quantities throughout the south, which will be transported to Russia, free of charge, by Secretary Hoover. The clothing will not be given exclusively to Baptists in Russia, but will be distributed to all according to need. Other communions continue to recognize their obligation to help in this stricken country, but of course the most significant work of all is that being done by one of the smaller Christian bodies, the Friends.

Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity

The Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity is a Disciples foundation devoted to the cause of promoting closer fellowship among all Christians. Its annual report was issued recently in which it is shown that for the regular work of the organization the largest amount was raised in 1921 of any year in the history of the society. The receipts were a little over ten thousand dollars. A quarterly magazine was published, and the president, Dr. Peter Ainslie, made over two hundred and fifty addresses in various parts of the United States. Rev. H. C. Armstrong is secretary of the organization, and the headquarters are established at Baltimore. This society takes an intelligent interest in all union movements, and will co-operate both with the World Conference on Faith and Order and with the universal conference of the Church of Christ on Life and Work.

Religious School Pupils Given Camping Trips

The Church Extension board of Denver Presbytery has this year had a most attractive prize offer to children. At the daily vacation Bible School prizes were offered for the best craft work, and for the best memory work in the Bible. As a result 28 boys and 36 girls were given free camping trips. Denver had fifty vacation schools this summer with an enrollment of 2,200. In one of the Presbyterian churches recently the morning hour of worship was taken up with a demonstration of the work of the daily vacation school.

Religious Teaching Common in the British Empire

While many states in the United States have outlawed the Bible in the public schools, in a large part of the British empire there is now a clear recognition of the need of religious instruction. In South Africa the Anglican Provincial synod and the Dutch Reformed church created a commission which included representatives of most of the smaller denominations. This commission prepared a syllabus of scripture lessons which was submitted to the state and ratified. Only the Unitarians and a small secularist group opposed this measure, and to these was granted a special conscience clause. New Zealand is now moving to secure the same sort of arrangement. At a recent meeting the leading educationalists of England came to an agreement that the Bible should be used in the public schools.

Disciples Meet at Winona Lake

Winona Lake, Ind., Aug. 29.

THE opening days of the Disciples convention at Winona Lake were given over to a consideration of the annual reports of the various benevolent boards including the United Christian Missionary society, the Board of Education, the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity and the Board of Temperance and Social Welfare. The United Christian Missionary society has been under heavy fire during the past two years, but each year makes a large advance in its receipts. During the past year it received $1,628,571.99. As the previous year had been a nine months year by reason of calendar changes, a comparison can only be made for a corresponding nine months this year. This shows an advance of $117,963. The appointment of an office manager for the past year to secure office economies, and to reduce the office force where possible has resulted in economies at the headquarters in St. Louis which run to ten thousand dollars a year. Two hundred and forty-eight churches now give annually more than a thousand dollars each to this society. Two churches reached the ten thousand figure, or went beyond it. Euclid Avenue of Cleveland and Union Avenue of St. Louis, the former leading with gifts aggregating $14,633.70. The latter is the church in which most of the secretaries hold membership.

The report of the society calls for a commission to be appointed by the executive committee which will project a five year program of advance at the next annual convention. This campaign of advance which is to begin in the local church is a campaign for religious education, evangelism, stewardship, and other forms of local church enlargement. A goal will be set for endowment and equipment for the national and foreign enterprises of the movement. The third goal is to increase the contributions of the churches to provide that the recurring annual deficits shall be wiped out.

This year the society frankly recognizes that some of its foreign policies are under fire. The situation in China which has been previously presented to the constituency of the society by mail, is in the convention report and later in the week will receive consideration. In a series of letters voluntarily sent to the executive committee, the missionaries report practices not different from those of the churches in America which have been criticized for their open membership procedure. The report on the Philippines is new matter. Rev. E. K. Higdon, pastor of Taft Avenue church in Manilla, reports that he has been practicing open membership, and while he is willing to abide by the ruling of the board, he nevertheless strongly believes in the more fraternal procedure He asks if he is expected to resign. The society returns a somewhat evasive reply in the course of which there is the statement that the society does not undertake to control the private opinions of its missionaries. This report will also doubtless occasion debate.

The report of the commission on the relocation of the College of Missions eliminates all possibilities except Chicago and New York. Whether a decisive vote can be secured on this question is yet to be seen. It had been expected that the commission would report for a single location rather than for two.

Changes in the constitution of the general convention are proposed which would permit more latitude in legislation. At present the recommendations committee has power to kill proposed legislation. The convention is simply a crowd which gathers from the various states. The only committees representative of state organizations are the recommendations committee and the nominating committee. The Board of Managers of the United Society is also elected by state conventions. The delegate feature of the convention which was tried a few years was abandoned at the Kansas City convention in order to return to the older practice.

The convention president this year is Rev. Stephen E. Fisher, pastor of University Place church of Champaign, Ill. He is a graduate of Eureka college, and has spent his life in central Illinois. He is now in the forties, and is so successful that his church has given him a life call. It is largely due to his activity that the Disciples Foundation at the University of Illinois was introduced which now has an instructor giving courses.

Full report and editorial interpretation will appear in next week's issue.

crowded all summer. Its capacity is from 250 to 300 guests. The group of 30 Jewish children which came from the Christian Mission to Israel under the care of Rev. and Mrs. David Bronstein, attracted special attention. These children received special food in accordance with the wishes of their parents. Among the various members of the camp colony have been ten ministers from various parts of the country. At one period of the summer thirty under-nourished children were in the camp for special care. This great charity is now being supported by some churches that formerly had their own camps on inland lakes.

Presbyterian Leader Has Labor Day Message

Dr. John McDowell, secretary of the Presbyterian Board of home missions, and sponsor for the industrial and social creed of the Presbyterian church, circulated this year in his communion a Labor day message entitled, "The Christ Spirit—the Solution of the Industrial Problems." He insists that the heart of industry shall be made Christian. After quoting from many secular writers of the time to reinforce his message he gives the following personal testimony: "That industry has a right to look to the church to create and promote a right spirit in industry cannot be questioned by anyone who knows and accepts the mission and function of the church as defined by Jesus Christ in the new testament. Her task as defined by Christ is not to make the methods of industry—but to make the motives of industry—not to make the program of industry—but to make its principles—not to make the system of industry, but to make its spirit. The primary duty of the church is to make the heart of industry genuinely Christian. This done, industry will not be an end in itself but a means to an end, and that end in the words of Bacon will be 'The glory of the Creator, and the relief of man's estate.' The purpose of industry when truly Christian will be cooperation for public service—not competition for private gain. The spiritual element furnished by the church makes industry most valuable and gives industrialism its finest quality. This being the special task of the church as defined by Christ, the great head of the church, industry has a right to insist on the obligation of the church to Christianize the spirit of industry."

Dr. Burton Is Convocation Orator

Dr. Burton, the distinguished new testament scholar of the University of Chicago, was convocation orator on the occasion of the one hundred twenty-sixth convocation of the university, Sept. 1. His address was on the theme, "Education in a Democratic World." Dr. Burton has been in recent years director of the university libraries. He is chairman of the board of education of the Northern Baptist convention and has twice visited the orient, particularly China and India, for extended investigation of educational conditions, the latter visit having been made quite recently. He has been teaching at the University of Chicago since the early days of its founding.

Faith and Order Conference Held in Washington

The long contemplated World Conference on Faith and Order being called together by the Protestant Episcopal church of America is now rapidly assuming reality and will be held in Washington in 1925. Most of the religious communions of Christendom have agreed to send representatives, with the single exception of the Roman Catholic church. The latter will doubtless have some priests present unofficially. Prior to this great world gathering it is proposed that there shall be held local conferences at which the various points of view may be expressed. Thus a general interest will be aroused in the conference at Washington and its findings, if there be any.

Catholic Organization Supports Prohibition

The Catholic Total Abstinence Union, an honorable body with a long record of worthy service to the cause it represents, has worked by the method of individual pledge signing throughout its history until this year. While it has had the support of many parish priests, it has not been able to secure the support of the great leaders of the Roman Catholic church, and it has been tolerated rather than encouraged. At a recent convention in Philadelphia, the question of the relation of the organization to national prohibition was discussed and the society under the leadership of Father O'Callahan declared itself on the side of law enforcement in the following resolution: “Whatever may be the whole truth about the results of prohibitory legislation in the United States, there is abundant evidence of the evils of alcoholism in many quarters. We believe that sincere horror for such evils suggests unrelenting war on bootleggers and other criminals rather than vain discussion of actual or hypothetical conditions. Every duty is a duty of the hour, and suppression of the bootegger and attendant evils are the duty of this hour.”

To Prohibit the Use of Peyote

From Mexico has been introduced into the United States among the American Indians the Peyote bean, the use of which s particularly detrimental. It is a curious fact that the present drugs act of the United States does not prohibit the use of this bean though it is a very serious factor in the reservations of the country. Col. Carl Hayden of Arizona has introduced in the house a bill which will prevent the use of this drug. The Home Missions council is calling upon the churches to aid in securing the passage of the bill.

Northwestern Criticized for Giving Degree

The giving of a doctor's degree to Judge Gary at the recent commencement of Northwestern university has been the occasion of considerable adverse criticism in the Methodist denomination. The Pacific Christian Advocate objects to the giving of the degree not because of any fault in the judge as a private citizen, but on account of his policies in the steel industry. Halford E. Luccock, minister and son of a Methodist bishop, insists that his alma mater does not represent the spirit of the Methodist Episcopal church in the conferring of this degree. Judge Gary has been for many years one of the trustees of the university.

Jewish Women May Become Rabbis

While the Orthodox congregations of Jews still segregate the women in the religious service, and some of them require the women to sit behind screens during the worship, the Reformed Jews are much more progressive. Recently the Central Conference of American Rabbis took action permitting women to become rabbis. All of these will be educated at Hebrew Union college of Cincinnati, the only school which educates rabbis for the Reformed Jews. The women are not much in favor of the innovation yet, and it is not likely that the school will be over-crowded with them during the next ten years.

Hold Church Service Once a Year

A good many church deeds contain reversionary clauses which cause trouble in later years. These reversionary clauses sometimes refer to matters of doctrine, as is common among conservative Disciples who have split off from the main body in order to protest against the use of musical instruments in church worship. At North Colebrook, Conn., is a curious case. The building and grounds were given by General Edward A. Phelps, with the provision that in case church worship was not held in the building once a year the property should revert to his son. This clause was once regarded facetiously, but the industries of the little town have declined until there are no longer enough people to maintain a church. Once a year four people gather there and hold religious worship in order to prevent the loss of the building. This annual service was held recently.

Quakers Finish Their Task in Germany

It is announced that the Quakers have relinquished control of the feeding of children in Germany, and that the work will now be supported by people of German-American extraction in America. At one time over a million children were receiving a supplemental meal a day. One-

An Important Announcement

Boston University School of Religious Education and Social Service announces the publication of an edition of an invaluable manual for pastors, building committees, and Sunday-school workers who are responsible for the building, remodelling or equipping of a church plant or parish house. The manual is entitled:

STANDARDS FOR CITY CHURCH AND RELIGIOUS EDUCATION PLANTS

This book is the work of many architects, builders and religious education specialists. It was prepared at great expense. It contains a wealth of information not obtainable elsewhere.

The book lists 112 essential elements in an ideal church and religious education plant and establishes standards for each item for the guidance of building committees and architects. A score-card has been devised for the measuring of church plants on the basis of the standards. The 112 items are grouped under six headings as follows: I, Site; II, Building or buildings; III, Service Systems; IV, Church Rooms; V, Religious School Rooms; VI, Community Service Rooms.

The preparation of these standards marks an important epoch in the development of church and church school architecture. Building committees and all who are in any way responsible for the building or remodelling of church plants should have this volume. It is bound in boards. Sent postpaid for fifty cents.

third of the food supplies were given by Germans, and much volunteer labor was given in the distribution, including at one time forty thousand people. With every pack of food a card was given out which read: "This food is contributed by Americans, and is distributed by the religious Society of Friends, who for 250 years have held that love and good-will and not hatred, would bring better world conditions." In all the countries where work among children has been carried on, it has been discovered that there are so many orphans that the work will last for a decade and perhaps more before these children can be brought to the period of self-support.

Dr. Fosdick Wants Churches to Quit Quarreling

Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick is a Baptist, but is special preacher to First Presbyterian church of New York. He sees in the divisions of the churches one of the great sources of weakness for the cause of religion He said recently: "Consider the tragedy of the mine and rail strikes, and of the bitterness behind them. Consider the troubles of Europe, and a war not yet terminated in peace. Consider the crimes which are committed before our eyes daily, accounts of which fill the first pages of our papers. Consider the barrenness and futility of lives whipped by misery and sin. Then consider the quarrels in the churches over evolution, theories of inspiration, miracles and goodness knows what."

Are We a Nation of Low-Brows?

It is charged that the public is intellectually incompetent. Is this true? It is charged that the public is afraid of ideas, disinclined to think, unfriendly to culture. This is a serious matter. The facts should be faced frankly and honestly.

Without Cultural Leadership

The main criticism, as we find it, is that the people support ventures that are unworthy, that represent no cultural standards. The public is fed on low-brow reading matter, low-brow movies, low-brow theatrical productions, low-brow music, low-brow newspapers, low-brow magazines. We think the criticism is unfair in that it does not recognize the fact that the public is without cultural leadership. Those who have the divine spark get off by themselves. We believe the public has never had a real chance, never had an opportunity to get acquainted with the great and the beautiful things of life. Given half a chance, the public will respond.

We believe there has been enough talk about the public's inferior taste. The time has come to give the public an opportunity to find out something about philosophy, science and other higher things. And it must be done at a low price, because the average person's pocketbook is not fat. As it stands, the publishers charge about five dollars a volume, and then wonder why the people stand aloof.

We believe we have a way to find out if the people are interested in the deeper problems of life. And the first thing we decided was to fix a price that shall be within the reach of the person with the most slender purse.

We have selected a library of 25 books, which we are going to offer the public at an absurdly low price. We shall do this to find out if it is true that the public is not going to accept the better things when once given the chance. And we shall make the price so inviting that there shall be no excuse on the ground of expense.

All Great Things Are Simple

Once the contents of the following 25 books are absorbed and digested we believe a person will be well on the road to culture. And by culture we do not mean something dry-as-dust, something incomprehensible to the average mind—genuine culture, like sculpture, can be made to delight the common as well as the elect The books listed below are all simple works and yet they are great—all great things are simple. They are serious works, of course, but we do not think the public will refuse to put its mind on serious topics. Here are the 25 books:

Are the People Ready to Read These 25 Books?

Schopenhauer's Essays. For those who regard philosophy as a thing of abstractions, vague and divorced from life, Schopenhauer will be a revelation.

The Trial and Death of Socrates. This is dramatic literature as well as sound philosophy.

Meditations of Marcus Aurelius. This old Roman emperor was a paragon of wisdom and virtue. He will help you.

The Discovery of the Future. H. G. Wells asks and answers the question: Is life just an unsolvable, haphazard struggle?

Dialogues of Plato. This volume takes you into Plato's immortal circle.

Foundations of Religion. Prof. Cook asks and answers the question: Where and how did religious ideas originate?

Studies in Pessimism. Schopenhauer presents a well-studied viewpoint of life. The substance of his philosophy.

The Idea of God in Nature. John Stuart Mill. How the idea of God may come naturally from observation of nature is explained in this volume.

Life and Character. Goethe. The fruits of his study and observation is explained in this volume.

Thoughts of Pascal. Pascal thought a great deal about God and the Universe, and the origin and purpose of life.

The Olympian Gods. Tichenor. A study of ancient mythology.

The Stoic Philosophy. Prof. Gilbert Murray. He tells what this belief consisted of, how it was discovered, and what we can today learn from it.

God: Known and Unknown. Samuel Butler. A really important work.

Nietzsche: Who He Was and What He Stood For. A carefully planned study.

Sun Worship and Later Beliefs. Tichenor. A most important study for those who wish to understand ancient religions.

Primitive Beliefs. Tichenor. You get a clear idea from this account of the beliefs of primitive man.

Three Lectures on Evolution. Ernst Haeckel's ideas expressed so you can understand them.

From Monkey to Man. A comprehensive review of the Darwinian theory.

Survival of the Fittest. Another phase of Darwinian theory.

Evolution vs. Religion. You should read this discussion.

Reflections on Modern Science. Prof. Huxley's reflections definitely add to your knowledge.

Biology and Spiritual Philosophy. An interesting and instructive work.

Bacon's Essays. These essays contain much sound wisdom that still holds.

Emerson's Essays. Emerson was a friend of Carlyle, and in some respects a greater philosopher.

Tolstoi's Essays. His ideas will direct you into profitable paths of thought.

25 Books—2,176 Pages—Only $1.95—Send No Money

If these 25 books were issued in the ordinary way they might cost you as much as a hundred dollars. We have decided to issue them so you can get all of them for the price of one ordinary book. That sounds inviting, doesn't it? And we mean it too. Here are 25 books, containing 2,176 pages of text, all neatly printed on good book paper, 3½x5 inches in size, bound securely in card cover paper.

You can take these 25 books with you when you go to and from work. You can read them in your spare moments. You can slip four or five of them into a pocket and they will not bulge. You can investigate the best and the soundest ideas of the world's greatest philosophers—and the price will be so low as to astonish you. No, the price will not be $25 for the 25 volumes. Nor will the price be $5. The price will be even less than half that sum. Yes, we mean it. Believe it or not, the price will be only $1.95 for the entire library. That's less than a dime a volume. In fact, that is less than eight cents per volume. Surely no one can claim he cannot afford to buy the best. Here is the very best at the very least. Never were such great works offered at so low a price. All you have to do is to sign your name and address on the blank below. You don't have to send any money. Just mail us the blank and we will send you the 25 volumes described on this page—you will pay the postman $1.95 plus postage. And the books are yours.

If you want to send cash with order, remit $2.25.

Are we making a mistake in advertising works of culture? Are we doing the impossible when we ask the people to read serious works? Are we wasting our time and money? We shall see by the manner in which the blank below comes into our mail.

The Belief in God and Immortality

By JAMES H. LEUBA
Professor of Psychology in Bryn Mawr College; author of "A Psychological Study of Religion."

This book consists of three parts. The first is a scholarly investigation of the origins of the idea of immortality and embodies an important contribution to our knowledge of that subject. The second part consists of statistics of the belief of a large group of prominent persons in personal immortality and in a God with whom one may hold personal relations. The figures are in many respects startling.

The author's opinion is that the cause of the present religious crisis cannot be remedied by the devices usually put forward, for it has a much deeper cause than those usually discussed. Part 3 treats of the Present Utility of the Belief in God and in Immortality.

"A book which every clergyman, as well as every one interested in the psychology of religion and in the future of religion, should read and ponder. For Professor Leuba has made a contribution to our knowledge of religious belief that is of very considerable significance."—Prof. James B. Pratt, in the American Journal of Theology.

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

is the most inspiring and beautiful hymnal in the American church. All the best loved hymns of Christian faith are included and, in addition, the book is distinguished by three outstanding features:

Hymns of Social Service,

Hymns of Christian Unity,

Hymns of the Inner Life.

Think of being able to sing the Social Gospel as well as to preach it! The Social Gospel will never seem to be truly religious until the church begins to sing it.

Progress in the Social Gospel

THE history of social progress is tonic for the religious blues. Those who are struggling to gain recognition for the "social gospel" in religious circles have constant cause to feel discouraged by the sluggishness of the ecclesiastical mind, and the all but disastrous reactions which ecclesiastical agencies suffer. But stand off for a moment, away from the toil and roil of the immediate set-to with reactionary forces, and mark the distance society has come during recent years. Remember that whole generations were once under an inexorable religious domination constitutionally, often fiercely, anti-social. The whole weight of official religion was against attempts to find in or put into this life anything lovely and socially satisfying. The more the mind could be detached from this life and its attractions the more satisfying to religious ideals officially bent upon peopling a distant and spiritually remote heaven. To this day relics of this official attitude of mind persist. They are annoying, and often tragically discourage the eager spirit preaching and working out a rational and intelligent social gospel. Only think of working for God and humanity in an atmosphere where the very proposal to make this life wholesome and beautiful and satisfying were a heresy to call forth the maledictions and interdicts of thoroughly intrenched religious officialism! The courage of those who wrought and achieved, against all this, our present social emancipation of religion, should be a rebuke of our faintheartedness. Reactionary, anti-social ecclesiasticism may seem bad enough today, but it is now on the defensive. It dare not stand and work in the open. It cannot repress social activities under the sanctions of religion, except covertly and under peril of losing its last loosening grip upon the religious mind of the people. Only a short time ago it was regnant and over-bearing and could safely work its blighting purposes in the open. Progress is amazing. Take new courage!

Is There a Substitute for Church Attendance?

LONG ago when magazines first appeared some one proclaimed a substitute for church attendance. The Sunday newspaper was another find for the man who did not want to get up on Sunday morning and shave. The coming of the phonograph seemed to have the whole thing settled. One could buy or rent the records and have better music than the average church can support and a bit of a sermon. But still a lot of people were not convinced. Thousands persisted in keeping up the churches. The most recent substitute for church attendance is to listen in on the radio at home. Church services are being broadcasted from large cities all over the country. It is well that they are. The teen age boys who make up so large a selection of the wireless enthusiasts are not over-zealous about attending church. An old grandmother in Alabama heard a church service in Pittsburgh the other day. No one is unhappy that the gospel is brought to a shut-in. But there is really no substitute for attending church. Worship is social in its character. It may be that a man could worship God on the golf grounds on Sunday morning, but does he? The presence of people of like interest in divine things is a support to the spirit. Jesus gave his blessing to the gathering together of two or three in his name. His insight into human life made him appreciate the social character of worship. Nor is it to be forgotten that true worship makes an appeal to the will. The sermon that does not ask for action of some kind is a failure. But the most successful spiritual enterprise is that which leads to the cooperation of Christian people. The church service brings together the friends of Jesus Christ in preparation for the battles that are to be fought against sin and the labors of building the walls of Zion. The radio is a good way of advertising the gospel, but no sort of substitute for the altar in the house of God.

Combatting the Evils of Adolescence

GOOD-NATURED tolerance of whatever social fad arose among the young people has created whatever young people's problem there is in America. Doubtless the youth of the land are more unconventional than wicked, and it has ever been so. Nevertheless the court records and a number of other indications show unmistakably that there has really been a considerable increase of tragedy among the young people. This subject is studied by the organization called the National Congress of Mothers and Parent-Teacher Associations, which includes a large proportion of the mothers of the land, a hundred thousand having been added to the membership during the past year. In a recent meeting some aims were formulated in relation to current evils. Among these it is interesting to note that the first mentioned is a reform in dress. Much more significant, however, is the determination of the mothers to open up their own homes for recreation. This strikes at the root of the evil, for the home has abdicated its old-time function of serving the recreational needs of young people. The movie show, the ice-cream parlor and the public dance have seemed to make it unnecessary to direct recreation in the smaller groups. If it is wisely done, the home groups will get better recreation than those who herd in the crowds. The determination to have less dancing and more outdoor recreation is also an indication of wise consideration on the part of these Christian mothers. Among the resolutions passed is one against fraternities and sororities in high schools. In many states these are made illegal by public regulation, but wherever they are allowed, grave abuses are sure to come. The mothers insist that young people going out at night to a place of amusement shall be accompanied by an older person. This will probably be resisted more by independent American youth than any other of the new ideas, but every one of the older societies of earth have found just such a regulation necessary for the welfare of adolescents.

Religion and the Democratic Hope

RELIGION'S supreme task today is to imbue humanity with a faith in itself. "Ye believe in God, believe also in me," is one of the most pregnant utterances of Jesus. We are shut up to democracy. No other system of government, no other social order is thinkable. Whether it assume the republican, the constitutional-monarchical, or the communistic form, none who pretends to think through has any other proposal conceived to be feasible. Yet doubts of democracy befuddle multitudes of minds and weaken the endeavor of hosts. Official religion is itself the greatest sinner of all against this holy spirit, whose benign ministry alone offers hope of salvation. This is the tragic, disastrous anomaly of our present-day religious situation. A while ago it looked as though the whole machinery of American official religion might be seized by a cult which openly and vindictively repudiates this hope of humanity. The immediate peril may have passed; not all official religious agencies are to be sacrificed to this destructive delusion, masquerading as religion. Our self-styled fundamentalisms and millennialisms have suffered a determined set-back. Yet they are not destroyed. Among several important religious groups the balance is only against them. Whether they can "come back," and acquire the determinative control to which they have aspired, is not a closed question. The spirit and aim of democracy embody the hope of humanity, and systems of thought and programs of endeavor which commit sacrilege upon this sanctity are and can only be spiritually disastrous. Those who preach and practice them are the anti-Christ of today's religious crisis. If the very light of faith and hope within us be darkness, how great is that darkness! That is the true religion which reveals the everlasting salvability of human society. It will not be blinded by cheap delusions, it will not recklessly and simperingly muddle along, it will not stolidly accept and endure preventable evils, it will resolutely and intelligently employ every remediable device with which the utmost science of the past and the present can endow society. But even where these break under the load and falter before the crisis, faith will hold firm. The solution of some problems must doubtless wait, but hope abides invincible and endures to the end of the ages when it springs from this true religion. The supreme task of religion is to imbue humanity with an undaunted faith in itself. Systems and programs unfaithful to that aim are not religion; they are a baneful irreligion.

For Every Minister a Man's Job

MINISTERS who quit preaching for business and other professions are interesting to the denominational diagnosticians. In some communions this leakage is absorbing most of the gain from the colleges. One may find the names of college graduates in the year-book for two or three years, and then they disappear. Sometimes men in prominent city pulpits leave religious work for a salesman's job, or for the lecture platform, or for journalistic work, or real estate. One of the things wrong is that the man in a small town who prepares two sermons each week to preach to a handful of people feels that he does not have a man's job. If he gathers the boys together for some social activities, he can have only a few, for he is at once countered by other denominations that are jealous of their prestige. The denominational order of things in the nature of the case must preclude a considerable number of ministers from having a man's job. In more than eight hundred communities in the United States there is now a community or federated church. Sometimes this results in lessening the number of ministers in the community. Sometimes the number is the same after the combination as before. In any community ministers could create big tasks for themselves if they would agree to a differentiation in their function. The man who can preach should be given a real audience. The man who is not so effective a preacher, but a capable educator should have a great religious school to challenge his best efforts. The recreational program of the community can be correlated under one leader. Thus the ministers might strike their pace, each man doing the thing for which he is specially prepared, and every minister feeling that he has a man's job. It is maddening to muddle through a variety of tasks without reaching the higher levels of achievement in any one of them. Even under our denominational order we could be getting closer together and multiplying the church's and the ministry's efficiency if the preachers themselves would combine in the spirit of comradeship and do team work.

The Index Expurgatorius

BOOKSELLERS report a great increase of demand for the books of Anatole France since the Roman church has put them upon the Index of Prohibited Books by the Roman Catholic church. This method of dealing with obnoxious books arose with the Protestant reformation. The council of Trent conceived the idea, and in 1564 Pope Pius IV brought out the Index Tridentinus. The body which holds the power to put books on the index is called: "The Congregation of the Index of Prohibited Books" and consists of a competent number of cardinals, with a secretary taken from the Order of Preachers, and a great number of theological and other professors who are called Consultors, the chief of whom is the Master of the Apostolic Palace, the primary and official Consultor of this congregation." As a result, some of the choicest books of science, history and general literature are now to be found upon the index. Indeed the index represents in large measure the ideas that have been formative in the making of our modern world. A Catholic scholar may get permission from his bishop to read these forbidden books, but the ordinary layman puts himself in peril of damnation if he looks into one of them. The whole idea seems absurd enough these days when most people rush off to buy the prohibited books, even though they be denounced for immorality. Yet Protestants have themselves taken a hand in putting books upon their own index. In nearly every denomination among the evangelical bodies there is some writer who is on the index. As a result the young preachers and the laymen tend to buy his books. Just now in the conservative Protestant circles the chief candidate for the index is Charles Darwin. The effect is that public libraries are having a run on Darwin, though there are now better books to be had on the subject of evolution. The moral is too obvious to require mention.

No Creed But the New Testament

A few moments before the Disciples convention held at Winona Lake, Ind., passed a vote of approval upon the creedal resolution announced some time ago by the board of managers of the missionary organization, fraternal delegates from two other conventions meeting at the same time on the same grounds were received by the Disciples assembly and felicitous greetings were exchanged. The visitors represented the denominations known as the Brethren and the Christian church, respectively. Behind the gracious and earnest words of fellowship spoken on behalf of all three bodies a layman of keen perception saw this puzzle picture: Of these three denominations one says, We have no creed; we take the New Testament alone as our rule of faith and practice and we are now about to pass a resolution in "harmony with the teachings of the New Testament" forbidding our missionaries on the foreign field to receive into the fellowship of their churches any person who has not been baptized by immersion. Another says, We likewise have no creed; we take the New Testament alone as our rule of faith and practice and we will not receive into our membership any person who has not been immersed three times in water. The third denomination says, We also have no creed; we take the New Testament alone as our rule of faith and practice, and we receive persons into our fellowship by affusion or immersion, or without the use of water at all. Puzzle number one: Which group represents the teaching of the New Testament? Puzzle number two: What is the difference between a creed and an authoritative interpretation of the New Testament?

When Foreign Missions Become Home Missions

EVOLUTION works rapidly in some things. In nothing has there been more rapid change than in foreign missions. Perhaps some of the pioneer missionaries did justify the cartoonist's idea of a missionary as a long-faced individual reading the Bible to the aborigines. But soon the missionary became teacher, kindergartner, physician, social worker, industrial leader. The whole task of missions was interpreted from the standpoint of offering to the nations everything connected with the Christian outlook on life. Foreign missions have become modernized long before the home churches because on the foreign field the religious society being created is young and plastic. The home churches will have a long march yet to catch up with the methods of the foreign missionaries. But is the next step in the missionary program the elimination of the foreign missionary? At the national conference of Christian workers in Shanghai recently the Chinese set up a number of aims among which was native support of Christian churches and native control of these churches. It is becoming increasingly apparent that as soon as institutions can be created for the training of native workers the work will be better done by them than by foreigners. These native workers must be trained in China, for the Chinese who comes to America for an education is in danger of being remote from his people when he gets back home. As soon as native control comes to the Chinese Christian movement, western denominationalism will disappear in that land. It has long been an absurdity in western eyes. It is a nuisance in the eyes of the Chinese. Only the necessities of infancy have compelled the Chinese to tolerate these western sectarian distinctions so long. With native trained leaders, what will be the responsibility of western lands? Perhaps for a considerable time there will be need for western teachers and physicians. But gradually this need will disappear. For a much longer period there will be need of foreign money, for the Chinese are too poor to meet the needs of an expanding religious movement. And on beyond is the time when all missions will be home missions, when all Christian work will be done with native workers, with such intermingling of wisdom and experience and service as to blot out the distinction of home and foreign.

Apparent Reaction, Real Progress

AT the International Convention of Disciples held at Winona Lake, Indiana, the creedal resolution adopted last January by the board of managers of the United Christian Missionary Society, directing that all missionaries and ministers in its employ shall receive into their churches only those who have been immersed, was approved by an overwhelming vote. This news has been given to the general public by daily press dispatches which have generally adopted a non-technical phrasing to the effect that the Disciples voted "to make immersion compulsory." At a mass meeting of perhaps 3,000 people (the Disciples convention is not a delegate body) it is doubtful if more than thirty persons stood to vote against the resolution. It will be difficult for those who were not in attendance at Winona either to believe or to understand this unprecedented departure from a principle which has characterized the very genius of the Disciples for a hundred years. This is the first successful attempt in the history of this communion formally to standardize any particular interpretation of scripture and to invest it with an authority above that of the autonomous local congregation. Yet it is doubtful that the doctrinal or theoretical significance of this action will prove to be so incredible to the general Christian public as the human and fraternal aspect of it. Missionaries in China and other lands have found themselves in situations where the will of Christ that they should extend unqualified fellowship to unimmersed and unshepherded Christians was so unmistakable that they have been for a number of years freely practicing Christian unity in their local groups, never dreaming that their home constituency would do otherwise than give approval.

For the past two or three years the facts concerning this fraternal procedure on the mission field have been brought bit by bit to the attention of the missionary officials, and the denomination in general. The disclosures culminated in a report on the facts presented by Rev. John T. Brown, a member of the executive committee, fresh from a tour of investigation of the Disciples' oriental mission stations, and a series of signed statements of fact voluntarily prepared by the China missionaries themselves, describing the various forms under which they undertook to carry their Disciple ideal of Christian unity and fraternity into actual practice. That what goes under the popular, though not altogether satisfactory, name of "open membership" is not an uncommon procedure on certain mission fields is now indisputable. It has also been established as an axiom from which it is hard to believe any one can in moral candor dissent, that the Disciples are committed by the most obvious ethical sanctions to treat unimmersed Christians in territory from which affusion-practicing denominations have by mutual agreement withdrawn, as though they were indeed Christians, as truly and fully so as are Disciples themselves. These considerations —the violation of a basic principle of the Disciples character, the inhibition which the creedal resolution puts upon the natural Christian impulses of the missionaries, and the point of honor involved in the Disciples' relations with other Christian bodies—will make it difficult for the public which hears only the report that the Winona convention approved the creedal resolution to condone such action or to imagine that behind it there is any alleviating or illuminating explanation.

The Christian Century can find no ground upon which Disciples may regard their Winona action lightly. We believe it involves a great communion of Christians in ethical entanglements and in the same ecclesiastical sophistries under which all the dogmatic creeds of Christendom have found their apologetic. Yet those who were present at Winona know that the assumption of ecclesiastical authority by the board of managers was as generally repugnant to the convention as the vote to approve their action was overwhelming. And any one who was not present but who is acquainted with the inward spirit and habit of the Disciples will instinctively say to himself that something must have lain behind this uncharacteristic decision, something the entire story of which is not told by the bare report that the resolution was approved. And this of course is true. Leading up to the parliamentary action were many more or less hidden processes, the total effect of which was to make plausible a course of action to which the Disciple spirit is totally unaccustomed, and the inevitable outcome of which will surely cause them shame. In the light of these extra-parliamentary considerations the action will not lose its embarrassing character but it will be seen not to justify the interpretation that the Disciples have lapsed into the sectarianism which the face of the event plainly suggests. The truth is that while on the face of the returns the denomination appears to have reverted to an unfraternal dogmatic level, the convention gave tokens unmistakable that the denomination is moving forward to high levels of vision and culture and social passion and Christian fellowship. Inexcusable as we believe the action on this one matter to be, the Disciples are making progress as rapidly as any other Christian communion in America. The reaction is only apparent; the progress is real. This optimistic reading of the story of Winona is justified by the entire program outside this one event. The convention utterances were most congenial to modern minded men. The old straw was not once beaten over. Not a single reactionary address was delivered. Not even in the debate on the creedal resolution was a reactionary speech made.

Every speaker, from President Stephen E. Fisher in his official address, to the splendidly conceived sermon of Professor Vernon Stauffer of Transylvania College, on the closing Sunday, struck the imperative notes of spiritual reality, social passion and fellowship unafraid, as they have never been sounded before in Disciples gatherings. Not in twenty years have the Disciples held a more prophetic gathering. Amazing growth in liberality of mind was registered. The debates were all upon the highest level of decorum and mutual respect. The controversial vulgarities of the past ten years were conspicuously absent. We regard this aspect of the convention as too important and too unmistakable to allow the general Christian public to make the erroneous inference from the passing of an ugly faced resolution that the convention itself wore the same ugly face. This is the very opposite of the truth.

And when the action on the board of managers' resolution is set against its convention background there are disclosed facts which confirm this optimistic appraisal both of the convention and of the denomination. Among the background influences which haunted and undid the mind of the convention were two ghosts which always walked together. They were on the one hand the fact of a deficit of $271,000 with a total debt of $400,000 which the United Society now faces, and on the other hand, the menacing gesture of division which the reactionary journal of the denomination was at the very moment of the conventions' sessions shrewdly making. It was freely talked in the lobbies and conferences that a division, or even a substantial disaffection at this time would throw the United Society into bankruptcy, and that if the convention should cast the faintest shadow of variation in any matter at all related to the open membership controversy, the fact would be seized upon by the conservative organ to give pith and purchase to a certain congress of disaffected spirits called for next October in St. Louis. There are not a few Disciples leaders whose ingenuous minds are gravely impressed by the great show of power a newspaper is able to give itself by the use of bold type in announcing a movement of protest. These leaders stand in mortal dread of a division which they feel sure the conservative newspaper is able to bring about whenever it is ready to say the word. They made the plea that the opposition allow an approving vote to be cast for the sake of the treasury, of harmony, and to avoid further embarrassment to the administrative officers whose treatment of the whole matter in the past has been anything but candid. This plea met with a strangely general response from many men and women of high ethical feeling, particularly inasmuch as it was accompanied with the assurance that the creedal resolution would neither be heeded nor long remembered. Facing, from such a point of view, not only division, but division leading direct to the bankruptcy of their missionary organization, the leaders were tirelessly active in persuading others to see the two ghosts as they saw them, and to vote in the fear of them.

A second factor of equal importance which persuaded many was what might fairly accurately be called a propaganda of inevitable future revision of the creedal resolution. This propaganda was of course not organized or self conscious as such, but it arose in the most intimate official circles. No sooner had the action been taken by the board of managers last January than many of the members themselves saw their mistake and regretted it. Under the pressure of a pragmatic emergency, they had violated a fundamental principle of the communion whose missionary work they had been set to administer. They did it in the interest of peace—and, on the part of some, not knowing what they did. It was freely said in the hotels and convention groups that if the board of managers had it to do over again, they would not favor such a resolution. It was authentically reported that of seventeen members of a subcommittee of the board of managers appointed to consider this issue before it went to the floor of the convention, fifteen frankly declared themselves opposed to it if there was some way in which they could consider it de novo.

Members of the board and officials of the society gave out the impression that one of the chief obstacles to its rescinding now was the fact that, having once passed the resolution standardizing a particular interpretation of scripture, and assuming the prerogative of ecclesiastical authority, the repeal of the resolution could hardly recreate the neutral and prudential status which is the only right position for a mission board of the Disciples of Christ to occupy. Later on, it was more than hinted, the matter will be quietly taken up by the board, and the yoke of ecclesiastical imposition removed from the neck of the missionaries. This propaganda saturated the entire convention. Except for the large number of local visitors from within a radius of one hundred miles, who crowded into the tabernacle on the day of the voting—and of course, voted—the entire convention made up its mind on the issue with this counsel of hush in its ears, and the assurance that it would all come out right in the end. It was generally understood throughout the convention that the author of the resolution who last January resisted every persuasion to modify it, was himself dissatisfied with it and intended when things had quieted down to take initiative looking toward its modification or abrogation. It is not difficult to understand how subtly such influences would work to undermine the morale of the opponents of the creedal pronouncement and persuade them to an attitude of parliamentary acquiescence.

This breakdown of the opposition's morale was revealed in the first and only caucus which it undertook to hold. The large gathering, informally assembled, was unable to find an open road which seemed not to lead to embarrassment. Its action was inhibited by a multiplicity of proposed alternatives, none of which was without serious demerit. When at last the debate was in full swing on the floor of the house, the most conspicuous leader of the opposition, Dr. E. L. Powell of Louisville, spoke in favor of approving the resolution. He derived his willingness to approve not from the resolution itself, which he abhorred, but from its interpretation in the Higdon correspondence. The effect of this speech and the general unlikemindedness of the opposition as respects mode of procedure, left the field to those who publicly declared that the resolution was no violation of Disciples principles while they privately passed the assurance around that it surely would not stand as it is.

The Higdon interpretation which was attached to the resolution as voted upon by the convention (see page 1140 of this issue), constituted, together with a parliamentary decision, the two most palpable explanations of the overwhelming vote. The Higdon interpretation involves so important a principle of morality that it is our purpose to consider it at a later time in another connection. The pivot upon which the whole day's event turned, however, was an unconscionable restriction of parliamentary procedure. According to the constitution, the convention has no alternatives save to approve, disapprove or recommit a recommendation sent to it from the recommendations committee. When Rev. Roger T. Nooe of Frankfort, Ky., moved to recommit with the suggestion that the board of managers' resolution be amended by substituting another resolution, he was declared out of order. Where the authority for this decision is found nobody, not even the gracious president of the convention himself, seemed to know, though precedents exist in the records of the convention for entertaining such a motion. Mr. Nooe's substitute resolution was as follows:

> Whereas, it has always been the position of the Disciples of Christ in respect to Christian faith and practice that any statement exceeding the New Testament is too much, any statement short of the New Testament is too little, and any statement the same as the new Testament is superfluous,
> Therefore, we announce that the United Christian Missionary Society is doing its work everywhere on the principle of the all-sufficiency of the New Testament without official interpretation by the board of managers or any other organized body among us.

A Disciples convention never would have voted against this resolution! Had the Winona assembly been allowed fairly to come face to face with its own genius as embodied in Mr. Nooe's resolution, it would have chosen it instantly in preference to the formula of apostasy to which parliamentary procedure restricted its consideration.

The Frog Under the Bridge

A Parable of Safed the Sage

ONCE upon a time there was a Frog, who lived in a Nice, Dark, Damp House at the end of a Brook where it came forth from the Lake. For there had been a place where they raised Cranberries, and they led the water forth in its season and flooded the Cranberry Meadow. But that was in the days of yore, for the Cranberry Meadow hath no more Cranberries. And the Frog had a Nice, Dark, Damp House, under a Bridge, with the Lake at one end and the Little Brook at the other, and on the sides were planks.

And I came unto this place in the Good Old Summer Time, and I beheld and said, That little Brook is All to the Good, for a Spring feedeth it, and the water floweth; but the Dam is old, and the Planks are Decayed, and the place Leaketh, and maketh Pools where mosquitos may breed. Go to, now, we will tear out the old Bridge, and fill in the Flume with Gravel, and wall it in with Stones.

And this Closed one chapter in the Cranberry industry of our great nation.

Now the men who worked for me pulled away a Plank. And the Frog was in Terror. For he said, The Roof of mine House is broken up, and the Sky is about to fall in upon me.

And they tore off another Plank, and the Frog was in More Terror. And the Sun looked in, and there was nothing hid from the heat thereof. And they tore off some more Plank.

Then began they to shovel in the Gravel; for they said, Behold, we have torn away the supports, and the Water presseth hard against the Planks at the end; and if it once shall get started through here, we shall not be able to stop it; therefore must we shovel hard. And they cast Gravel in on the right side, and the Frog jumped to the left side. And they cast Gravel in on the left side, and he jumped back to the right side. And they cast more Gravel in on the right side, and he tried to climb up the Planks at the end toward the Lake. And his eyes bulged out, and his heart beat so hard that his sides shook.

And I spake unto the men, saying, Stop, and let one of you climb down and cause that Frog to jump out toward the Brook; for what profit shall it be to us to hurt one of God's creatures?

And when the man jumped down, then was the Frog more terrified than ever; and he jumped several ways at once. But in spite of himself he jumped out into the Brook, and there he was safe.

Now the men shoveled in many loads of Gravel and filled up that House that had been the Frog's. But he found another House in the Brook, where he could sit on a Nice Slippery Stone, with water up to his Neck. And he said Honk, Honk, Honk, which is Frog language, and meaneth, This is a good old world.

And I thought of the many and startling changes that come in this world to Frogs and Philosophers, and I resolved to be as brave as the Frog.

In an Age of Science

THE little world of olden days is gone,
A thousand universes come to light;
The eyes of science penetrate the night
And bring good tidings of eternal dawn:
There is no night, they find, there is no death,
But life begetting ever fuller life;
They look still deeper, and amid the strife
They note pervading harmony. The breath
Of morning sweeps the wastes of earth,
And we who talked of age become as gods.
Scanning the spheres, discoursing of the birth
Of countless suns. No longer human clods,
We stand alert and speak direct to Him,
Who hides no more behind dumb seraphim.

The Spirit of Christ

By Charles E. Jefferson

"IF a man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his." So said the first great interpreter of the Christian religion. The statement is straightforward, emphatic, and beautifully clear. Only seventeen words, and all but one of them monosyllables. One does not need a dictionary to read them. A child of six can take them in. It is a sentence without mist or fog. It has in it the note of finality. It is positive, dogmatic, solid as an axiom. It is in the style of Euclid. Paul is not setting forth a thesis for discussion. There are some things not open for debate. A few questions are closed. We say there are two sides to everything, but there are not two sides to this. You cannot say that if a man have not the spirit of Christ it makes no difference. Everybody sees that if a man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his. There are axioms in religion as in mathematics. This is one of them. Like all axioms this one is a basal truth, and therefore a truth to start with. In working out intricate problems we must begin with fundamental principles. The only way to illumine a confused situation is to flash on it the light of an elemental truth. Unless we begin with facts which are incontrovertible we cannot prosper in our efforts to solve the problems of life.

To begin with forms is a constant temptation. It is the surface things which catch the eye and arrest the mind. It is easier to deal with measures than with truths, to frame programs than to mould dispositions, to devise machinery than to create a new heart. Measures and programs and machinery are indispensable. Without them we cannot go on. They deserve not a little of our time and our thoughts. But our machinery and schedules and policies are all the time disappointing us because we have neglected the things which lie deeper. We get into morasses because we start at the wrong point. The house falls because we do not go down to the rock. In this cathedral dedicated to God, in whom we live, and move and have our being, to Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord, and to the Holy Ghost, our advocate and guide, it is fitting that before we enter on the work that lies before us, we should think together of some things which are fundamental and all controlling.

BEGINNINGS

"If a man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his." Too often we begin and end with the words of Jesus. His words are wonderful. They lie before us in the New Testament. They are often on our lips. It is easy to repeat them and conjure with them. Does the church possess the words of Jesus? Yes. Does the church possess the spirit of Christ? That is an embarrassing question. But if the church have not the spirit of Christ it is none of his. No matter how diligent it is in repeating his words—"Many will say to me Lord, Lord."

Sometimes we do not begin with Christ at all, we begin with the church, its forms of worship, its sacraments, its orders, its government, its creedal statements, its traditions. But the first great Christian preacher did not begin in his thinking with the church, he began always with Christ. To him Christ is all. If we have the spirit of Christ, we have everything. If we have not his spirit we have nothing. That was Paul's conviction. See what this means. A man may be baptized with water, but if he is not baptized into the spirit of Christ he is none of his. A man may come to the sacrament of the Lord's supper all through his life, but if he have not the spirit of Christ he has no part with him. A man may repeat the most orthodox of the creeds, but if he have not the spirit of Christ, he is not a believer. Paul had a genius for seeing through shams. He always cut to the core, he grasped the essence, he made his way into the marrow. He did not allow his eye to wander from the main point. He saw that if a man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his. This is not a dictum to be recited or quibbled over, but a truth to be pondered over and accepted, and built on. Let us reckon with it today.

PAUL ON THE SPIRIT OF CHRIST

"If a man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his." Paul liked to say this. He says it now in one way and now in another. Like all great preachers he varies his language in order that the truth may have a better chance to capture the mind. To the Romans he says it in prose. To the Corinthians he says it in poetry. To the man on the Tiber he is as curt and matter of fact and peremptory as Pontius Pilate with his "What is written is written." To the Greeks he is as picturesque and opulent as Pilate. "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels and have not love—in other words if I have not the spirit of Christ I am nothing but noise"—I am not creating music that can be caught up and woven into the everlasting harmonies. The Corinthians like certain moderns put primary emphasis upon rhetoric and knowledge. Paul asserts, "Though I know all the mysteries and all knowledge and have not the spirit of Christ I am nothing." There were some in Corinth as there are some now who talked much about faith. They had caught up the word of Jesus and were making a fetish of it. Paul declares, "Though I have all faith so that I could remove mountains, and have not the spirit of Christ I am nothing." There were Corinthians who made good works the be-all and end-all of religion, and their descendants have gone abroad through all the earth. Their religion consisted in feeding poor people. Paul proclaims, "Though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor and have not the spirit of Christ it profits me nothing." Philanthropy is not religion. It is possible to scatter large benefactions and have a heart at enmity with God. Even martyrdom does not always possess ethical value. Men can become martyrs through superstition or fanaticism, or through sheer stubbornness, and Paul lays it down "though I give my body to be burned, and have not the spirit of Christ it does not help me at all."

Here is a truth which the apostle is determined to drive home. Everything, so he thinks, depends on this being understood. The future of the church and of religion and of civilization itself all hangs on this. If men fail to see that being a Christian means possessing the spirit of Christ then all the future course of the world's life will be bound in shallows and miseries.

SPIRIT OF CHRIST

What is the spirit of Christ? Fortunately we are not left in the dark. There is much twilight in the New Testament but not at this point. Many things which we want to know about Jesus the New Testament refuses to disclose. One thing it makes gloriously luminous—the spirit of Christ. His soul stands out before us radiant, full statured, clear cut as a star. We are uncertain sometimes as to his works, we are never in doubt concerning the sort of man he was. We are always absolutely sure of his attitude, his disposition, his spirit. First of all he was brotherly. His spirit was warmly fraternal. His heart was big and friendly. He was a brother to everybody. The crowd at once saw that. His brotherliness was amazing, unprecedented, even scandalous. He carried it too far, so thought the scribes. He shocked the prudent by being too brotherly. He was the friend of publicans and sinners. That was the first indictment brought in against him. To Jesus brotherliness is of the essence of true religion. Fellowship is cordial and indispensable. In religion worship does not come first, brotherliness comes first. It is far easier to worship than to be brotherly. "If thou bring thy gift to the altar and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar and go thy way—first be reconciled to thy brother and then come and offer thy gift." This is what he was always saying. His disciples could never forget it. One of them, when he was an old man, wrote "He that loveth not his brother, whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" Brotherliness expresses itself in intercourse, communion, cooperation. The Christian who is zealous in worship and indifferent to fellowship does not know the abc of Christianity. What foolery to make a great to-do about forms of worship and crucify the spirit of brotherliness. Church bigots and snobs, ecclesiastical autocrats and churls have no part with Christ. Paul is right—"If a man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his." Brotherliness is the first note of a genuine Christian church.

Brotherliness leads to service. Christ was a servant. No one questions that. He so glorified the word servant that his disciples could think of no higher title for themselves than "servants." "He went about doing good." That was Peter's description of Jesus' life when he held Jesus up before the Romans in the house of Cornelius in Cæsarea. Jesus loved to think of himself as a servant. "The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto but to minister." "If any man will be great let him become the servant of all." The man who rises highest is the man who serves most. At the end of his life Jesus, standing with a basin of water in one hand and a towel in the other, said, "I have given you an example." The disciple who wrote the fourth gospel has nothing to say about the sacrament of the bread and wine; he fixes attention upon the sacrament of the basin and towel. The spirit of Christ is, then, the spirit of service. A Christian man is always helpful. If he have not this spirit of helpfulness he does not belong to Christ. If a church is not a servant of the town, of the world, it is none of his. What matters it what you label it?

Brotherly service finds its climax in sacrifice. The spirit of Jesus is the spirit of sacrifice. Does anyone doubt it? The fundamental principle of Christianity is self-denial. When Paul urges men to have the mind that was in Christ, he portrays the self-surrender of the man Jesus, obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Jesus was always laying down his life for others. "If any man will come after me, let him take up his cross every day." The church is right in making the cross the symbol of the Christian faith.

BROTHERLY SERVICE

Here then we stand in the presence of the soul of Jesus. He is brotherly, helpful, self-denying. His spirit is the spirit of fraternity, service and loving sacrifice. If a man have not this same spirit he is none of his. If a church is not baptised into this same spirit it does not belong to him. If you roll brotherliness, service, and sacrifice into one word, you have love. The spirit of Jesus is the spirit of love. "God is love," and Jesus is the express image of his Father, and is therefore love. The Holy Spirit is the spirit of the Father and also of the Son, and therefore the Holy Spirit is the spirit of love. The kingdom of God is the sway of love. If the world is full of suspicion, and fear, and ill will, the kingdom of God has not come. If the church abounds in unbrotherliness and selfishness and dissention the kingdom of God has not come. All Christians are expected to pray constantly that the sway of love may come. It must come first of all to those who offer the prayer. The sway of love must be first in the church. If it is not there it is not likely to be anywhere. It cannot be there until Christians repent and are born from above. Christ is inexorable on this point. "A new commandment I give unto you that ye love one another as I have loved you." Men are always willing to love up to a certain point and after a conventional standard. We become real Christians only in loving our fellow Christians as Christ has loved us. This is his type of love which will save the church and the world. No lower grade of love will meet the situation. The publicans' style or the Gentiles' type are not sufficient. There must be the generous, forgiving, overflowing, reckless love of Christ. We must forgive our enemies, and do good to them that despitefully use us. It is this Christlike type of love in Christian men which is to convince the world that Jesus is from heaven. Such love is the only badge of discipleship, the only satisfactory proof of loyalty. It is the only orthodoxy recognized in heaven. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love one for another." A loveless church is not a Christian church. A church which does not serve humanity does not belong to Christ. A divided church is a stumbling block and scandal. A church made up of groups of men who are unbrotherly, and who hold aloof from mutual service and who refuse to cooperate in loving sacrifice for the attainment of common ends is a church which is a disappointment to the heart of Christ. The nations will never be won by the observance of sacraments. The world can only be won by the massed cohorts of Christians who love one another as Christ has loved them. If the church have not the spirit of Christ it is none of his. Until that axiomatic truth is faced, and accepted, and incarnated, we must remain outside the city whose gates are pearl.

"If a man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his." Let us put a fresh emphasis on that. If he does not have the mind of Christ he is contributing nothing to that public opinion which will some day control the world. If he does not have the heart of Christ he does not count in the sum total of redemptive forces.

If the church has not the spirit of Christ it is none of his. Let us stress that. Jesus of Nazareth walked boldly across national, racial and social lines, and he said "Follow me." Let us follow him. It is the duty of the church to walk unafraid across national frontiers. It is ordained to carry across national boundaries, considerateness and helpfulness, and forgiveness and sacrifice. It should do this audaciously. Men must learn to clasp hands across racial chasms. The church must train them to do it. Men's hearts must touch one another through the barriers of nationality and race and tradition and prejudice. The intertwining of human sympathies and affections, to this mighty work the church is called. If the church have not the spirit of Christ it is none of his.

DIPLOMACY

If a nation have not the spirit of Church it is none of his. Let us say that with authority, and let us say it often. Diplomacy must be baptised into the spirit of Christ. This must be insisted on. The diplomat must obey the law of Christ. He must be brotherly. His ambition must be to help, and he must do his work within sight of the principle of sacrifice. The mailed fist must go—only the pierced hands can lift the world to new levels. Love is the mightiest force in the universe. Let us believe it and act upon it. Scientists are not ashamed of the law of gravitation. It is inexorable, unchangeable, and those who ignore it perish. Let us not apologize for the law of love. It also is unalterable, inflexible, and those who violate it are ground to powder. The world is in its present deplorable condition solely because of the long continued and outrageous trampling upon the law of love.

If a government have not the spirit of Christ it is none of his. If it lack his spirit it is doomed. Its wealth will not save it, nor its learning, nor its genius, nor its military power. If a nation have not the spirit of Christ it must go down. Let us press this upon the mind and conscience of the world. Let us put it in the forefront of all our teaching. Got has made of one flesh every nation of men to dwell on all the face of the earth, having determined their appointed seasons and the bounds of their habitations. Corporate life is ordained of God, and ruled by him. National development is held in the grip of unchanging and irresistible law. God is love, and rulers and statesmen lead nations to the abyss if they refuse to obey the law of love. Nations, like individuals, live and move and have their being in God (namely in love). No nation lives to itself. Every nation is vitally related to every other nation, and all nations are bound up in the life of the Lord of love. A nation which refuses to do justly and love mercy and walk humbly with its neighbors in the path of brotherly service and goodwill is sooner or later dashed to pieces like a potter's vessel. Those who doubt this should read history.

INTERNATIONAL REALM

It is in the international realm that the church must, through the coming centuries, perform its most zealous and arduous labor. The world is sick and the church must heal it. The world is torn by evil spirits, suspicion and fear, and greed, and injustice, and hate, and revenge, and all these must be cast out. The church is commissioned to cast out demons. War is a demon. War must go. We must have a warless world if we are to have any world at all. Let us demand in the name of Christ that preparations for war throughout shall cease. Preparing for war leads to war. We can never have peace so long as nations prepare for war. Let us insist that target practice shall come to an end. Let us denounce it as blasphemy against God, a conscienceless trampling on our word to the young men who went out to die in the great war, heartened by our promise that that would be the last war. Let us cry out unitedly against the building of battleships, those breeders of fear, and against the construction of bomb-dropping aeroplanes, those fomentors of hate, and against the creation of all those instruments of death whose very existence arouses suspicion and poisons the springs of international goodwill.

God calls all men to repent. To repent is not to cry or to feel bad. We have cried enough. To repent is to change one's mind. God commands us to change our ways of thinking. We think like men, and the world can never become better or happier until we think like God. We think like God only when we think like Christ. When we think like Christ we think in terms of justice and mercy, of tenderness and forgiveness and goodwill. When we think like Christ we believe in men. We trust them, we suffer long and still are kind. We are patient with them, and we forgive them when they do us wrong. We claim them as our brothers.

THE PRESENT NEED

To bring the separated races together and to train alienated nations to love one another—this is our heavenly Father's business and we must be about it. There are many obstacles. We must travel the way of the cross. The adversaries are not few. We must go by way of Golgotha. The discouragements and disappointments and defeats and delays make the heart sick—this is the cup which our Father has given us to drink. Shall we not drink it? If God is for us who is against us? "He that spared not his own son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not also with him freely give us all things." "If ye being evil know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father who is in heaven give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him."

"And When Even Was Come"

A Story of India

By Oscar MacMillan Buck

"And when even was come they brought unto him many possessed with demons, and he cast out the spirits with a word, and healed all that were sick." Matthew 8:16.

I HEARD the story from Solomon Titus, the *pricher-in-charj of the Khairnagar *Sarkit and I record it as I heard it:

"The day, Sahib, had been one to break one's heart—the old story of neglected Christians. I had not been there for three years and no Christian munshi for five months. If in the Holy Land of Yishu (Jesus) an enemy could sow a crop of tares in a single night, pray tell me what are the sowing of many enemies in this unholy land through a hundred and fifty successive nights, when there is none to watch and to prevent? Do you wonder the little blades of Christian thought and character are smothered ere they sprout? The soil is fertile, as you know, Sahib, if it is irrigated and tended—but Hindustan knows no Christian harvests from mere scattering of seed. So it was in this village.

"I went to the home of the chaudri in the Chamar muhulla—he was the leader of the little Christian group. He was the 'elder,' responsible for gathering the group together for the evening worship and for their conduct. But the gatherings had long since ceased, and conduct ran in the old channels. The chaudhri was in the fields and I sought him there. He salaamed low enough but shamefacedly. I asked for the gathering together of the Christians, and he began to make excuse—a wedding was on and many could not come, others were busy with fields and oxen. Was it not so in the Teacher's day? Surely the Holy Land and Hindustan are not so far apart.

"I returned alone to the village, and an old woman sitting by a cattle-stall, tending her naked grandchildren, told me the rest: of the return of idolatry and magic, of the power of the Bhagat, the magician-priest, and his exactions, of the regrowing of the sacred locks of hair, of the return to the biradari,† and of innumerable quarrels and contentions. Surely a fair harvest of tares—ripe for the sickle and for the burning!

"In sickness of heart I passed into the large mango-grove at the edge of the village. The mangoes were in white bloom. My little leather bag with strap and buckle, that held my Injil‡ and my hymn-book, my Dharutula and my scripture portions, I laid high up in the branches while I sat low on the ground in discouragement and defeat. I laid my head on my arm and closed my eyes. Did not the Teacher himself say that tares were to be left to the angels of heaven and not to be pulled out by men? Who was I to undertake the angels' task? When men made excuse of wife and oxen and field, and refused the supper, did not the Teacher himself forbid all further coaxing, and point instead to other folk, to a fresh beginning? The highways and hedges of Hindustan were far from being exhausted. Did not the Teacher himself allow for large loss of seed by path and thorns and rocky soil? Not every group of Christian Chamars could be saved; did not the Teacher himself lose one out of his twelve, and was not another chosen to fill his place? What were Chamars worth any way?

"All this, Sahib, passed from my mind to my heart—all the while that the sun was sinking from high in the sky to its setting. For hours the mind had rushed healing to the heart—but somehow it did not heal, true as it was. The healing lay up in the branches among the mango blossoms —in the leather bag—and in *du'a. A mixture of the Injil and du'a is the heart's best medicine. When the sun shot its rays almost level through the mango grove I thought of the medicine I needed and wondered I had not taken it. In that last quarter hour of the evening I prepared the mixture. It was that passage in Mati of the evening hour and sick and possessed and healing. You know it, Sahib. I thought of myself as the sick one and reached out my hand for the Teacher's touch, for I felt his presence in the mango grove. Now that even had come, I would have the Teacher cast forth the demons of Doubt and Discouragement that had possessed me. So I lifted my face in the sunset and waited for the 'word.'

"Ere I was satisfied, ere I had heard the word for which I waited—perhaps he had already spoken it, Sahib, even while I was lifting my face and hands—the silence of the mango grove was disturbed by approaching footsteps. I lowered my hands and looked: at a man and woman and two girls, Chamars from the village. The man was elderly, with heavy gray moustache, the woman was veiled so I could not see her face, and the girls were well-grown, of marriageable age, as marriage goes among Chamars. I waited for them to pass on but they came to where I was sitting, sat before me, and laid their faces in the dust in greeting and in reverence. The man shuffled forward on his haunches, still sitting, to touch my dusty shoes with his fingers and carry my dust to his forehead. I spoke kindly, and asked him who he was and what he wanted:

* Preacher-in-charge. Circuit.

†Brotherhood, caste. ††New Testament.

*Prayer.

"He had difficulty in starting, needing to be prompted by his wife, till fear had vanished from his heart. Then his tongue caught fire and burned with his story. Out of his mouth they came—there in the evening hour with the sun just setting—all his demons, his infirmities, and his diseases. He laid them all at my feet, then lifted his eyes, and reached out his hands to me—yearning and begging for the healing. Galilee had suddenly become a mango-grove of Hindustan. The prophet of Nazareth now wore coat, pajama, and faded turban, and carried a leather bag with strap and buckle.

" 'Great King,' he began, his hand still holding my dust to his forehead, 'the scorching winds of misfortune blow continually upon me and my affairs. I am withered away in soul and body, and my family perish with me. Your hands laid the curse upon me, and I would have your hands remove it from my head.'

"He put his head in the dust of the ground, and clasped my feet with both his hands:

" 'Great King, undo the curse—unsay the words—release me and let me go! What have I to do with you and with your teaching?'

"I slipped off my shoes, and folded my feet beneath me, and spoke to him kindly:

" 'Meean, I have laid no curse upon your head or house. Like our great *Guru we go about doing good not evil.'

"The man groaned: 'In water you laid it, Great King.'

"In water?

" 'In water with your hand, with the shearing of the chuttiya-lock, and with strange words, beyond our comprehension—words of great power to do evil.'

"At last I understood—

" 'I gave you baptisma, did I, meean?'

" 'You, Great King, cursed me with water and with magic—with names too heavy for my head to carry. They cracked the skull, and through the openings, ill-luck has entered. We are but villagers, Great King—one name was heavy enough for our feeble wits, yet you named three upon me, as though we were pandits. Three upon me, and three on the woman, and three on each child. Great King, you did not fit the load according to the strength of each—a half a name for the woman, and less than that for each child. But you desired to ruin us—and we are ruined. Now with the counter *mantra, which who should know but you, lift their weight from us!'

"His face was drawn with his beseeching, he opened a little draw-string purse, and laid two silver rupees upon my knee:

" 'For the undoing,' he whispered and folded his hands in supplication. The wife came forward with the girls, and the three in turn touched the dust before me and joined in the folding of hands. Even so, Sahib, in Galilee, at the evening hour, they sat before the Teacher. How could he have aught but compassion on such pleading?

"In compassion I also spoke: 'Meean, I will unloose you, if you will have it so, but ere I unname the names of power and lay them back in this book from which they came, tell me of the misfortunes and the ill-luck which dwell with you as members of your household. Are they small or great, are they young or old—I would look on their faces. I have no doubt I can curse them with a cursing greater than their strength—for this book has many mantras against Sin and Evil and Sorrow. The great gurus of our faith have ever driven them out of men's hearts and homes, as you drive the goats from your courtyard to the fields when the morning comes.' With this I handled the book fondlingly before him.

" 'No doubt it is a book of power,' the old man answered. 'No doubt it herds blessings and curses, as this *laundiya herds goats and sheep, this way and that. But into my courtyard it had herded curses, in such numbers that we are pressed against the wall—and still they come driven from behind by the fearful magic of your book. There is not a blessing among them all—not one. Great King, we can neither cook nor sleep nor smoke our tobacco in quietness, as we used to do before your coming—so trampled are our lives by sorrows.'

" 'Name them before me,' I demanded.

"The old man hesitated no longer:

" 'It was after the baptisma—the day that followed—that I completed the arrangements for my daughters' weddings. I was in need of help, and daughters can be made a source of profit. When Ishwar refuses sons and gives but daughters, then the father's shrewdness must make up the loss. So I drove a bargain with the girls—that meant wealth to me. I betrothed them to Shankara Lal, for a share in his land and oxen and standing grain, and gave thanks that the gods of the Christians prospered their worshippers. I named the name of Yishu frequently over the bargain and took great comfort in both—in name and bargain.'

"I stopped him: 'Meean, the two daughters to one man?'

" 'Assuredly,' he answered, 'that was the bargain. They brought more that way than by division of them.'

" 'Yes' (it was the mother behind her veil), 'by this arrangement the younger brought more than the older, and she is not so beautiful. They are small and he wanted the pair.'

" 'And Shankara Lal is a Hindu?'

" 'Yes, Great King.

" 'And you, being Christians, betrothed them to a Hindu?'

" 'Assuredly,' he answered. 'Girls must be married, and no Christian offered as much.'

" 'Go on. I see evil spirits that need casting out.'

" 'I have not come to them as yet,' he answered. 'The evils followed the bargain. With the bargain all were pleased—even the girls, who rejoiced that they were to be kept together. All went well till the wedding—on which I spent overmuch, expecting the dal and bajra fields to reimburse me.'

---

*Teacher. Incantation.

*Girl.

" 'A Hindu wedding,' I asked.

" 'How should we know any other?' he answered. 'Do not Christians marry with drums and loud songs—'

" 'Of lewdness,' I interjected hastily.

" 'Yes, and processions and dressings and undressings and offerings—'

" 'To idols?' I asked.

" 'Yes, and to Yishu—we offered him a goat to prosper the union.'

" 'Unions, you mean'—

" 'Yes, and feasts at my house and feasts at Shankara Lal's, and eating and drinking—'

" 'Till you were drunk?' I added.

" 'Yes, and exchange of gifts and laughter and revelry—'

" 'And demons,' I added again.

" 'No, Great King. The demons entered when I asked Shankara Lal to carry out the terms of the bargain. He had the girls—I would have the land and oxen and grain. But he refused—'

"He laid his hands heavily on his head, as though to keep it from bursting with the pressure of sorrow.

" 'Why?' I asked.

" 'Because I had become Christian and the biradar the caste, would not stand by me any longer. What power had I alone—with this woman—to fight Shankara Lal and all his connections? We were as weak as these laundiyas in his hands. Like laundiyas we could only weep and fold our hands and beg him to be merciful—while he laughed at us. We were like turtle-doves in the sheesham trees, mourning to soften the heart of the hawk who has carried off their young and ruined their nest with his rough clawing.'

" 'So we turned to the idols and to Yishu and planned revenge. The threefold name had ruined me; now the threefold name must restore me. So I remained faithfully Christian, though my wife grumbled. I had reasons to think I could weave a garment of revenge that would sit uncomfortably on Shankara Lal's shoulders. Patiently I bided my time—praying much to Yishu for good fortune. He gave me to see clearly the pattern of the revenge, and it was not beyond the strength or skill of my fingers. It was in this way, Great King: When making the bargain for the betrothal in Shankara Lal's house my eager eyes had detected the signs of digging. As you know, Great King, there can only be one reason for digging a leepoed floor. With a single glance I took in its location with respect to the back outer wall, and then looked at it no more. Shankara Lal must not suspect that I suspected. I would keep the secret hidden and warm in my heart. Some day by brooding on it it might hatch into life. Who knows? Is it not good to keep one's nostrils cleaned out for the faintest smell of wealth? As we say in our village: A good nose and sharp eyes will wear bright turbans.'

" 'So I went home ere I should forget and sketched it roughly on the bottom of a broken water-gurrha that held our spices. Here was the outer wall—I calculated four footsteps and five fingers along it would bring me opposite the spot. So I drew four feet and five fingers on the potsherd and added a cross, which was the sign or mantra of Yishu, to bring me good success. It did and I was warm in praise of Yishu in our village. I had practiced it night after night when the girls slept—so I should not forget the four and five. In the darkness behind my own house I stepped it off and falling on my knees pretended to dig with my fingers. Over and over I did it. It was the weaving of the pattern of the garment of revenge. It was a gaudy pattern, Great King, and the whole was much to my liking.'

"I smiled sadly at him, but he went on: 'Shankara Lal put on the garment when he returned from the river-mela, where he had gone to bathe. He found that somebody had dug with a stolen phaura under his mud wall and into his hidden treasure—his seven bags of silver coins were gone. He broke his ankle, too, as he stepped unwittingly into the deep hole in the dusk of his return. For weeks he lay on his back wearing the garment the Christian had made for him, and was much disheartened.

" 'And you,' I asked.

" 'They searched our hut—tore down the thatch, dug up the floor, but forgot to look in a certain hole of the water-rats along the distant river. We were very happy, Great King, and were willing the girls should now live with Shankara Lal.'

" 'Then came the calamity'—the old man's features changed, a look of horror and terror came over them—'and the cause we know. In our joy and gratitude we had praised two of the three great names you had put upon our heads at the baptisma—the Father and the Son. The third we had forgotten; no man among us could remember what the third name was. Great King, why do you put three names upon us villagers ere we can count to three with any ease?'

"You seem to handle four and five without great difficulty.

"He did not notice my interruption: 'We remembered that in our village we have fathers and sons—but as for the third we have no such among us. And the third name was neglected, and his heart became black toward us and he would be revenged upon us. So he let Shankara Lal have his way and persuaded the other two, whom we had praised and to whom we had offered even of the silver in the bags, to withdraw their protection from us.'

" 'How do you know, Meean, it was so?' I asked. 'Did you hear the third speak thus to the others?'

" 'No, Great King. How can a mere villager hear the voices of God? But how else could it have fallen out as it did? So would it have happened among us—so must it have happened among them.' He pointed upward. Even thus, Sahib, do villagers interpret the Godhead by themselves. Then the old man went on:

" 'Shankara Lal did what we most feared to have him do. His twisted ankle, when it grew well, passed the twist on to his mind. He hired a Bhagat, a witch-doctor, to curse me and my family and so find the treasure. The man was brought from distant Brindaban, was black as night, and knew curses from the Hindu Shastras as many as the leaves on this mango-tree above us. He came to us at the evening hour, when the woman was grinding the wheat and the girls were making the flour into chappati-cakes, and I was sitting smoking. I had one of the silver coins in my turban, which gave him a power over me—for he has laid all the coins under a spell. He stepped into our courtyard without any words and began to dance, throwing his arms and his head, and muttering spells continuously. The millstones ceased, the bread burned in the fire, and the chilan-pipe fell from my hands—while we sat spellbound. like goats tied for the slaughter, whose eyes stare fixedly and whose hearts beat furiously. There was no other motion in us but that of eye and heart—for by his charms he had sucked our strength to himself. His motions increased as ours went out. He frothed at the mouth and tumbled in great somersaults over the courtyard, muttering all the while. Then from his beard he plucked long hairs (his beard was very thin, Great King, for he had been a Bhagat for some time) and laid one on each of us. That made us forget the name of every spirit or god that we had ever known or heard of—we could call on none to help us. We were at his mercy and he began to fill our hut and courtyard with his devils. There he stood with arms swinging in great circles, calling his spirits by name and bidding them enter. Then as the cheel, the hawk, suddenly stops and falls, so his arms would stop their circling and point at us. Again and again he drove his devils at us till we saw them and fell writhing on the ground. By their aid he drove my wife into a raging fever and in her fever the demons drove her before them and tortured her till she raved and raged and began to tell all she knew. When she spoke of silver and water-rats I partially recovered and tottering toward her sat on her mouth, but she hurled me off as though I were her newborn babe laid in her arms and not a man, her husband.'

"He burst out weeping, and the words came brokenly: 'And the Bhagat . . . muttered on . . . and the woman . . . screamed . . . as in travail . . . she was bringing our secret to the birth . . . and Shankara Lal . . . standing in the doorway . . . listened . . .'

"The old man was on his face before me, shaken with his sobbing. Remembering the touch of Yishu at the evening hour, I laid my hand upon him, the untouchable, and he grew quiet. Silence reigned for some moments in the mango-grove—ere he sat up and spoke again.

"'They found the silver, Great King. They took it. They took all our cooking vessels of brass, leaving us only the clay; they took all our clothes, but these few we wear; they took our hemp-cots and our mill-stones, our goat, our sickles, and ropes—all, all, all. They threaten me with court and jail if I open my mouth or plan any recovery. And now they demand the girls, the marriage being performed and the contract unbreakable, leaving us nothing but our old age and wretchedness. Hae! Hae! Free us, Great King, free us from the curse of Christian and of Bhagat. Loose us and let us go!'

"He folded his hands again and laid his forehead on my naked feet, while his tears washed off their dust in little trickling streams.

"It was now the twilight hour. The time had come to speak the word of power. It was in me and I would speak it. I rose to my feet and held the book open:

"Meean, listen, I will speak. I have the word of healing. You have but forgotten the third name, not spoken against it, therefore your sin is pardoned. So says the book. The demons that possess you have come not from the Bhagat, but from your own heart. His words got no further than the froth of his mouth. The demons that torment you—house and body—you have yourselves called forth out of yourselves, and they are terrible to look upon. As the silver with the water-rats, you have laid the holy names among foul thoughts and deeds. What place in the treasure-pits of his heart has the Christian for such evils as revenge and robbery and lying and selling of girls? They have turned to demons and eaten you up. Stand while I drive them forth!'

"The four stood trembling. Suddenly the old man spoke: 'See that you drive the woman not into madness again. Incantations sit heavy upon her.'

"She shall be healed, I assured him.

"'It is well,' he answered, 'but speak softly, Great King, according to our hearing.'

"Softly I spoke in the mango-grove, and besides the five of us only the stars and the mango-blossoms heard. What we heard was the Teacher repeating in Hindustan the word he spoke so well in Galilee. And, Sahib, strange to say, he spoke with no less power."

Solomon Titus stopped, as though not to go on.

"What was the word?" I asked.

"Need you ask, Sahib, you who know it well? Is it not threefold, even as the name—does it not have to do with Trust, and Love, and Truth? By writing it again and again on the broken potsherds of their village-lives and by constant repetition of it in their darkness, the old man and his family at length dug under the enmity of Shankara Lal and reached his inmost heart. Their hut somehow became the center of the village." He rose to go, then added with a smile:

"The last time I was in the village, Sahib, the old man brought me out to the highroad to see me on my way, and taking the book into his hands, and laying his forehead on its binding, he declared:

"'Great King, verily the words of this book are made for song and dance and feasting.'"

The Denominations: Tragedy or Comedy?

By John R. Scotford

A GROUP of ministers were eating breakfast together at the summer conference of Union Seminary. Some one mentioned that nineteen denominations were represented in the gathering.

"What a tragedy!" exclaimed one of the older men—evidently a stranger in that particular environment.

"No, what a joke!" replied a younger man who had had his training on Morningside Heights.

Here we may see two current attitudes towards denominationalism, and two different approaches to the problem of church unity.

Denominational divisions are a tragedy to many. Especially is this true of the older men, trained in the stricter denominationalism of the past, who have known many a bitter sectarian wrangle. The "elder statesmen" of the church are suspicious of one another. They mistake denominationalism distinctions for bulwarks of the kingdom. Greatly do they exaggerate the amount of real conviction behind these distinctions. The minister who goes from one denomination to another is regarded as an unstable sort of a fellow with no real convictions, and the man who has served in three denominations is a hopeless turn-coat. Now these men believe in church union. They know far more than the younger men about the evils of the present system. They sincerely desire a better day. But between their theological standpatism on the one hand, and their mutual suspicions on the other, the only clear path they can see for church union is for the other folks to come with them. But they can discern no signs that a stiff-necked and rebellious generation will ever do this, and so they regard the whole situation as a tragedy. They moan over the evils of our divisions and let it go at that. In fact, some of them seem to enjoy being tragic about our multiplied sects.

OFFICIAL ENDEAVORS

Our official denominational endeavors for church unity are born of this tragic frame of mind. The Disciples plea for union starts from the assumption that the old denominations are so hopelessly sundered that the only hope of the church is a new order from which even a denominational name is banned. The Episcopal church regards a divided Christendom as a scandal, especially when this division separates much of Protestantism from all connection with the "historic church." Their remedy is for ecclesiastics of every ilk and kind to meet together, put their mutual differences under the microscope, and then pray that some one will arise who can devise a form of words which will include the faith of all without stepping on the peculiar views of any. The inevitable result of such a summons is to put all the "defenders of the faith" upon the alert and to clothe the whole matter in a super-solemn atmosphere. The Presbyterians also are impressed with the awfulness of the situation and feel that "something must be done." Their proposition is an honest effort towards a united church by means of which they clear their consciences of all responsibilities for the present situation.

Nobody expects any of these tragic endeavors to succeed, any more than we anticipate a happy ending to a play which is advertised as a tragedy. The most sanguine hope is that these proposals may stir up a little helpful discussion. But the question further arises, "Can the denominational mind conceive of church union as anything other than a tragedy?" It can think of church union in only two ways—either the other denominations must come with us, which would be a tragedy for them, or else we must go with some other denomination, which would be suicide for us. In consequence, the whole situation is bathed in sadness.

But on the other hand, the younger men insist on regarding our sectarian divisions in a comic light. They have grown up in a happier day. They know as little about sectarian bitterness as they do about the antagonisms of the civil war. Their education has not been served to them with a creedal ladle out of a denominational pot. The church they find to be divided along denominational lines, but they cannot see that these lines really divide anybody or anything. In the innocence of their hearts they look at them as down-right funny. They regard the different brands over church doors, not as divisions of the body of Christ, but as a provocation to mirth. As for the creedal differences among the churches, it requires a theological excavator to dig them up, and the younger men have no time for such exercises. If some one would pronounce the formula about "dust to dust and ashes to ashes" over the creeds of Protestantism, he would come exceedingly close to telling the truth.

TRAGIC ATTITUDE

As for denominational loyalties, the younger men are willing to have a good time at a denominational tea party, but they refuse to wear the label of their church as a halter about their necks. Like the wise Republican who votes the Democratic ticket in the south, they follow the path of expediency in their denominational affiliations. Why should an antique denominational line restrain a Disciple from rendering service for which he is fitted in the Congregational fold, or keep an eloquent Baptist out of a conspicuous Presbyterian pulpit? The only conviction behind such shifts of allegiance is that denominationalism is nothing more than a gigantic farce which some folks persist in taking seriously. As for the denominational programs, the younger ministers regard them as a sort of ecclesiastical cafeteria—they pick out what they want and leave the rest. They get as much help and as little hindrance out of the denomination as possible. The secretary who can serve their purposes is welcome to their pulpit, but the secretary who would butt in is promptly butted out. Denominationalism is for them ever a means and never an end.

The tragic attitude towards denominationalism seems to these men to be hectic and unreal. The Disciples plea sounds in their ears as the voice of a by-gone age. The Episcopal conference on faith and order appears to be a case of ecclesiastical much ado about nothing, if not a post mortem over dead theological systems. The Presbyterian plan looks like the juggling of men who love to make and remake ecclesiastical machinery. The whole agitation seems far off and unrelated to the tasks which the younger men of the church have upon their hearts. They are perfectly willing to admit that in many rural sections sectarianism is an exceedingly ghastly joke, but in their own work they do not feel that their denominational allegiance hampers their own thought or action, or that denominational lines interfere with the growth and prosperity of their church. They are simply not interested in the entire business.

Are these younger men abandoning a problem, or are they solving it? Is tinkering at the problem of church unity the best way to get a united church? Which is the easiest way to harmonize a variegated theological heritage —adjust our creeds, or forget them? Which is the easiest way to get past our denominational fences—pull them up or jump over them? The doctors tell us that nature will cure most diseases if given time enough. Will not time cure the evils of sectarianism faster than any nostrum which we are able to administer? Is not the undertaker ever the staunchest ally of progress? Instead of sobbing over our divisions, had we not better laugh at them and then give our main strength to furthering the work of the kingdom, knowing that when the church of Christ gives itself to the work of Christ then the problems of denominationalism will take care of themselves?

The Conference at Copenhagen

By Lynn Harold Hough

THERE were four of us in the compartment of the train which pulled out of Victoria station in London. It was a glorious day. We were all journeying to the conference of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches at Copenhagen. Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, that genial and wholesome Congregational leader, was the life of the little party. And right here I may inject the remark that as the presiding officer of the great conference he did a difficult piece of work with happy art and with easy control of the situation. Mr. Arthur Porritt of London, one of the editors of that influential weekly, The Christian World, was a second member of the party. Mr. Porritt has a range of knowledge which is fairly encyclopaedic. He is a companion of intuitive understanding of the moods of his friends. And he talks as he writes with grace and charm as well as insight. He had charge of the publicity of the conference and was chairman of the press committee. No one did a better piece of work than he. And it was all done with a quiet efficiency good to look upon. Rev. Thomas Nightingale, the executive secretary of the Free Church Council, was the third member of the party. He is a man of surprising resource, and he does as much as any man to give the free churches of England solidarity and impact as they confront the problems of these difficult days.

The hours sped rapidly enough as the four of us discussed all sorts of problems and people with a frank intimacy which gave zest to the talk. The crossing from Folkstone to Flushing was a delightful experience. In a neat little boat upon a perfectly well behaved channel with the sun shining and the waves merry in a quiet way we made the trip. Soon we were in Holland with the characteristic windmills and the irrigation ditches and the signs of Dutch thrift. The next morning we woke in Hamburg. We spent the day in this really beautiful German city. We drove about the streets, we watched the people and we tried to sense the atmosphere of this German town. We were treated politely everywhere. There were many sad faces. There were many hard faces. There was every sign of constant industry on the part of the people. No one of the party spoke with a more gracious kindliness of the Germans than Mr. Porritt. And all the while he was carrying in his pocket the picture of the fine son whom the war took away from him. The financial situation in Germany is tragic enough. Dr. Boynton entertained the four of us at luncheon. We chaffed him a good deal over his four thousand mark luncheon. Thursday morning we reached the fine clean city of Copenhagen. There are signs of thrift and of prosperity everywhere. One of the brilliant young journalists of the city said to me: "I am not a socialist, but I must admit the good things which this group has done for Copenhagen." Perhaps the one superficial feature which the stranger notices most is the number of bicycles. They swarm everywhere like the locusts of Egypt. They descend upon you from every direction as you go about the streets. There were some odd experiences. One evening when Mr. Nightingale entertained me at dinner at a public restaurant he found that he had to pay an extra charge for both of us because we had ordered no wine.

A COSMOPOLITAN GATHERING

The conference itself brought together two hundred delegates, representing churches of twenty-five different countries. It was a cosmopolitan and able and representative gathering. The opening sermon preached in the cathedral by Dr. Charles E. Jefferson was a poignant appeal for the enthronement of the spirit of Christ. One of the South African representatives, a keen business man, described to me its effect upon him. "First I said, 'How simple!' Then I said 'How able!'" When the day of formal opening came one witnessed a really impressive sight. The gathering which brought Deissmann of Germany and Monod of France together would be notable if for that reason alone. There were brilliant and singularly frank debates. There was sometimes the frankest disagreement as to facts as when the situation of religious and racial minorities was discussed. There was the class of fundamentally different intuitions as when it seemed that the German and French delegates could never come together on the matter of disarmament. There was a rare bit of piercing irony as when Professor Deissmann said that in the passion play there should not only be heard the voices of the redeemed but also the voices of the damned. But even when the situation was most tense there was found a way to a position which the delegates could affirm together. This happened in relation to the minorities in the resolution recommending a special commission to be appointed by the league of nations. And it happened rather dramatically in relation to the matter of disarmament. Just when an impasse seemed to have been reached at the request of the British delegation Dr. Jowett, a very notable figure at the conference, intervened. Dr. Jowett is not only a preacher of rare and delicate spiritual power, he possesses a wonderful technique in relation to the subtle artistry of human relationships. And when his wise and noble words had been spoken there was a new atmosphere. Eventually a resolution upon which Deissmann and Monod had agreed was brought in and passed unanimously. The heart of the conference beat with almost tragic passion against war. And it was with powerful conviction that it expressed itself. Less dramatic but perhaps even more significant was the resolution that adequate educational activities should be pursued for the creation of the international mind upon which world friendship must rest. The phrase "mental disarmament" was one of the most vital heard at the conference. It was good to look upon the far-gathered company and when together they repeated the Lord's prayer the effect was one not to be forgotten.

AMERICA'S ATTITUDE

It was a delight to observe the steady and well poised leadership of Dr. Atkinson. Every thread moved through his hands. He was wise and patient and never nervous or excited even in the most difficult moments. Indeed his leadership was so unobtrusive that a good many delegates may not have realized how potent it was. He was scrupulously fair when subtle and even irritating questions arose. And his own speech regarding the situation in the neighborhood of Constantinople deeply stirred the conference. The dinner at which a group of Americans alone discussed the vast problems which the conference was considering was one of unusual significance. It was the obvious desire of the American group to use the soft pedal. It was not felt that America stood in a position of easy or assured moral leadership. Yet all the American group felt a certain faith that in the great decisions America can be trusted when once it knows the elements of the problem. The creation of the international mind in the great Mississippi Valley is perhaps the most important task which now confronts men of good will in the republic.

Perhaps the very best thing about the conference was just the series of human contacts between leading representatives of the religious life of twenty-five nations. An atmosphere was created whose effect will be felt all over the world. Of course there were elements of weakness to be watched and dealt with skillfully. There was a temptation to put dignified generalization to which nobody could object in the place of a closer dealing with the problems. At least one set of resolutions as presented reminded one of Holmes' sarcastic lines "To a Katydid":

> Thou mindest me of gentle folk,
> Old gentle folk are they.
> Thou sayest an undisputed thing,
> In such a solemn way.

And now and then one found that some particular leader had become so enamored of the thought of solidarity on the part of the churches of the world that he was ready to ignore elements which are necessary to the freedom and the richness of the life of religion in every land. The World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches would not be serving the best interests of the religious life of the nations if it failed to appreciate the moral and spiritual vigor which the free church tradition brings to every country. But on the whole the conference showed remarkable willingness to press beyond pious generalization to the acute phases of the problems with which it dealt. And sanity as well as an enthusiasm for world friendship was very clearly in evidence. The man who has become so urbanely cosmopolitan that he has forgotten the high loyalty he must give to the noblest sanctions represented by his own national and religious group is not in any sense the man of power in the alliance.

Looking back one can only feel the profoundest thankfulness for the great notes sounded and for the nobly Christian spirit manifested in this conference. All over the world Christian men will find it easier to think in the terms of a world wide Christianity because two hundred men from twenty-five nations foregathered in Copenhagen in the summer of the year of Our Lord nineteen twenty-two.

The Trend of the Races

A NEW text on the trend of the races for study classes under the missionary education movement has been written by Dr. George E. Haynes, who is a Negro with his Ph. D. from Columbia. He was professor of sociology at Fiske until the government called him to Washington to help mobilize the productive forces of his race for the war. The Interchurch World movement then made him director for the Negro survey, and now the Federal Council of Churches has called him to lead his people in the work of setting up interracial committees, in cooperation with Dr. Will Alexander. His constructive viewpoint, his freedom from bitterness, his comprehension of the basic factors in the race situation, and his complete devotion to Christian principles mark him as not only a leader to be trusted by his own people and the whites, but as a sort of titular successor to Booker T. Washington in the apostolate of good-will and constructive advance of his people.

He points out in the text that the increase of ability and achievements by the Negro people in America brings with it a growing racial consciousness, which means that increasingly the black folk will refuse to accept a status of inferiority. Much of the material in the book consists of citations of real accomplishments by members of the race. This should encourage Negroes of vision and aspiration, and it should give like encouragement to whites who believe that there are no permanently inferior peoples according to God's plan. The correlate of this undoubted accomplishment is not a matter of boasting but of hope and also of serious reflection. What is to happen as the result of growing race consciousness and the inevitable refusal to accept a status of inferiority?

The Background of Lynch Law

Race riots are usually brought about through the overt and criminal act of some Negro moron and the savage reaction of the baser elements among the whites. The crimes of white morons do not result in riots, however, not even when they are against the virtue of Negro women and in territories overwhelmingly Negro. This is because of the comparative standards of superiority and inferiority, and the fear among the whites that the blacks may become unmanageable. Once lynch law is adopted as a method of control it defies not only law and order but civilization itself. White men commit the most unspeakable barbarities on the person of their victim and thereby sink to a level as low as any that could be ascribed to him. Not only is lynch law defiant and anarchical but it is brutalizing to both those who use it and all who tolerate it. The white race is as great a sufferer as is the black when it is invoked; the victim loses his life—the lynchers lose their souls; respectable Negroes suffer a humiliation, and white civilization a degeneration.

But the baser elements among the whites could not defy law and order and lynch black men if there were not in the background of our racial consciousness a prejudice, a shortsighted conscience, and a moral cowardice which causes men to revert to primitive fear and put their trust in the weapons of savagery. Right here is where a certain stratum of whites in America need conversion, and it is all too often an otherwise fairly respectable stratum. They do not lynch but neither do they protest; often they sorrowfully apologize but rarely do they militantly oppose. The problem is not wholly one of the black man. It is present because he is here, but it is quite as much a problem of the white man. Will he accept the colored race in any other than the permanent status of inferiority? Will he accept Negro civilization? It is not a question of the lower, less cultured, less developed members of the colored race but of those who are striving and attaining. Will white Americans live in peace with their black neighbors as the English do in the West Indies? It would indeed be a crime against civilized society, both white and black, to allow the ignorant, untutored and inexperienced of either race to gain social control.

Race War or Good Will?

Few white men would now defend slavery; the white conscience has been emancipated as well as the colored race. The time is also near when few white men will defend lynch law; that too will be an emancipation of conscience. Will the time ever come when whites will admit men to all the free opportunities of our advanced society without prejudice and reference to color? We believe it will come but it will not come through race war nor through any dilution of social progress by mere majorities. When it does come, it will not mean an intermingling of races across the time-driven cleavages of color but mutual respect by men of every race for all who are of worth to our common civilization. That will mean an emancipation from race prejudice. We must agree with H. G. Wells when he denounces race prejudice as the most malign and sinister evil in the world today. It is not prejudice to recognize color and cultural differences, but it is prejudice to refuse to admit equality of opportunity to men of any race upon the basis of solid worth and achievement. It is simply a question as to whether men of good-will are to rule our social habits and attitudes, or men of ill-will and an undying race war. The Negro is here and he is here to stay. The fact that the white brought him here, as well as his older civilization, lays upon the former responsibility of finding a way to apply Christianity and democracy to the problem without forfeiting social progress to either an academic theory or an Adamic prejudice.

Those who lack faith in the principles of Christian teaching in their social application will rely upon force and demand a permanent subordination without reference to quality; those who do have faith in them will put their trust in education and character and expect much hardship and suffering on both sides as the new and better way is wrought out. On the one hand force will beget force, and the growing racial consciousness of the blacks will beget bitterness, a vengeful and strident spirit, and a more or less constant state of guerilla warfare. On the other hand the sacrifices of war will be transmuted by both races into the sacrifices of redemption. Social progress is won, not through the blood of the conquerors but through the blood of the martyrs; not by compelling service but by freely giving it.

The Black Man's Burden

A civilization bestowed is not one that will be retained. Progress is not a gift; it is an attainment. The white man cannot paternally place the black race on a level with himself; he cannot bestow the graces of centuries of progress upon any people whom the fates have allowed only some decades of opportunity, but he can both cease to hinder and do much to help. The black man must take up his burden, and right valiantly are a host of his race leaders doing it. Progress does not come through bitterness or petty acts of vengeance, nor through a boorish vaunting of privileges guaranteed by law. Against all of these does the real Negro leader contend in his spiritual warfare for his people, but honest worth and a patient, long-suffering, Christ-like spirit are undefeatable. Let black men imitate all the good they see in white society, but ape no one; let them cease to care for that social intermingling which is so strictly forbidden and let them create and cherish their own refinements and culture; let them further by sheer merit build up their own social progress, asking only an equality of opportunity, and if there is any maleficent power under the sun that can defeat them then God does not reign. It is not the work of a day or a decade but of generations, however, and nothing will lose them the victory so certainly as impatience.

It is not the culture and attainments of the Negro the white man fears, but the unregenerate elements of a people only a few generations out of barbarism. In addition he feels a lack of faith in the Negro's ability to make progress and a fear that opportunities to do so will be abortive. The Negro can overcome this fear and disprove this sceptical notion by solid attainment. But this cannot be done in a day. It is the duty of all men of faith to lend a hand.

British Table Talk

London, August 20, 1922.

ONCE more we have been faced and troubled by the apparent impossibility of agreement between this country and France, and although the entente is still unbroken, it must be severely strained. Meanwhile the mark is plunging downward to the abyss, and the hope of a Europe restored to peaceful cooperation in industry and other worthy arts seems remote. There were two letters in The Times of Thursday, both by writers bearing the name of Bell. One of my friends, Mr. Henry Bell, one of our leading financiers, set forth a definite plan for dealing with the reparations. They were to be fixed at 2,500,000,000 pounds, of which 400,000,000 are already paid. The rest should be apportioned to the various powers and bonds issued for the amount bearing a just rate of interest; a two years' moratorium should be granted to Germany with the definite understanding that the collection of the debt, when it became due, should be strictly enforced. The other Mr. Bell, the well-known American journalist, pleaded in a very frank letter with the statesmen of Europe to come out of the shadowy land of intrigue and let their instincts, not their intellect, be their guide. To which many of us said fervently, Amen!

Dr. R. J. Campbell's Illness

Dr. R. J. Campbell has been laid aside by a severe heart-attack. It is earnestly hoped that a complete rest may restore him. Since his Oxford days, Dr. Campbell has never been a strong man, and he has spent himself without stint upon his preaching ministry. The strain has told upon him, but not, we pray, to the exhaustion of his physical powers. He is a preacher much in demand in the Anglican church, but he shows no disposition to cut himself loose from fellowship with his old friends, and he is never unwilling to preach in Free church pulpits. He was a contemporary and friend of mine in Oxford, and afterwards we were neighbors in Brighton. I have very many reasons to remember his kindness, and very sincerely we pray that his gifted life may be spared.

A Life of Khama

There are signs that the name of Khama, the chief of the Bamangwato people, will be often in the public press in the immediate future. His protectorate is regarded with some envy by powerful forces in Africa. Quite recently entirely erroneous charges were cabled concerning alleged atrocities committed by the chief. These charges were entirely disproved by an official inquiry. But it is to be found that the guilt of the chief in the eyes of his enemies lies in the fact that he has always held to his direct covenant with the British crown and would not let his land be incorporated either in the South African dominion, or in the Rhodesian company, and still more—he has committed the shocking crime of keeping drink out of his territory! The renewed interest in him, for his years now are many, is partly due to speculation upon the future, when his strong hand is withdrawn. All these facts make the little book, "Khama, the Great African Chief," of real value. It is published by the London Missionary society (48 Broadway, Westminster), at the very low price of a shilling. Most vividly written by the Rev. John Charles Harris of Kingston, it gives with authority the romantic story of this great chief and great Christian. So up to date is it that it gives the official facts concerning the inquiry made by Sir Herbert Sloley. It would not be surprising to discover in this book a very timely contribution, not only to missionary literature, but to the material by which public opinion is shaped in the presence of new problems.

Memoirs by the Great

The publishing sensation of the week has been the announcement of a book by Mr. Lloyd George, for which he will receive not far short of 100,000 pounds. Mr. Asquith and Mr. Winston Churchill are also writing memoirs of the war, as they saw it. After all the statesmen have told their tales, the material will be available for historians who will bring the calm, impartial mind, and the final judgment of the nations must wait. The book by the premier has been bought, as far as British rights are concerned, by Cassells, at the head of which is Sir William E. Berry, a strong friend and supporter of Mr. Lloyd George. The same firm I think will publish the book of Mr. Asquith. Sir William Berry and his brother have a great place in the newspaper and publishing world. They are bold in their enterprises, and since they are still young, they ought to go far in the years ahead.

The Weather Hereabouts

A writer in an evening paper has been inspired by our so-called summer to these lines:

"'If Winter Comes' they say is a success
  As played to crowded audiences at Brighton.
It almost tempts me to essay a guess
  About a question that I might be right on.
Yes, I can solve the problem right away;
  I ask no aid from author or from mummer.
If Winter Comes then I make bold to say
  It certainly can be no worse than summer."

The Silly Season

It is an ancient custom for newspapers to start in August some correspondence upon a popular topic. We remember for example the "Do We Believe" controversy about sixteen years ago. In some quarters feelers have been put out to discover a likely topic, though this year there can be no lack as yet of copy for the columns of a paper, August though it be. "Are the clergy effeminate?" is one question suggested. It appeared as though this were to be settled by a ten-mile walk between a younger clergyman, who said yes to the question, and an older one, who said no. But seeing that the race is off, we shall be left in doubt still. The question does look a little vague. There are very many thousands of clergymen and ministers, of all sorts and sizes; some muscular, others spare and ascetic, others jovial and rejoicing in all the good things of earth. How can any general description fit a whole battalion of men? The curious fact is that against the clergy and ministers as a class it is easy to find charges made, but the individual members are very rarely unpopular or despised. The rule seems to be that most men poke fun of the clergy or condemn them, but they make the reservation that they are not referring to thir own parson, who is a "jolly good sort." Somehow one wishes that parsons would not play to the gallery by challenging each other to races, but when they make the challenge, they ought to carry it out. Such melodrama does not solve any problem, and it takes away from the respect which a noble calling has a right to demand. I hope we shall not make a "silly season" sillier than it need be.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Legion and the Japanese in Texas

Editor The Christian Century:

SIR: I read with a great deal of interest the article by Lucia Ames Mead on "America and Japan," in The Christian Century for July 13. The article as a whole expresses a knowledge and a spirit which ought to pervade all America. I was greatly surprised, however, to note one statement in the article in which the writer quotes from an unnamed source a charge which I cannot allow to pass unchallenged. I quote from Mrs. Mead's article:

"There does not seem to have been any notice taken by the federal government of the lawless action of representatives of the American Legion who (and here she quotes her unnamed authority) 'met and expelled two or three Japanese families on their arrival in Texas to occupy farms that had been duly purchased.'"

As a legionnaire, I naturally resented the charge that representatives (note the word) of the Legion were guilty of such lawless action. If they were, I for one, and I am not alone in this desire, want to see the offenders disciplined and redress made. If they were not, I wish to see the statement corrected as publicly as it was made. Accordingly I wrote the national adjutant for information about the episode referred to by Mrs. Mead. He in turn wrote Wayne Davis, commander of the department of Texas, from whom he received the reply which I quote herewith:

"It is true that individual members of the American Legion took up before the last legislature the question of preventing Japanese ownership of land in Texas. This was not done by the American Legion as an organization, but was done through an organization gotten together for that specific purpose, composed of citizens, some of whom belong to the legion, but the majority of whom do not. There was no lawless action taken by the legion, so far as I have been able to ascertain."

It seems hardly likely that the commander of the department of Texas would be unable to learn of such action, if the action had been official, as the word "representatives" implies. It looks to me as if Mrs. Mead has been a bit careless in accepting untrustworthy reports. At least the legion is entitled to further information which she seems to possess, though the legion does not. Will you please ask her to explain or correct her charge in your pages?

Industrial Relations

Editor The Christian Century:

SIR: I am strongly moved to make some remarks about the leading editorial in your issue of August 3rd which has the title "Spiritual Oppression of American Labor," which I hope you will find space for and trust you will pardon me if I speak plainly.

The tone of your paper with respect to industrial relations is profoundly depressing to every business man who is constructively interested in these matters. Your assumption that social poverty and misery are primarily due to organized capital, that is, that American labor is being pauperized on account of excessive dividends to capital, is essentially false and untrue. That the business man, or employer, has a responsibility with respect to those less fortunately situated is of course true but this applies equally to educators, ministers and other classes as well. Statistics which are easily available demonstrate beyond question that the average business and that business as a whole does not make excessive profits; in fact, the actual margin of profits is narrow and tends to become narrower. Business has to provide for many things which are seldom taken into consideration. There is the enormously increased burden of taxation. In recent years business has been loaded with other burdens, some of which are justified and some of which are not, but which in any case must be met. Then there are contingencies for which provision must be made, such as, lean years, irreparable losses, etc. Nor can any business be permanently successful which does not provide for some degree of expression. It is an easy but a very superficial thing to put upon business all the evils of society, and it is as I have said, profoundly depressing to constructive business men to meet with continual carping criticism and misunderstanding in such papers as yours.

The main causes of present industrial evils are in my opinion two. One is the argument of the single taxers, that the landlords appropriate a large part of the increasing surplus of society in rent increases. And in the second place, the so-called lower classes tend to breed to the starvation point. We will never get very far with social amelioration until birth control and immigration are intelligently handled.

The greatest menace to civilized society (to which papers such as yours seem to be blind) is the great trade unions. These vast bureaucratic machines exercise an autocratic and despotic power which defies the government itself. They levy great sums upon the working classes to support an army of business agents and officials whose primary object is to perpetuate their own power and prestige. When these associations choose to do so, they exercise a power of intimidation, terrorism and coercion to which the public has been accustomed to submit with inconceivable supineness and which the government itself has failed to disregard and set aside the rights of the general public, the rights of the employer and the rights of those who wish to work, and washes its hands of all responsibility for crimes and damages committed. Modern trade unionism is wholly undemocratic and class centered. The use of the Australian method of balloting is not permitted in the labor unions. Local bodies of workmen and employers have been deprived of the right of collective bargaining, which has been centered in the national unions. This is wholly contrary to the proper principle of collective bargaining, as has been so well stated by Prof. John R. Commons in his book, "Industrial Goodwill."

Mr. Gompers and other of the older labor leaders are doubtless sincere in disclaiming socialism and syndicalism but every strike is a step in that direction, habituating workmen as well as the general public to disorder, lawlessness and contempt for law. It is the instinct of politicians to compromise with this lawless element but the time is at hand when compromise must cease or this republic will pass away.

Moline, Ill. H. Ainsworth.

Respect for Law and Criticism of Law

Editor The Christian Century:

SIR: May I call your attention to what appears to me an unfortunate lapse into loose generalities that is out of keeping with your usual editorial standard? In your issue of July 27, under the caption "Disobedience to Law," appear these statements: "The labor leader does not hesitate at murder to accomplish his ends. The big corporation is quite willing to provoke murder by agents provocateurs, if that will help win a struggle." There is no doubt that there are individuals on both sides who are guilty of murder. But are these cases sufficiently widespread and representative to warrant such sweeping generalities?

One of the cardinal points the responsible labor leaders of the country have been urging upon the rank and file is that violence hurts the cause of labor and is always to be avoided. The two great strikes of the present—coal and railroad—indicate how far the leaders have been successful in this direction. While there have been a few disturbances, the remarkable thing is that these have been so few, considering that nearly a million men are out of work, most of them with families to support, and many of them evicted from their homes. The country as a whole is becoming impressed with the fact that there are some high grade, responsible, capable executives among the leaders of organized labor. Such a generality applied to corporations also does injustice to thousands of high grade men responsible for steering the affairs of business.

May I add that I should like to have seen you connect your plea for respect for law with a like plea for an attitude of open-minded, critical scrutiny of laws and institutions. Laws must be obeyed as long as they remain in force. But nothing is more patent than that laws and institutions, as vehicles of ideas, fail to keep pace with the growth of the ideals themselves, and with the needs of a growing society. History is one long process of replacing outgrown ideals, and their worn-out vehicles, with new ideals, incorporated into new institutions and new laws.

No one who follows your publication could well doubt that you stand for intelligent and open-minded criticism, but it seems to me that you lost a splendid opportunity to hook up the need for it with the idea of loyal observance. The two should go together. It is a connection that should be made a part of the very bone and fibre of our national thinking. We need constant reiteration. Demosthenes, raising his voice against Carthage, proved the effectiveness of untiring reiteration. So we need constantly to drive home the idea that our laws, our institutions, and our social concepts must forever be subjected to scrutiny and criticism. An aggressive, untiring presentation of that idea by every forward looking person and organization, and at every opportunity, will go far toward cutting the ground from under the occupation of heresy hunting that is always in such enthusiastic vogue with reactionaries, and that in times of stress goes to such absurd extremes as the Lusk Report in New York and the indictment of William Allen White in Kansas on a charge of conspiracy because he advertised the fact that he was fifty per cent in sympathy with the workmen in a given railroad strike.

Ambler, Pa. R. F. SPARKS.

Perhaps He Will Try Again

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The Chicago Daily News ranks very high as a clean newspaper and in favor of the best things. Recently one of its regular writers, Mr. Ben Hecht, was asked for a list of the fifty best books to form a select library. The amazing thing is the list given. A large per cent are the chief rotten books of the past—from the Petronius of Nero's day to some of the books of our own time, that glorify sensuality. It seems almost a surprise that the list should contain such respectable books as Mark Twain's "Joan of Arc" and "Huckleberry Finn." Mr Hecht says this list was made "sitting in front of a typewriter on a hot August day." It may be that if he could sit before that typewriter some cool autumn day he might make a list that would be more decent.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Our Homes*

WE have spent several months in the Old Testament. We have gained something of a background for our approaching study of the New. We have traced certain outstanding events in the history of God's dealings with one nation, or rather the progressive apprehension of the true God, by a people possessing a genius for religion. Strong moral notes were struck by the prophets, wisdom, poetry and ritual came from other sources. Human nature, in the making, is fascinating. One of the great ideas that emerged from all that is valuable in the Old Testament is that picture which you get of the Jewish home, where the law is taught by precept upon precept, where sitting or walking the parents teach the moral code. The strength of the Jews has always been found in the home life. Against this picture, more or less ideal I grant you, let us see our own homes in this booming year of grace.

I need not shout that I am an optimist; certainly I am not a pessimist, rather I try to "see life steadily and see it whole," as Matthew Arnold told us to do. The pessimist, however, would find his easiest field in the modern home. With divorce on the increase, with parental authority despised, with outside amusements organized in the most alluring way, with father absorbed in making money enough to pay the bills, with mother perplexed with her new freedom, ("The Glass of Fashion" would have us believe that many English women have forsaken their home duties), with "flapper" daughters, bobbed and knickered, with harum-scarum sons, driving high-powered cars, the home is rapidly becoming an extinct institution. Home may be a bedroom, from one a. m. until nine. Home may be a dining room where meals are served to one lone member of the family after another, from father first to sister last, but home is hardly "home, sweet home" any more. There is the problem of quietness. In my boyhood home there were long, quiet hours. There was time to think, to brood, to adjust one's self. What sunsets, what moons swinging through the massive clouds, what rain-storms, what meadows, orchards, flowers and birds, what noble trees, what long, silent night hours! Dinner was not hurried. We could tell all the news we knew, we could tell our stories and amusing incidents. There was time to read books and to discuss them. There was no movie, no street-car, no motor-horns, no roaring mills, one could hear the rain patter on the roof, and the sound of the leaves on the trees. Morning was heralded by a choir of birds in the maples. There was time to read the Bible and to learn its powerful lessons. There is no quietness now; it is all clang, grind, screech, roar, bump, pound, and clatter. It is player-piano, phonograph, whistle, bell, everlasting conversation about nothing. What chance for family life in all of this, what place for teaching morals!

There is the problem of Companionship. I used to go for all day rides in the carriage with my father; that was an education. I got to know him, I was proud of him, I loved him with all my boyish heart. There were hours when my mother and I worked together in the garden, or sat talking in the sitting-room. (That was what the room was for—to sit in—there is no such place in the modern home!) When I had planned a trip to Europe this summer, a college president said to me: "You cannot do that, you must spend all of your vacations getting acquainted with your own boys, they don't know you." He was right and so I expect to write the next lot of these lessons from the wilds of Canada, where I will be with the sons God has given me to look after. My parents were my good companions—I wonder if we are!

There is the problem of Moral Instruction. Hold that picture of the ancient Jew teaching his children the moral law. (Read Deuteronomy 2:18ff.) I talked with a reporter within the hour. He told me of immoral conditions among the youngsters. We live in a day of sensuality. Where shall we learn control if not from the Christian homes? Are we going to let a set of men exploit us out of our morals? Can it be nothing but sex, sex, sex? Is there no way to create a Christian morality, with controls and guidances? The godless, money-standardized, pleasure-mad home is back of it all. The church can do little without the backing of the homes. "Fool" parents are to blame for the whole business. "Now it is either Christ or chaos."

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Week-Day Schools of Religion Reopen this Fall

Communities which have had experience with the week-day religious school are staying with it for the most part, and there is a good prospect of enlargement this autumn. One of the largest groups of schools under one head is to be found in the Calumet district southeast of Chicago. The Calumet district council of religious education has 72 paid teachers, and gives instruction to 2,400 children. The program in South Evanston last year was very successful, embracing the instruction of 324 children at an expense of $3,850. It has been shown that the cost of religious instruction per child is less than the cost of instruction in manual training, music, or drawing, in most schools. Encouraged by an avowedly friendly attitude now on the part of the Sunday school forces, the idea will spread all over the nation wherever people believe that religion is as important as arithmetic.

Western Office of Council Has Advisory Committee

During the past year the Federal Council of Churches opened a western office in Chicago which was put in charge of Dr. H. L. Willett, of the University of Chicago. An advisory committee has been created, composed of leading members of the various communions about Chicago. Dean Shailer Mathews, Rev. William Chalmers Covert, Hon. Thomas E. D. Bradley, Mr. Clifford W. Barnes, Dr. Howard Agnew Johnston, Prof. Graham Taylor, Bishop Thomas Nicholson, Mr. Oliver R. Williamson, Rev. Perry J. Rice, Rev. J. M. Stifler, Rev. R. D. Scott, Dr. Ozora S. Davis, Mr. Henry H. Hilton, Mr. George A. Chritton and Dr Herbert L Willett. Dean Shailer Mathews is the chairman and Dr. Herbert L. Willett is the secretarial representative.

Tricentennial of the Landing of the Walloons

The Pilgrims settled in Massachusetts in 1620, but they did not precede the Walloons to America very many years, for the latter settled near Albany about 1624, a date in much controversy until recent investigations. The Federal Council is arranging for the celebration of the tercentennial of the coming of the Walloons two years hence. The Walloons were originally French, but were driven out of France into the Netherlands from which country they came to America. They claim to have influenced the thinking of the Pilgrims in the direction of the colonization of the new world, and that it was only an accident that the Pilgrims arrived first.

Would Establish Cooperation Between Legion and Church

The absence of ex-service men from the churches is often remarked by practical pastors. Rev. S. I. Martin, chaplain of the Indiana department of the legion, seeks to bring the legion and the church into vital cooperation and to induce every man to be loyal to his own religion. He has recently sent out a letter to eleven thousand legion posts on this matter, and has had most favorable responses.

Bishop Fallows Leaves the Church Militant

Chicago has lost one of its most outstanding churchmen in the death of the Rt. Rev. Samuel Fallows on Sept. 5. Born in 1835, he has continued to the past year as one of Chicago's most active ministers. No public committee was complete without him. His mind has always been open to new ideas, and he is remembered for interesting experiments with a temperance saloon, for his interest in the Christian healing movement, and for his constant social sympathies. He has been college president, university regent, bishop, platform star and

Disciples Register Progress at Winona

THE back-wash of theological conservatism which has muddled the waters for more than one denomination in America following the war seems to be receding, a fact well illustrated in the addresses and forward-looking actions taken in the Disciples convention at Winona Lake, Aug. 29-Sept. 3. The convention takes its major meaning not out of compromise resolutions on mission policy put forward in weariness to silence clamor, but out of the great sermons and addresses of the gathering. Not in two decades have the utterances of the Disciples gathering sounded a more catholic note.

The presidential address will long be remembered for its irenic statement of a progressive program for the Disciples of Christ. Rev. Stephen E. Fisher, of Champaign, Ill., president of the convention, said: "Let us face the fact frankly that the real difficulty is vastly greater than any so-called 'China situation.' In all candor let us confess the real difficulty is one which must be met and worked out at home. In the recrudescence of denominationalism and sectarianism of these post-war days, we of the home base may well take heed lest we forget the things for which we have stood for one hundred years, the liberty with which Christ made us free, the all-sufficiency of his word, the utter need of the practice among ourselves and toward our Christian brethren of other communions of the spirit of our Lord. We are in grave danger of professing one doctrine, and practicing another. Our troubles at home and in China will not end until the church is born again, is lifted out of the traditions of men into the fearless freedom of sons of God. Lest we become censorious and hypocritical each one of us has need to pray, 'Search me O God and know my heart and see if there be any wicked way in me.'"

The convention this year made more of spiritual exercises. A sermon was preached every day on some great theme. Rev. Howard E. Jensen of Indianapolis is to be mentioned particularly for an outstanding sermon on the prophetic message to modern life.

CHRISTIAN UNITY

Rev. Peter Ainslie, president of the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity, brought the convention to its knees in his masterly address. During the past year he has delivered 250 addresses before audiences of every sort, and this itinerant ministry has greatly deepened his conviction of the need of Christian unity in the world, and the desire of the world to realize it. Dr. Ainslie grew wistful as he told the Disciples of the enthusiasm of their fathers for Christian unity and then recounted the failures of the sons. He pleaded that Disciples should take such an interest in the cause of the reunion of Christendom as would make them leaders and not followers. Rejecting every oratorical artificiality, his quiet talk held the audience spellbound for more than an hour.

Though the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity has been under constant attack during the past year by reactionary journals, the receipts have been larger than for any other year save one. This organization is assuming an increasingly commanding position among Christian union forces. It places its dependence upon intercessory prayer, conference, and the circulation of irenic literature.

MISSIONARY FEATURES

The reports of missionary achievement during the year were noteworthy. In the Congo mission the mission press has printed 5,000 copies of the New Testament in Lonkundo, and thus a whole section of Africa has secured for the first time access to the holy scriptures. For the Congo mission two new launches are being built, and will shortly be ready for service on the tributaries of the Congo. The Woodward Avenue church of Detroit is installing a $3,000 light and power station at Bolenge, and President Burnham suggested the immediate installation of wireless outfits in the Congo to unite the various stations. Equally significant are the translations which have been made for the Tibetans, by Mrs. A. L. Shelton, widow of the martyred missionary, who has prepared during the year translations of Bible stories and of Christian hymns as a beginning in a native Christian literature for Tibet. In home missions the reports of work among immigrants, Spanish-speaking Americans and Indians were significant. President H. O. Pritchard of the board of education reported that five Disciples nearly everything that a virile minister of the gospel ever was. As a G. A. R. man he received the honor of being national chaplain, and later national instructor. He was in constant demand for patriotic addresses. As an author he had attained distinction, and the fact that he was once editor of an English dictionary attests his mastery of English. Bishop of the Reformed Episcopal church, he was in a larger sense bishop of all evangelicals in Chicago.

Papal Delegate Will Come to America

Since the United States is his most important source of income the pope is giving more attention to things American than formerly and recently issued a decree directing that Archbishop John Bonzano should visit every diocese in this country. During the reign of a recent pope all of the dioceses of Italy were visited, but this visit to America is without precedent. Roman Catholic ranks have suffered vast losses in this country in the past half century, and faces still more, hence the church is seeking the facts first-hand. The primary causes of defection are intermarriage and the work of the secret fraternities.

Lutherans Erect Mammoth Publishing Plant

Although the Lutherans maintain their headquarters in New York, according to the constitution of the church, they continue to make Philadelphia the home of their publishing plant. A new building will be started this year which will cost $750,000 with equipment. The denomination is preparing to do a business of a million dollars a year. When this new building is finished it will be one of the finest and most complete possessed by any denomination in America. Other denominations with large publishing plants are Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and Baptists.

National Council Refuses to Admit Unitarians

The National Council of Free Churches of England, which has faced some difficult questions from time to time in bringing denominations into cooperation, recently was called upon to consider for admission the application of a Unitarian church and minister into the fellowship. The petition was denied, however, in conformance with former decisions not to admit any who would not assert the deity of Jesus. There are not lacking a considerable number of free churchmen who would admit Unitarians, nevertheless, and let them take their own place colleges now have promises from the general board of education in New York aggregating a million dollars, conditioned on the raising of two millions more. Campaigns to secure this money are under way. His board has completed its reorganization by which it becomes subject to the international convention.

DISCIPLES AT WINONA

The board of temperance and social welfare had good reason to be well pleased with this convention. As in all communions, certain influences have been at work to repudiate the social ideals of the churches as published by the Federal Council. But the convention by an overwhelming vote reaffirmed these principles. The work of Professor Alva W. Taylor, who has been in the field almost constantly during the past year, has secured significant results in a larger intelligence on industrial questions among Disciples of Christ.

Roy S. Haynes, U. S. prohibition commissioner, spoke on the Volstead Act, and the enforcement of the prohibition amendment. Dr. W. O. Thompson, president of Ohio State university and president of the International Sunday School Council of Religious Education, spoke on the various means by which the knowledge of the Bible may be increased. The chief emphasis of the address was on a restoration of the teaching function of the home. Rev. James L. Barton, secretary of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions, supported chiefly by Congregational churches, spoke on the world task. Both years at Winona Lake local interests have made additions to the regular program, last year bringing William Jennings Bryan and this year organizing a meeting on Sunday afternoon for Billy Sunday.

RECEPTION FOR MISSIONARIES

This year some of the most eminent of the missionaries of the Disciples are in the home-land. A public reception was given these missionaries at the Westminster hotel which was attended by practically the entire convention. These men and women are held in great esteem, and there was no more tender moment in the convention than while listening to the obituary sermon in memory of the recently departed missionaries, delivered by Rev. Edgar DeWitt Jones of Detroit. Among those remembered in this way were Dr. A. L. Shelton, killed by bandits in Tibet; Rev. Ellis P. Gish, drowned in a mountain stream in China; Rev. Jasper T. Moses, in charge of the union press of Mexico, and Miss Bertha Merrill of New York, killed by an automobile.

Fraternal greetings were brought the convention by representatives of the Brethren communion, known as Dunkards, who were meeting on the same grounds in a smaller tabernacle. The Christian denomination was also holding its Eel River conference at Winona Lake, and sent fraternal greetings. The Brethren speaker was very happy in insisting that all groups on the grounds were brethren and Christians and disciples.

There is no particular excitement about the election of officers in a Disciples convention, and such a thing as booming candidates is unknown. Rev. T. W. Grafton of Indianapolis was made president of the coming convention, and Rev. Graham Frank of Dallas was continued as secretary. The missionary leaders were all continued, including Rev. F. W. Burnham, president of the United Christian Missionary society; Mrs. Anna Atwater, first vice-president; Rev. Stephen J. Corey, second vice-president, and more than twenty secretaries.

FORWARD MOVEMENTS

The forward movements determined on by various departments are many and varied. The endowment campaign of the colleges has already been mentioned, and it is the largest single enterprise of the year. It is proposed to raise $100,000 as a Shelton memorial with which to found a chair of Tibetan literature at the College of Missions, to estabish a library of Tibetan literature, and to build an orphanage in Tibet which is now sorely needed. The department of evangelism continues in its program of seeking a million new members in five years. One of the most significant new movements inaugurated at this convention came from the women's department of the United Society. They have inaugurated a campaign to celebrate in 1924 the golden jubilee of the founding of the Christian woman's board of missions (one of the organizations recently merged in the United Society) by raising a million dollars. This money is to be used in the erection of fifty memorial buildings at home and abroad. They will also seek an additional fifty thousand members of local missionary societies and fifty thousand new subscribers to World Call, the denominational monthly magazine.

The attendance at the convention was greatly hindered by various factors, including the railway strike, a typhoid epidemic at Winona Lake, the general economic conditions and an impatience on the part of the laity with the acrimonious debates of recent years. Some of the officials of the United Christian Missionary society sought only a week before the convention to have the gathering deferred, but the headquarters group opposed such action. The enrolment was 1800 this year as compared with 3300 last year. On account of the acrimonious discussion the convention has not for several years received invitations from the churches in the great cities and has been compelled to seek a location. The harmonious convention of this year has quite changed the attitude in this regard. Five cities were at Winona Lake asking to secure next year's meeting. The final decision is up to the executive committee with the probability of a choice between Colorado Springs and Hot Springs..

The question of the relocation of the College of Missions was beclouded with theological prejudice. The faculty of this school favor proximity to a great university. A committee was appointed last year to select a new location, and to report to this convention. This committee eliminated other possibilities and reported that choice should be made between New York and Chicago. New York is felt by many to be geographically remote from the Disciples center of population. The matter will lie in committee another year. Meanwhile a determined effort is being made to keep the College of Missions in Indianapolis.

TEN NEW BOOKS ON JESUS

The most significant fact with regard to the new religious books of the year 1922-23 is the great number of volumes treating of the personality, life and work of Jesus. The publishers have felt the pulse of the serious reading public and the publication of these books is a result of that fact. The world was never so perplexed intellectually and spiritually as today. And men are wistfully turning, as never before—and more hopefully than ever before—to the "Lord of Thought" and of the Heart. Nothing could so enrich the fruitage of this new year than for ten thousand ministers to delve deeply into these new revealings of "The Life of Lives."

THE FINALITY OF CHRIST

By W. E. Orchard

The fame of the pastor of King's Weigh House (Congregational) church, London, long ago reached America. This volume of his sermons will be welcomed by students of present-day tendencies in Christian thinking. The Christian World says: "We commend this book to everyone who loves great preaching and fearless independence. ($1.35).

RABBONI: A Study of Jesus Christ, the Teacher

By Canon Anthony C. Deane

"This is a gracious and wise book, showing how to go to school to the Master Teacher. I do not remember to have seen a better study of Jesus the Teacher, alike in atmosphere and suggestion." (Rev. Joseph Fort Newton, D.D.) ($2.00).

THE REALITY OF JESUS

By J. H. Chambers Macaulay

The author finds the reality of life in the reality of Jesus. He writes with a faith that is overmastering and a brilliancy that sweeps the reader along in wondering enjoyment. He says, "The Mind of Christ is the greatest fact with which the mind of man can come in contact. Multitudes today are adrift, uncertain, unhappy, and inefficient in life, for lack of reality of faith. Jesus recreates belief in God and belief in men. He gives to life its joy, its duty and its destiny. Within the shadow of the world's restlessness lurks the reality of Jesus, and the demand for a religion adequate to life is the conscious or unconscious quest of man for the reality of God today." ($1.75).

JESUS AND LIFE

By Joseph McFadyen

The author, who is professor of New Testament in Queen's University, Kingston, Canada, holds that it is a "matter of life or death to the world" that men be christianized in all their various relations. ($2.00).

TOWARD THE UNDERSTANDING OF JESUS

By V. G. Simkhovitch

"The teachings of Christ are an historical event. Let us try to understand them historically. Without an historical understanding we have before us not teachings but texts. There is hardly a text in the four gospels that is not apparently conflicting with other texts. Yet an insight is won when the teachings of Jesus are viewed and understood historically." Thus Dr. Simkhovitch, who is professor of economics at Columbia University, takes up his survey of the background of the teachings of Jesus. Prof. Charles A. Ellwood, of the University of Missouri, writes that this is the best book he has found covering this phase of Jesus' work. ($1.75).

JESUS CHRIST AND THE WORLD TODAY

By Grace Hutchins and Anna Rochester

"A remarkable piece of work," says Norman Thomas, editor of "The Nation," in commenting upon this new book. He adds: "I have never seen a series of studies dealing with modern social applications of the teachings of Jesus which seemed to me so frank, thoroughgoing and suggestive. If Christianity is to have any positive influence in the making of a new age, it will have to be the sort of Christianity which this book expounds so well." ($1.25).

CHRIST AND INTERNATIONAL LIFE

By Edith Picton-Turbervill (With Introduction by the Right Hon. Lord Robert Cecil)

The author's theme is—as phrased and accepted by Lord Robert Cecil—that "our national policy, both internal and external, must be Christianized; that, in other words, Christian morality must in its essence be the guide of our national conduct." It is a thesis that has often been urged by divines and others; the author's eloquent pages vindicate it with much independence and from new angles. Miss Picton-Turbervill is known the world over for her work with the W. C. T. U. and the Y. W. C. A. ($1.50).

THE LORD OF THOUGHT

By Miss Lily Dougall and Rev. C. W. Emmet

This book is a study of the problems which confronted Jesus and the solutions he offered. It deals with the religious beliefs current in Judaism in the time of Jesus and the originality of his teaching in relation to them. It is an apologetic on new lines for the uniqueness of Christianity and the supremacy of our Lord in the realm of thought. ($2.50).

THE UNIVERSALITY OF CHRIST

By William Temple, Bishop of Manchester

"Just what many people, both young students and older persons who are desirous of thinking clearly on religious topics, are looking for."—Manchester Guardian. ($1.25).

THE CREATIVE CHRIST

By Edward S. Drown

How shall society be built on the foundation of righteousness, justice and love? How shall the individual, every individual, find his own freedom in a right and just relation that shall express and maintain the rights and freedom of all? How shall the state, the Nation, be so constituted as to maintain the rights and duties, political and industrial, of all its members? Dr. Drown, who is a well known professor of Cambridge, Mass., holds that the answer to all these questions will be arrived at through the acceptance in deed and truth of the teachings of the "Creative Christ." in the fellowship. The late Rev. F. B. Meyer is quoted as having favored the reception of the Unitarians provided it did not disrupt the free church fellowship.

New Team of Congregational Ministers at University of Michigan

The 1,000 Congregational students at the University of Michigan are to be shepherded during the coming year by Rev. Herbert Atchinson Jump, who has been called by the First Congregational Church at Ann Arbor after a year's search from a six-year pastorate at Manchester, N. H., the largest church in that state, and by Rev. E. Knox Mitchell, Jr., son of Prof. E. K. Mitchell of Hartford seminary and a June graduate of that school, who will act as student pastor. Mr. Jump, who will begin work on Sept. 24th, has had pastorates in college towns for 11 years and in industrial cities for 10 years, has been college preacher at a half dozen eastern universities and fitting schools, has lived in California for five years where he had churches in Oakland and Redlands, and has served overseas with the Y. M. C. A. He is a graduate of Amherst and Yale Divinity school. His colleague is a Princeton graduate, who went to the Plattsburg officers' training camp after a year at Hartford seminary, secured a lieutenant's commission, instructed at Camps Dix and Lee, went to the Caucasus in Near East relief work, and finally returned to complete his studies. President Marion Leroy Burton and 75 members of the university faculty attend the First Congregational church, which for several years under the former ministry of Rev. Lloyd Douglas, averaged a Sunday morning congregation of 900, the seating capacity of the church.

Christian Universities of Near East Aided

To aid three great institutions of the Near East, Robert college of Constantinople, the American university at Beirut, and the Constantinople Women's college, which through the fortunes of war, fell into grievous debt and suffered from lack of equipment, an emergency campaign has just been waged in America. One million one hundred thousand dollars has been given, one-third of which was donated by the Laura Spellman Rockefeller foundation. The continuation of these Christian institutions in the orient makes it once more possible to be optimistic about the future of this section of the world.

Reform Bureau of New York Publishes Report

The reforming spirit is still strong in Protestantism, and a typical organization at work in this field is the Reform Bureau of New York. A recent issue of the Civic Forum published by this organization carries a great deal of interesting material on street fairs and carnivals. In the annual report of organizational activities is a long list of bills passed by the New York legislature which have been sponsored by the organization. Rev. O. R. Miller is state superintendent, with headquarters at Albany.

Successor Secured to Dr. Massee

The resignation of Dr. J. C. Massee from the pulpit of Baptist Temple, Brooklyn, left one of the large churches of the Baptist communion without a leader, but Dr. Egbert LeRoy Dakin of Charlestown, W. Va., has been called. Dr. Dakin is a former student of the University of Chicago, and served for a time as pastor of the Memorial Church of Christ of Baptists and Disciples. Dr Massee, the outstanding fundamentalist leader, is now pastor of Tremont Temple, Boston.

Episcopalians Will Debate the Common Cup

The sacramentarian attitude of Episcopalians has resulted in the retention of the common cup in the communion service long after it has been abandoned by most Protestant bodies. One of the proposed changes which will be discussed at the general convention at Portland will be the permission to churches to use individual cups. In some churches, there is the practice of intinction, the bread being dipped in the wine and given to the worshipper by the priest. Dr. Leighton Parks of St. Bartholomew church of New York is petitioning for a change.

Church Withdrawals in Germany not so Numerous

Even before the war certain socialist leaders in Germany led movements to induce people to withdraw publicly from the state church. In 1908 there were 50,000 such withdrawals and in 1913-14, 60,000. The year following the war a quarter of a million withdrew. The total number in this generation is much less than a million out of a church population of forty million. An effort on the part of the socialist authorities to prevent religious instructon in the public schools at Leipsic has failed. The Roman Catholic church has shared pro rata in the losses during this period of uncertainty.

Disciples Debate Creedal Policy

It is difficult for an outsider to follow the maze of business in a Disciples convention because of the anomalous form of organization now prevailing. Holding fast to the idea of a mass convention of individuals, the Disciples have less democracy than any national church gathering in America, for not only is there no representative principle in the body, but no one save a parliamentary expert knows how to steer a motion through all the processes to ultimate success. This gives to the floor leader an advantage not possessed in any other communion. It is customary in these conventions for certain conservative leaders to stand up and announce that they will vote for or against a given motion. Those whose bias is friendly to this floor leader follow suit.

The course of a motion in a Disciples convention is often as follows: The executive committee of the board of managers passes a resolution which is then referred to the board of managers. This board of managers reports it in the sessions of the United Christian Missionary Society. The composition of the society sitting in annual session is the same personnel as the personnel of the International Convention, but at a future session when the convention is supposed to be sitting, the resolution is once more introduced. From this gathering it is referred to the recommendations committee of the convention. This is a representative body of perhaps 175 members elected by the state convention. The recommendations committee at once refers the question to a subcommittee. From subcommittees it goes back to the recommendations committee and from the recommendations committee to the convention. The convention may approve, disapprove or recommit to the recommendations committee, but it cannot amend.

It was through this complicated machinery that the action of the United Christian Missionary Society at Winona had to pass. For more than two years it has been known throughout the denomination that the Disciples missionaries in China were practicing "open membership." This term, which cannot be found in the dictionary, gets whatever meaning it has from the practice of certain American churches, Baptist and Disciples, who for many years have received into some kind of membership people from pedo-baptist communions without rebaptism. Most of these churches had two membership rolls and called their unimmersed members "associate members" or "members of the congregation." In other instances, all distinctions were abolished. In practically every case the unimmersed people voted and exercised all other privileges of membership.

Professing consternation at these practices, led by conservative newspaper agitation, a few churches voted to discontinue their offerings to the United Society, whereupon, the board of managers was called together at St. Louis last January. At the close of a two day session with a diminished attendance, a resolution introduced by Rev. Z. T. Sweeney, a retired minister and business man of Columbus, Ind., and against an earnest protest of a minority, was passed. This resolution was as follows:

"As a purely administrative policy, the board of managers of the United Christian Missionary Society announces the following:

"In harmony with the teachings of the New Testament as understood by this board of managers, the United Christian Missionary Society is conducting its work everywhere on the principle of receiving into the membership of the churches at home or abroad, by any of its missionaries, only those who are immersed, penitent believers in Christ.

"Furthermore, it is believed by this board of managers, that all of the missionaries and ministers appointed and supported by this board, are in sincere accord with this policy, and certainly it will not appoint and indeed it will not continue in its service any one known by it to be not in such accord. It disclaims any right and disowns any desire to do otherwise."

In order to satisfy himself, with regard to missionary practice, Rev. John T. Brown, a conservative minister of Louisville, Ky., and a member of the board of managers, made a visit to the oriental fields during the past year. He employed a non-Disciple interpreter, and visited local churches. The Chinese Christians interrogated by Mr. Brown in many instances said they were members of the local churches of the Disciples and informed him in response to further inquiry, that they were not immersed. The missionaries rendered a report of their practices to the board and sent Rev. Alexander Paul, an eminent Chinese missionary of many years' experience, to speak in the convention and explain the exigencies of work in China. Rev. E. K. Higdon of the Philippines recently wrote a letter to the board declaring his earnest belief in "open membership," and while expressing his willingness to carry on his work according to the rules of his supporting board, inquired if he should prepare to offer his resignation. Thus the documents in the case are the addresses of Rev. John T. Brown and Rev. Alexander Paul, the letters of the Chinese missionaries, the letter of Mr. Higdon and the resolutions passed in executive committee and later in the board of managers. The documents were all printed in the Winona report of the board with the exception of the addresses noted above.

They make interesting reading. In its policy of refusing to believe and of denying that open membership was being practiced in any mission field by Disciples missionaries the executive committee publishes the letters from the China missionaries as confirmation of the declarations it has made from the beginning that there is no such thing as open membership in China! A single quotation from one of the letters, representing the Luchowfu station, will show the disingenuousness of the executive committee's attitude:

"I have been asked by the station to explain the cases in the Luchowfu church of unimmersed Christians who are at present making their church home with us. There are twenty-one such. Of this number only four are in the employ of the mission, as follows: Mr. Goh, assistant principal of the girls' school; Mr. Wei, assistant principal of the boys' school; Mr. Hwang, instructor in boys' school, and Miss Djan, one of my Bible women. The first three of these are Presbyterians from Shantung. The last is a member of the Wesleyan mission.

"The other seventeen are here in business for themselves, are wives of Christians, or have been brought here to their heathen mother-in-law's homes. There are doctors, teachers, and merchants, men and women of ability and standing in the community, capable of taking responsibility in the work of the church, and worthy of bearing before the world the name of Christ. There are among them Methodists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, and a number from the China Inland Mission.

"At the annual meeting of the church, all of these not only have the privilege of the ballot, but may be elected to office. One is at present serving on the church committee, and another served in that capacity last year."

In the letter written by Rev. E. K. Higdon, he describes his practice of open membership in the Taft Avenue church of Manila, P. I., which practice he consents to abandon if so directed by the board, but he frankly professes his earnest conviction that if he were not in the employ of the United Society and his church officials permitted it he surely would receive into his church all Christian persons regardless of the mode of their baptism, though he would himself perform baptism only by immersion. He asks that the executive committee advise him whether he should resign from its employ.

The executive committee made reply to Mr. Higdon's letter, and presented its reply to the board of managers at Winona for approval. Its statement and reply were as follows:

"It seems that three questions are raised in these letters which should have an answer, and concerning which Mr. Higdon asks for an early reply. They are:

"1. Can a missionary continue as a worker of the United Society who personally holds it advisable to receive unimmersed Christians into church membership on the mission field, but refrains from doing so and endeavors to loyally carry out the policy pursued in the past, and recently stated by the society through its board of managers?

"2. What shall the attitude of a mission church be toward those Christians of other religious bodies worshipping with it, but who hold their membership in their own home churches?

“3. From whom shall the officiary of such a church be chosen?

“The foreign department recommends to the executive committee that it be authorized to answer Mr. Higdon's letter as follows:

“1. Our interpretation of the action of the board of managers with regard to church membership is that it has to do with the administrative policy to be pursued in carrying on the work, and does not concern personal opinion.

“We interpret the statement with regard to ‘being in sincere accord’ with the policy pronounced to mean that the missionary should be willing to earnestly carry on the work in the manner suggested. We feel that this was not meant in any sense to infringe upon private opinion or individual liberty of conviction ‘so long as none judges his brother, or insists on forcing his own opinions upon others or on making them an occasion of strife.’

“2. It is urged that our mission churches extend every possible help and courtesy to members of other Christian bodies who may be worshipping with them. We do not interpret the action of the board of managers as departing in any sense from the common practice of our people in regard to this. We have always recognized the Christian character of others who profess the name of Christ and serve him. We have always made these people feel at home in our congregations, have never debarred them from participation in the communion service, nor from the support of the cause either financially or through their personal service in the church. We can understand how on the mission field there is even more necessity for such an attitude than at home, because of the temptations and discouragements which come to followers of Christ away from their home congregations and with no church of their own to which they may go. We find nothing in the policy as adopted by the board of managers of the society which would not make it possible to recognize fully the Christian character and purpose of those from other religious bodies, thus enabling our mission churches to give them a church home as guests or visitors while separated from the congregations where they hold membership, and at the same time give them a real part in the congregational life of the church. The action of the board of managers does clearly state that only immersed persons should be added to the membership of our mission churches. This point should be made clear in teaching, and in the designating terms used.”

When at last the issue was faced on the floor of the convention those who opposed the action of the board of managers insisted that it was not the function of the board of managers to interpret the New Testament, and that such interpretation was a creed which under any “interpretation” bound the conscience of the missionaries. The public discussion lasted for more than two hours, the chairman ruling that the speeches should alternate on either side of the motion and that they should be limited to five minutes. The motion which prevailed overwhelmingly was to approve the action of the board of managers as interpreted in the letter to Mr. Higdon.

Mr. R. A. Doan, in an address vibrant with conviction and moral power, reported the Shanghai conference and the appeal of the native Christians for unity in China. Disciples missionaries are most favorable to the growing movement in the Chinese churches for Christian unity.

Churches Miss Seven Out of Ten Children

THE International Sunday School Council of Religious Education has recently issued in pamphlet form the report of the committee on education, which presents many startling facts with regard to the state of religious instruction in America. The following facts are challenging as they indicate the drift of things:

“There are millions of American children and youth unreached by the educational program of the church. There are in the United States over 58,000,000 people, nominally Protestant, who are not identified in any way with any church either Jewish, Protestant or Catholic.

“There are over 27,000,000 American children and youth, nominally Protestant, under twenty-five years of age who are not enrolled in any Sunday school or cradle roll department and who receive no formal or systematic religious instruction. There are 8,000,000 American children, nominally Protestant, under ten years of age who are growing up in nonchurch homes.

“There are in the United States, 8,676,000 Catholic children and youth under twenty-five years of age. Of this number 1,870,000 are in religious schools and 6,806,000, or 78.4 per cent of the whole are not in religious schools. A much larger proportion have had religious training before the age of confirmation but the instruction is not continued through middle and later adolescence.

“There are in the United States 1,630,000 Jewish children and youth under twenty-five years of age. Of this number 87,000 are in religious schools and 1,543,000 or 95.2 per cent of the total are not in religious schools.

“There are in the United States 42,891,850 Protestant and nominally Protestant youth under twenty-five years of age. Of this number 14,361,900 are reported enrolled in Sunday schools or Protestant parochial and week-day religious schools; 1,255,740 are on cradle rolls or font rolls, and 27,275,110 or 66.5 per cent of the total are not enrolled in any religious schools.

“Putting these statistics in another way the following statements may be made: 19 out of every 20 Jewish children under twenty-five years of age receive no formal religious instruction; 3 out of every 4 Catholic children under twenty-five years of age receive no formal religious instruction; 2 out of every 3 Protestant children under twenty-five years of age receive no formal religious instruction.

“Or, taking the country as a whole, 7 out of every 10 children and youth of the United States under twenty-five years of age are not being touched in any way by the educational program of any church. How long may a nation endure, 7 out of 10 of whose children and youth receive no systematic instruction in the religious and moral sanctions upon which its democratic institutions rest? This question becomes more acute when we learn how few hours of instruction are available annually for those children who are enrolled in religious schools.”

Among the measures adopted to correct this condition is a proposed cooperation with the public schools. The schools will be asked to recognize courses of study in religion given by the churches of all faiths provided they measure up to the right standards educationally. The schools are asked to provide certain alternate courses in ethics and sociology for those students who do not elect to study in connection with the churches. This report states clearly that the daily reading of the Bible in the public schools which is so much emphasized by certain religious people is no solution of the problem of religious education.

Not only does the committee seek the extension of the work of religious education through the correlation with the public schools, but it recognizes the primary responsibility of the home as an agency in the work of religious education, and urges the conduct of family worship, the use of table talk for the inculcation of religious attitudes, and the use of pictures, music, books and games, church papers and other agencies to produce a truly religious home atmosphere.

It is shown that the present Sunday school system is quite inefficient. “Twenty-five per cent of the teachers of a typical state have had less than nine years of schooling. The typical Sunday school teacher has had eleven years of schooling. Half of the teachers prepare their lessons either early Sunday morning or late Saturday night. The typical Sunday school teacher has had fewer than ten weeks of professional training for the sacred task of teaching religion.” To meet this situation community schools for teacher training will be established. These are to offer courses in the Bible, departmental specialization, psychology, pedagogy and a course on the organization and administration of moral and religious education. The annual session must be not less than two semesters of ten weeks each.

Thus the new administration of the Sunday school forces is proceeding to put into practice with promptness and despatch the new ideals which were accepted at the recent Kansas City convention.

Great Books for Great Days

Toward the Understanding of Jesus

By VLADIMIR SIMKHOVITCH,
Professor of Economic History, Columbia University.

Problems of history are problems of understanding. The problem raised by the teachings of Jesus is—why such unprecedented teachings at that particular time? The first essay, therefore deals with the "fullness of time," for to understand that "fulness" is the task of history. The author interprets the particular circumstances and conditions that make so great an historical event as the insight of Jesus historically intelligible to us. "Rome's Fall Reconsidered," another of the essays, deals with a determining cause of the decay of that Roman world which historians have overlooked. One single major factor, the exhaustion of Roman soil and the destruction of the Roman provinces, sheds new light by which we see the outlines of the doom of Roman civilization.

"The most satisfactory book on this subject I have read," says John Dewey of this volume.

"An epoch-making book," says Prof. Charles A. Ellwood, of the University of Missouri.

THE PILGRIM

By T. R. GLOVER,
Author, "The Jesus of History," "Jesus in the Experience of Men."

"Few English writers on religious matters seem able to serve the unbiased and thoughtful reader so well as Dr. Glover, and many will gratefully avail themselves of the assistance of a layman who shows that he knows how they think and feel about religion, and can interpret the meaning of Christianity in terms they can readily understand."—Times Literary Supplement.

"A new book from Dr. Glover's pen is both a religious and a literary event. This volume should have a universal reading."—Editorial in The Christian Century.

"We strongly commend Dr. Glover's book to those who wish to study the power of Christ in the life and thought of men."—Canon Barnes of Westminster Abbey. Price $1.75, plus 10 cents postage.

Psychology and the Christian Life

By PROF. T. W. PYM,
Head of Cambridge House.

Recent developments in the realm of the new psychology have called for a new statement of its application in the field of Christian faith. This Professor Pym has very ably and very completely done. It is not so much speculative and theoretical as a practical treatment of the subject. We have here a pioneer book in the art of applying the new psychology methods in Christian life. The eight chapters treat "Psychology and Common Sense," "Psychology in the World," "Faith and Suggestion," "The Psychology of Sin," "Christianity and Psycho-Analysis," "The Psychology of Jesus—His Practice," and "General Conclusions." Price $1.50 plus 10 cents postage.

THE TRUTHS WE LIVE BY

By JAY WILLIAM HUDSON,
Professor of Philosophy in the University of Missouri.

Do the conflicting claims of modern cults and doctrines puzzle you? Can you see their relation to the old standards? Is there room for God, Immortality and Freedom in a world ruled by science and reason? Do the old truths hold for a New America? In plain, clear English an able philosopher answers these and other questions for practical people. He avoids dry theology and presents an extremely readable, comprehensive study of the moral background of the modern world. "The truths that have fashioned so many great men and great civilizations rise again with renewed power to solve a new world's problems and to build a new world-order," says the author.

Price $3.00 plus 12 cents postage.

ENDURING INVESTMENTS

The Meaning of Baptism

By Charles Clayton Morrison

Editor of The Christian Century

"THERE remain great majorities of the immersionist communions to whom the baptism issue is a live issue still," says the author of this book in his Foreword. "Their religious thinking and custom—and conscience, too—are embedded in legalistic and literalistic assumptions. Upon these assumptions rests their dogma of immersion-baptism. It is my conviction that those communions which have laid stress upon the physical act of immersion as equivalent to baptism and therefore invested with the authority of the Scriptures and of Christ himself, will be forever under effective inhibition against committing themselves to the greater social and spiritual program of modern religion and to practical co-operation in any program of Christian unity unless they consciously and for good and sufficient reasons abandon their immersion dogma. This dogma eclipses the great objective task of the church for large majorities of Disciples and Baptists."

The Christian Advocate (New York) Says of This Book:

"This is probably the most important book in English on the place of baptism in Christianity written since Mozley published his 'Baptismal Regeneration' in 1856."

The Congregationalist says of the book:

"A daring and splendidly Christian piece of work, in which the author frankly asserts that Jesus 'had no intention of fixing a physical act upon his followers. He did not have in mind the form of baptism but the meaning of it.' "

The Continent says:

"It required courage to publish this book. It is by a minister of the Disciples' church, which has been peculiarly strenuous in behalf of the scriptural necessity for immersion, and he writes that 'the effect of our study is absolutely to break down the notion that any divine authority whatsoever stands behind the practice of immersion.' Instead, in the New Testament, baptism simply means the conferment and acceptance of the status of a Christian. He is strongly against the rebaptism of Christian believers who apply to Baptist or Disciple churches for membership having been accepted in other churches by any mode of baptism whatever. Equally he opposes infant baptism, because the subject of baptism must be voluntary. At the root of his argument lies a sound desire for Christian unity."

MEMORIES OF A HOSTESS

By M. A. DeWolfe Howe

¶ For sixty years the Boston house of Mrs. Fields, wife of the distinguished member of the publishing firm of Ticknor and Fields (who was also editor of the Atlantic Monthly from 1861 to 1871), was a center of extraordinary hospitality, not only to the most eminent of the American Victorian group of writers, but to such visitors from overseas as Charles Dickens. This book is a chronicle of notable friendships, drawn chiefly from Mrs. Fields's diaries and illustrated with reproductions of many unfamiliar portraits and facsimile letters. Publication date October 1. Price $4.00.

STEEL: THE DIARY OF A FURNACE WORKER

By Charles Rumford Walker

¶ Since the 'Great Steel Strike' of 1919, the problems of steel have been recognized as 'strategic for American capital and American labor.' Unusual insight into them can be gained by reading this personal record of a Yale man who worked as a 'clean-up' in the 'pit' of a steel mill, as 'helper' on the open-hearth, and as 'hot-blast' man on the blast-furnace. The book is a remarkably living and personal picture of the life of the steel-worker — showing what the 'twenty-four hour shift' is really like, what 'Hunky antagonism' is; the grind and the camaraderie of the furnace-workers' life.

THE NEXT - TO - NOTHING HOUSE

By Alice Van Leer Carrick

¶ A special interest attaches to the delightful old house described in this book through its occupancy by Daniel Webster while he was a student at his beloved Dartmouth. Mrs. Carrick, author of COLLECTOR'S LUCK, now lives there, and she tells, with her usual contagious enthusiasm, of the old-time furnishings and adornments which she has made a hobby of collecting at bargain prices. Sixty illustrations.

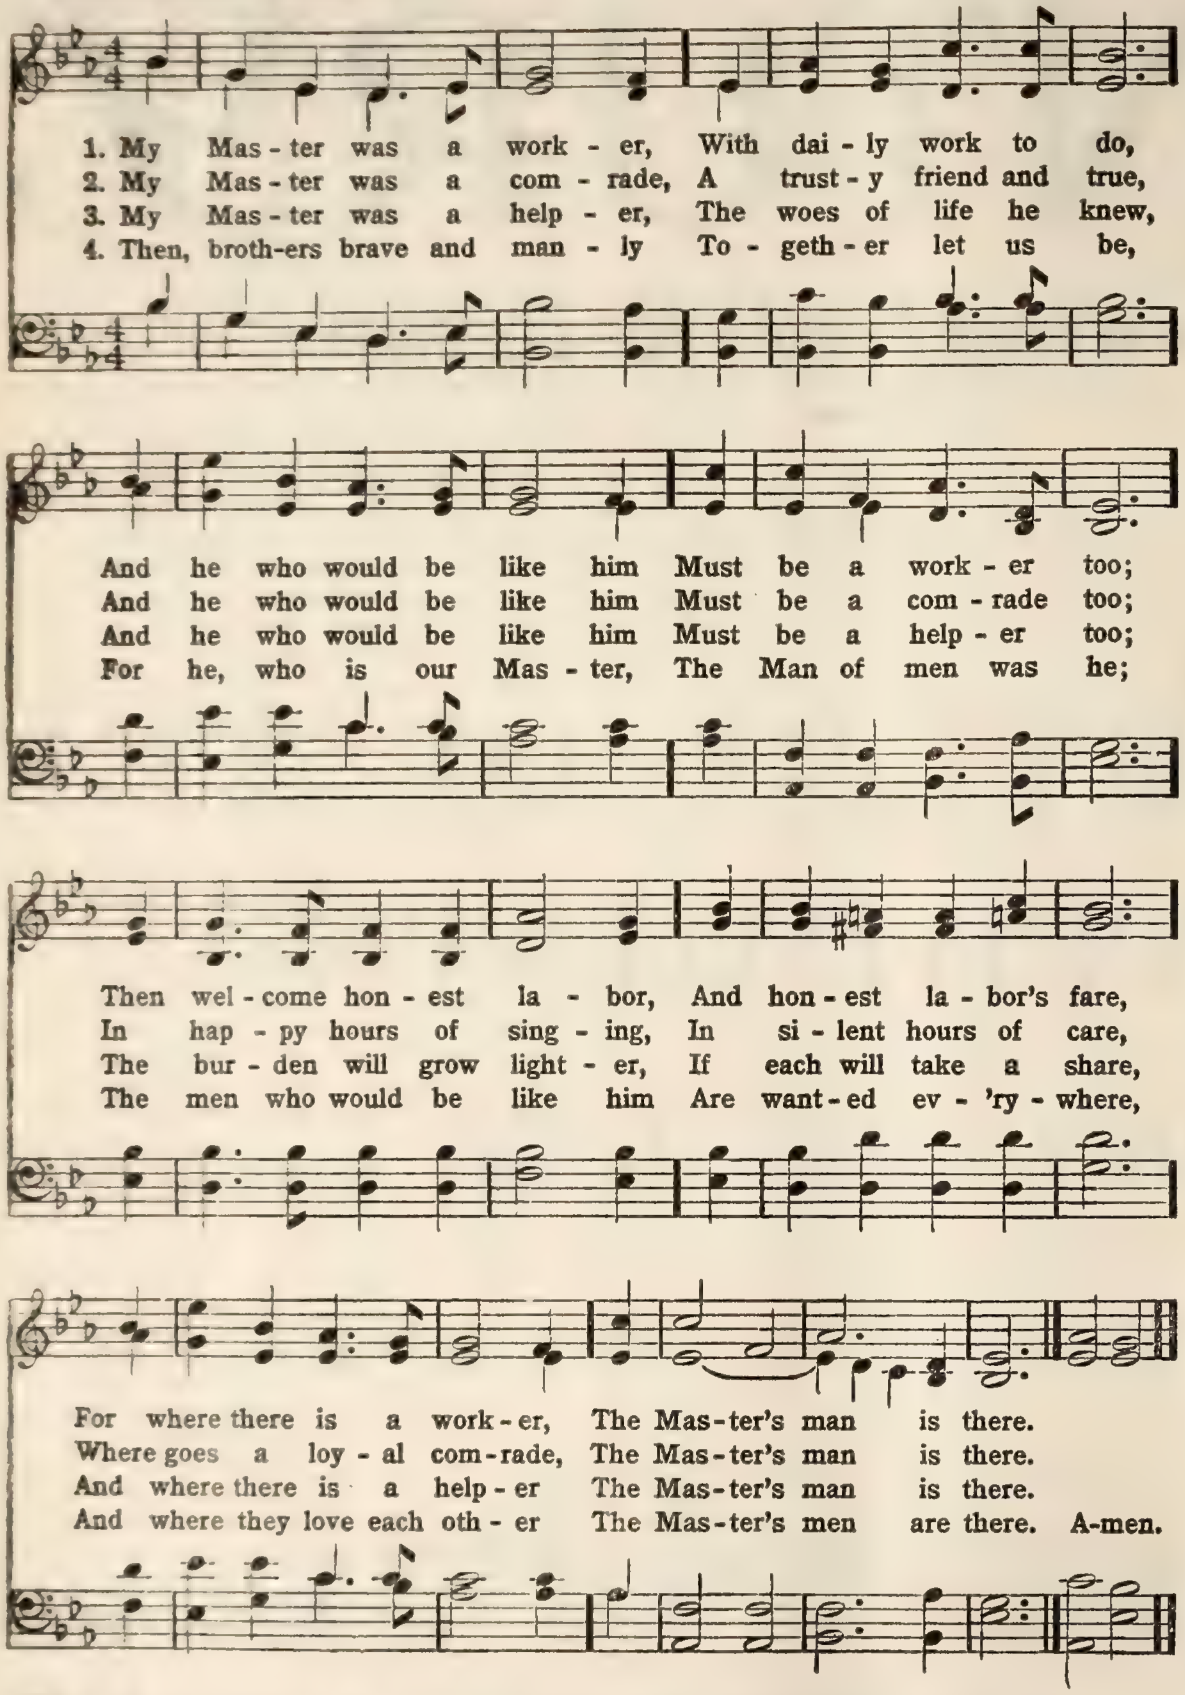
SEASONS 7,6,7,6. D.

WILLIAM GEORGE TARRANT, (1853—) Arr. from MENDELSSOHN, 1840



1. My Mas-ter was a work-er, With dai-ly work to do,
2. My Mas-ter was a com-rade, A trust-y friend and true,
3. My Mas-ter was a help-er, The woes of life he knew,
4. Then, broth-ers brave and man-ly To-geth-er let us be,
And he who would be like him Must be a work-er too;
And he who would be like him Must be a com-rade too;
And he who would be like him Must be a help-er too;
For he, who is our Mas-ter, The Man of men was he;
Then wel-come hon-est la-bor, And hon-est la-bor's fare,
In hap-py hours of sing-ing, In si-lent hours of care,
The bur-den will grow light-er, If each will take a share,
The men who would be like him Are want-ed ev-'ry-where,
For where there is a work-er, The Mas-ter's man is there.
Where goes a loy-al com-rade, The Mas-ter's man is there.
And where there is a help-er The Mas-ter's man is there.
And where they love each oth-er The Mas-ter's men are there. A-men.

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH is the most inspiring and beautiful hymnal in the American church. All the best loved hymns of Christian faith are included and, in addition, the book is distinguished by three outstanding features:

Hymns of Social Service,

Hymns of Christian Unity,

Hymns of the Inner Life.

Think of being able to sing the Social Gospel as well as to preach it! The Social Gospel will never seem to be truly religious until the church begins to sing it.

Episcopal Convention and American Christianity

THE triennial convention of the Protestant Episcopal church at Portland, Ore., is of primary interest to about a million members of that communion in the United States. To a larger extent than the convention may be aware, it is also of interest to forty million other fellow-Christians throughout the United States. No communion in America holds within its fellowship such discordant elements as does the Episcopal church. The continued success and growth of this organization may be hailed by all those who pray for Christian unity as a splendid example of unity amid diversity. If near-Catholics and old-time evangelicals and modern liberals can live in the same household of faith within the fold of this communion, they can live together in a larger and more inclusive organization. An Episcopal convention has a splendid freedom in discussion. Perhaps no religious convention in America talks out its problems with more abandon and frankness than does this one. The discussions are no mere counsels of prudence, no suggestions of compromise, but manly presentations of religious viewpoints. It will be of more than denominational interest to know what the Episcopalians do in the matter of Christian unity. Do they seek only union with Roman Catholics? Or do a vast majority recognize an even closer kinship with the evangelical churches? The future of Christendom itself waits in some measure upon this issue. From an unfavorable start, the Episcopal church has in recent decades made for itself an honorable place among the great missionary groups. The individual giver in this church is now the most liberal in our whole nation, exceeding the liberality of the Methodists, which is proverbial. The whole Christian group thanks God and takes courage on hearing the statistical reports from this year's convention. The Episcopal church has much to teach its neighbors concerning reverence, orderliness, religious art, and true Christian piety.

Two Contrasted Lives

CHICAGO has recently numbered among its losses two well-known men who have passed away within the month. One was a minister, a bishop in a small but worthy denomination. The other was a lawyer of prominence, and of notable success in his profession. Their names were familiar to readers of the public press. Their funerals were attended by sufficient numbers to make clear the interest of the community in their passing. Yet the value of these two men was in striking contrast. The bishop was loved and respected for a long life of public service in patriotic and religious activities. His name was to be found on most committees charged with the conduct of public ministries of beneficence and welfare. He gave himself without stint to the community, and for the good of all. He was loyal to his church, but he was more than a churchman; he was a citizen and a Christian. Sometimes we thought him a bit too militaristic in his sentiments. But that was due to his long experience with soldier organizations, from the days of the civil war, in which he was a chaplain, through a long and honorable connection with the Grand Army of the Republic, in which he held a leading place. But he was loved and trusted as a man of God and a servant of the city. He was not possessed of wealth, but he was rich in the things which are above all money values. The other man was conspicuous in his profession. He was spoken of as one of the leaders of the bar. He was immensely wealthy. There were few cases of litigation involving large interests with which his name was not connected. He was very valuable to his clients. He was notably successful in securing verdicts. He is quoted as having observed in connection with a celebrated case in which decisions were won were not presumed to be a mat-list of American laws through which a clever lawyer cannot drive a coach and four. To him, apparently, the practice of law was not so much the securing of the ends of justice as the winning of decisions. And the methods by which decisions were won were not presumed to be a matter for public scrutiny. It is the notorious success of men of this type which constitutes the most serious menace to the moral integrity of the legal profession in the United States. It is becoming increasingly common to compare the character and proceedings of American courts with those of Great Britain, to the discredit of the former. British judges are far less complaisant to the indirections and trickeries of shrewd and unscrupulous attorneys than is the case in American courts. These courts are presumed to be the bulwarks of law, order and public rights. They are usually above suspicion of bribery. In the general respect which they merit there is ground for public satisfaction. But there still remains one great reform to be achieved. That is the raising of the moral level of legal practice in this country above the danger line of unscrupulius procedure on the part of adroit and conscienceless lawyers. The leaders of the legal profession have the responsibility of sounding out this warning to the rank and file of their colleagues, if they would save their calling from the danger which threatens it today.

Community Church Movement Primarily Evangelical

A WIDESPREAD impression prevails that in the community church movement of the United States there is a latitudinarianism which is destructive of Christian loyalties. In New York and Boston are community churches, one in each city, which have ceased to call themselves Christian, or at least have insisted that they are Jewish and Buddhist as well as Christian. It is this de-christianized type of church which has been widely advertised through certain tractarian literature. But this devitalized and de-christianized kind of church is not succeeding. To make such a church prosper has been difficult even in the atmosphere of a metropolis. In the smaller cities and towns it would be impossible. Aside from these two organizations, however, the more than eight hundred federated and community churches of the country are evangelical in spirit and purpose. They draw their ministers from the evangelical communions. They carry on the church methods of an evangelical church. The Christian ordinances are observed, though these rest on a voluntary basis. The literature of the Sunday schools comes from evangelical houses, as well as the hymn books in the pews. The missionary offerings go into the treasury of the various denominations which carry on evangelical work. It is hardly gracious for an evangelical church whose funds go into the same treasury with those of the community church to raise any questions of theological orthodoxy. Men prove their orthodoxy better by their deeds than by their lip professions. In some cases short-sighted denominational leaders are finding pleasure in denouncing community churches. Their own denominational brethren in the community churches naturally resent unjust and uninformed criticism, and the community churches will consequently be less generous in the treatment of the causes of these denominations. No criticism or persecution will destroy this new movement, but friendliness and cooperation on the part of great religious leaders in the denominations may aid helpfully in shaping its future.

The Greek Debacle and the Turkish Triumph

NO news has been more disquieting for many months than that regarding the routing of the Greek forces by Turkish troops in Asia Minor, and the practical annihilation of Greek control in Smyrna and the regions of the Seven Cities. Many causes have contributed to this result. But two are outstanding, both of them the outcome of the muddling policy of the allies regarding most matters in the near east. The first is the failure of any thoroughgoing plan for Greece in the counsels of the associated powers. To a large degree the reigning family, strongly German in its alliance and leanings, is unpopular. That was true in the time of George. It is still more true of Constantine. In spite of many factional misinterpretations and much hostile criticism, Venezelos appears to be the one man who has represented the constructive policy in Greek affairs. He is the "grand old man" of the nation. Yet he is in exile, and his friends are without representation in any recent cabinet. It would appear, however, that an increasing number of the Greek people believe that his leadership is the only solution of the national difficulties. With proper recognition of the Greek crisis on the part of the allies, this needed step might be taken. It may even now be too late. But it would seem to be the only way of rehabilitation for the distracted and misled Hellenes. The second cause of the present difficulty is the temporising policy of the allies in regard to Turkey. Among the assured results of the war were supposed to be the expulsion of the Turk from Europe, the internationalizing of Constantinople, the establishment of the Armenians in a secure and independent area, and the end of the massacres and outrages perpetrated upon them by the Turks and their savage associates. As a matter of fact, none of these things has come to pass, and all of them are more than ever threatened by recent events. The chief factor in this tragic failure is the wavering policy of Great Britain regarding Turkey. The Turks are Mohammedans. So are fifty millions of the inhabitants of British India. Turkish leaders, with a shrewdness which would have done credit to Abdul Hamid in his best days, have played off British concern for Indian pacification against any drastic action regarding Turkish interests in the near east. With this timid and hesitant attitude on the part of Great Britain, the natural leader among the allies, civilization has no champion in this confused and distraught arena of Asiatic politics and perils. Once more the tragedy of America's voiceless situation in the counsels of the disturbed and jealous nations is apparent. Where we ought to have a commanding and directing moral mandate for the distracted orient, we are dumb and impotent, self-crippled by a policy of complacent indifference.

Paganism or a Higher Christianity

DR. ELLWOOD in his "The Reconstruction of Religion" has very well stated the alternative for the church in the days that are upon us. It is either a better Christianity or a reversion to paganism. Of the latter there are many evidences. The prophet of the new paganism was Nietzsche, but thousands who never heard of him are nevertheless governed by an individualistic will to power that over-rides all sanctions of morality and considerations of social welfare. Dr. Ellwood states the task of the church in these terms: "The religious revolution which we are now undergoing, if it does not fail and lead to a reversion, concerns the transition from theological to ethical monotheism, from a metaphysical to a social scientific conception of religion." The decline of family morality is one of the evidences of the break-up of older sanctions. The United States now leads Japan in the number of its divorces, and indeed leads the whole civilized world. And it is not only divorce. Sex relations outside matrimony indicate that the family, once regarded as the bulwark of our civilization, will pass unless reinforcements come. In the business life, many of the old-time sanctions have gone. Competition was bad enough, but there is now a meaner thing than competition, the combination of big interests in order to drain the public. Whether it is a group of coal companies that foment strike trouble to raise the price of their coal, or a labor union unmoved by any sense of public service which will have its last penny of wage even though it ties up indefinitely the transportation of a great city, the same evil spirit of group selfishness prevails. The Christianity needed for this emergency is the kind that was preached to the woman at the well, and to the rich young ruler. It is the Christianity of Jesus, and not the Christianity of the Greeks of later centuries. The problem of the trinity—of Jesus' metaphysical relation to God—may well wait until the followers of Jesus have somewhat solved the problem of his lordship over the lives and affairs of men.

The Sociological Heretics

THE heresy most hated and feared these days is the sociological heresy. The pioneers of the modern social movement in the various denominations can all bear testimony. Rauschenbusch still serves as a target for the reactionary Baptists though he has passed beyond the veil. Many Presbyterians who were once prominent in the council of the denomination are now silent so far as the General Assembly and synods of the churches are concerned. The Roman Catholic church in America has developed some bold antagonists of social injustice, and these have spoken in terms quite as bold and unequivocal as any Protestant. Particularly has Father Ryan shown himself to be an able exponent of the new social idealism. But Rome is no more tolerant of economic heresy than are the princes of Protestantism and some months ago an order came from Rome abolishing the National Catholic Welfare Council. The American Catholics who favor an advanced social position for the church asked the pope to suspend judgment until they have opportunity to present the case in Rome and this permission was granted. What the fate of the Catholic Welfare Council will be one cannot yet safely prophesy. The church is strongly opposed to organized socialism, and if it should come out as opposed to the moderate demands of the National Catholic Welfare Council, it will seriously affect the loyalty of thousands of Catholic workingmen who at the present time believe the church helps them to fight their battles. What is behind the opposition in all communions is quite the same thing. Social Christianity is the Christianity of Jesus, but it is not the Christianity of the creeds. There is no point of tangency between one of Father Ryan's books and the Nicene creed. Dr. Rauschenbusch in his "Theology of the Social Gospel" does not come within gun-shot of the New Hampshire confession. It must be admitted that the views of these men are revolutionary when tested by medieval orthodoxy, and the devotees of orthodoxy are opposed to their work. But the most serious foe is the rich man who would buy the favor of the church with a tithe of all his gains.

Revival of the Religious Drama

PAGAN theatres perished when the early church finally won its victory. The theatre of that day was so debauched and immoral that there was nothing left to save. For hundreds of years the dramatic arts languished until they were revived by the church herself. It is an interesting chapter in dramatic history to realize that the teacher came into existence once more in order to present to the people the great morality plays of the middle ages. Such plays as Everyman were used by the church in order to present her ethical message to the people. The Passion play and others have come to familiarize the people with the great stories of the Bible. The pageant, which is one form of dramatic art, has been most used by the Methodists, the very group whose protest against the modern theatre has been vigorous. Recently in Boston the Greater Boston Federation of Churches presented a play, "Jeremiah," in the National Theatre before audiences which totaled more than 2,500 people. This play was written by Mrs. Eleanor Wood Whitman, formerly of the Wellesley faculty in the biblical department. In local churches all over the land there is a splendid interest in the subject of dramatics. It answers in many communities the question of what to do with the young people. Get them to work on amateur dramatics, and the question is answered. Of course all of this becomes an embarrassment in the churches, for there is such a dearth of equipment. Perhaps some churches would not object to a dramatization of Jeremiah in a church, but many other dramatic enterprises can scarcely be presented in the place of worship without shock and scandal. In the plan of many modern churches there is now place for amateur dramatics. The great buildings are being erected with reference to the varied mid-week program of a modern church. When vast numbers of people engage in dramatics, and help in presenting uplifting plays, perhaps the standards of the dramatic profession in the great cities will be modified accordingly.

Negro and Jew

PERHAPS it is fellowship in suffering of racial prejudices and antipathies which draws Negro and Jew together. Some influence is at work to this end, at any rate. It certainly is not formal religion, and there is little likelihood that the one will "convert" the other. But their alliances already develop interesting social situations, and show signs of certain momentous political consequences. The Jews no longer constitute a solid religious unit, any way. And the Negro never has discovered a religious solidarity. Racial persecutions have welded each into as solid a social mass as modern civilization furnishes examples of. Alone each has been helpless, or so nearly so that struggle against restrictions upon their social liberties has only welded them into more compact social groups. What will come of the alliance of the two?

The readiness of the Jew to champion the cause of the Negro is not an accident, confined to isolated and adventitious instances. All over the south scattered Jewish merchants and men of influence in their several communties have not scrupled to stand between the Negro and the more bitter and uncompromising prejudices of other white elements. What one of Chicago's leading merchants has done, conspicuously and in the large, on behalf of the neglected educational interests of the Negro, has been practiced in the small, and with less publicity, in countless communities of the south, by less opulent and less powerful members of the Hebrew race. It has passed into a proverb and social formula that the Jew is the Negro's best friend.

An analysis of this tendency and the social sentiments back of it will guide predictions for the future, and will make more clear what are the probable political consequences. No such analysis seems to have been made. It is a promising field for one or another of our publicists directing the discussion of present-day social issues in the magazines. The study would prove exceedingly interesting and fruitful. The laboratory is everywhere that the Jew and the Negro have come together in the United States. This is almost everywhere that the Negro is, for the Jew is there and everywhere else. Few cities or even towns in any state lack at least a few Jewish merchants or tradesmen. Where only two or three of each race are gathered together, often nothing happens. Each goes his own way, holding to the social status into which the prevailing conventions force him; their ways sometimes do not cross. But where they mingle in considerable numbers in the same community their relations are always worthy of study.

The greatest and most instructive laboratory of all is, of course, New York, which is at once the largest Negro and the largest Hebrew city in the world, as it is the largest, or nearly the largest, assemblage of several other races. The incursion of large numbers of Negroes into Chicago precipitated the riots which were the consternation of the whole country and the despair of many citizens of this next-to-the-largest city of the land. There the rapid taking over by the new-comers of a considerable area of what was once a highly desirable residence section of the city, was bitterly resented. It was not merely homeless hoodlums who were responsible for these disorders; they were joined by many who had already been dispossessed, or who were threatened with dispossession, of their homes, by the overwhelming tide of Negro immigration.

More Negroes have crowded into New York; they pour in now in a perpetual stream. A much larger area has been taken over by them. The residences they have appropriated are, on the whole, of as high a grade as those which were seized by the Negroes in Chicago. The colony centered at first in Harlem, and has spread northward until it has dispossessed the white population in acre upon acre of some of the best of New York's apartment houses. They swarm, appropriating whole cars and even trains on important traction lines of the city. All this has aroused much comment from the whites, crowded out of former homes and accustomed routes of travel, and there have been sporadic racial clashes. But nothing has occurred in any way comparable to the race war which rocked Chicago's social scheme. The difference runs deep into the differences between the civilizations of New York and Chicago, but the Jew figures largely in the computation of those differences. To be sure, there are Jews in Chicago, but they are not nearly the determining factor in the city's life which the Jew has long ago become in New York.

There can scarcely be a more interesting and pregnant social situation than that now developing in New York. Irish are still enormously to be reckoned with, and they The Jew increasingly commands the finances of this greatest commercial center of the country and of the world. The Negro is rapidly coming forward with the votes. The have had their racial sensiblities stirred anew by the civil war which it has been found so impossible to suppress on the British Isles. The Irish govern New York city, whether they altogether control it or not. Irish Tammany Hall achieved the greatest victory of its history at the latest municipal election. Tammany does not antagonize either the Negro or the Jew. Its political "principles" render that impossible, and will continue to do so, so long as there are Negro and Jewish votes to be cast and counted. For the present at least, there are profound social bonds which unite the Irish with both of these powerful races of New York. The alliance is likely to hold and grow stronger for some little time. The ethnological affinities of the Irish with older populations of the city are not likely to assert themselves against this sentimental alliance with other "oppressed" races, until after both the Negro and the Jew have been helped by them to far more power than they now possess.

New York is in the way of being "lost" to Anglo-Saxon and even to Nordic civilization. Whatever it is henceforth to be, will be by the grace and through the genius of racial groups which know little of and care less for the pride of Nordic civilization, except to keep it constantly under the eye of suspicion and to check its assumptions wherever they become too obnoxious.

There is no more graphic demonstration than this of the passing of the old religious distinctions. Here is a civilization already dominated by a growing political and social alliance between the Jew, who is rapidly sloughing off his age-long religious forms, and dropping also his religious intolerance, so far as the prejudices of his opposers will permit him to do so, and the Negro, who has no original religious traditions which he has cared or been able to preserve, and whose borrowed religious forms are undergoing even more profound changes than are their prototypes in the white civilization around him. At present a powerful third partner is the Irishman, who carries his religion hot and fiery, but which in form and motive and influence is profoundly disharmonious with the religious ideals of either of the other races. Manifestly this partnership has no basis in ecclesiastical religion. Whatever religious sanction it gets, or will get, as it develops into greater solidarity and power, will be absolutely divorced from the ecclesiastical considerations which our civilization has so far given determining influence.

With Anglo-Saxon power thus menaced, only those who can think of civilization in terms of humanity will view these conditions and tendencies with equanimity. To such, however, New York is the most significant social laboratory in the world, in addition to being all those other superlatives with which we are more familiar. Here is a young, raw, traditionally unfettered race, representative of one of the three principal branches of the human family, under the unrestricted, or less and less restricted, tutelage of the oldest race which has held its own in western civilization, the two jointly being already in command of at least the balance of power in the richest and otherwise most influential center of population in the world.

One need only be a casual visitor to our great cities to note how the Negro is improving in care of his person, in personal and racial self-respect, in consciousness of his political power, and in material estate, under this regimen. He is already in a position to reward those who are giving him his present chance in New York, and the day is not distant when, if he chooses, and discovers the genius to practice the historic arts of racial solidarity, he can seize, if they cannot be acquired otherwise, social prerogatives which American society has persistently refused him. His progress in the nicer arts of civilization is not so reassuring. The residence region which he has appropriated is degenerating, in portions tragically and fatally degenerating. The habits which have made his shiftlessness a byword throughout the south, have not been sloughed off at once, and he is having things so completely his own way throughout his colony that only the most powerful resistance on the part of his own more self-respecting and enlightened leaders can save him from creating new slums in a city whose history is already sufficiently replete with the greed of the landlord and the sottishness of the tenant. But there is nowhere a higher type of Negro than that developing in New York and Chicago. If he were not immune against many of the diseases and malignant social influences which inhere in the slum, the race would never have survived and thrived as it has. Removed, even measurably, from these hamperings, it is to be expected that his progress will be phenomenal, as, indeed, it is already proving not only in these two outstanding cities, but in most northern centers large enough for racial groups to assume mass consciousness.

In New York, it is not likely that either the Jew or the Irish will be parties to racial outbreaks against the Negro. Time has so far tested this, that New York is recognized as the Negroes' Mecca, the New Jerusalem which the Jew is found to be well disposed to share on something like equal terms, and the demesne of a Tammany to whom subservient votes are the guarantee of the fullest favor. Even though the time may come ere long when the Irish will discover and follow racial affinities which will align them with other groups, it will then be quite too late to check seriously the dominance of this partnership which is already so potent. To cry out pettishly against this development, or to appeal to force in attempted resistance, would be entirely unworthy of any one who thinks in universal human terms. This category includes both the Christian and the broad-minded social scientist of whatever faith. Nobody can do anything about what is happening, except as he helps to bring to bear the graces of the spirit. The unecclesiasticized Christian and the human-minded social scientist see the farthest-reaching significance in such inexorable tendencies of our civilization.

Dr. Jefferson in Great Britain

THE memorable visit of Dr. Charles E. Jefferson to the British Isles has come to an end. Many of its aspects have a concern which reach beyond his own church and denomination. Indeed it is a matter of congratulation both for Britain and America that in these difficult days this unofficial ambassador has met his responsibilities and his opportunities in such a notable and successful fashion. Dr. Jefferson was for a number of weeks the occupant of the pulpit of the City Temple in London whose own eloquent minister was preaching in the Broadway Tabernacle in New York. His first sermon was preached in this church of worldwide renown on May seventh and his last sermon on June twenty-fifth. Dr. Jefferson preached in the cathedral in Glasgow, in St. Giles Cathedral, and in St. George's United Free church in Edinburgh. He spoke in Carr's Lane in Birmingham and in Union chapel and Albert Hall in Manchester. He delivered the colonial missionary sermon and the sermon for the London Baptist association. He gave important educational addresses and was the guest of honor at distinguished luncheons and dinners. We need not speak here of his sermon in the cathedral at Copenhagen in connection with the meeting of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches, which was given to our readers in last week's issue of The Christian Century. Everywhere he was received with notable evidences of esteem and everywhere he left behind him the sense of the presence of a highly equipped mind and a warm and sympathetic heart. He spoke frankly of great problems always with a disarming friendliness, and in a curiously happy fashion he appeared to be at home everywhere as if he had really returned to a fireside whose ways and words he knew and loved. There is an unusual simplicity about the utterances of Dr. Jefferson but the simplicity of phrase and paragraph does not disguise the close application and the long continued thought which lie back of these clear and human utterances. Years of reading and years of meditation have worked themselves into this habit of speech strong with the simple clarity of a powerful mind.

Dr. Jefferson always spoke with a deep sense of responsibility, and if a great company of his own countrymen had been listening they would have felt that he was loyal to their own life and traditions as well as singularly gracious in his approach to the British mind. Perhaps one of the most unusual aspects of his work in Britain was just the personal affection which he aroused. "We all love him," declared a brilliant English journalist in speaking of the impact of his personality upon English life. In all quarters he is spoken of with a little accent of personal regard which tells its own story. His bright and half-whimsical mirth delighted his English hearers. They felt that he treated them with that intimate comradeship which is a speaker's most friendly tribute to those who listen to him.

In both Anglican and Free church circles the influence of this able American was felt. And everywhere his touch was irenic and full of that quality of grace and manly heartiness which does so much to draw two nations together when they are worthily represented. Dr. Jefferson himself was deeply impressed by the type of mind he found in England and he will no doubt do large service in the interpretation of England to America even as he has so effectively interpreted America in England.

The road between English and American hearts was not easily open this summer. All the more it was a happy thing that so wise and sincere a citizen of the whole English-speaking world should have represented us in the great pulpits of England and Scotland. Such a voice as his will always be given affectionate welcome in the British Isles. He speaks from the deep places where the purposes of the English-speaking peoples are one. He returns to us not one whit less an American because he has been so much at home in the mother-land of the peoples who speak the good old English tongue.

The Greater Work

CHRISTIANITY contemplates an enlarging, unfolding life. No statement is more germane to the Christian idea of life than Jesus' words, "Greater works than these shall ye do." The principle grows out of the system itself, and the utterance of the first exemplar is eternally reiterated. No principle is more fundamental. It lies embedded in the conception of the Christian life. A life run out to eighty is greater than a life cut short at thirty. It shows greater capacity for redemption.

There are tremendous experiences in the life of fifty or sixty years which the life of thirty-three cannot by any physical or spiritual possibility know. There are tests to which the short life is necessarily a stranger. It is often mentioned as the glory of modern Christian civilization that it is lengthening the average span of life. In the last two generations this extension has perhaps amounted to a full decade. Think what a man or a woman of forty-three can experience, must experience if he or she really lives a life which the individual, no matter of what sanctity of character or majesty of purpose, is incapable of realizing a decade earlier. Or rather, you cannot think or conceive of it, unless you have actually lived through those ten years. And each additional decade, or fraction of a decade, which the exceptional life may compass, unfolds its unique experiences, and imposes its own greatening obligations.

We are just now suffering from one of the aberrations under which every generation falls which participates in a war. War is exceedingly artificial from the spiritual, as from every other vital point of view. It often packs a whole existence into a few years, a few days, or even a few hours. Life seems vivid because of this concentration of values. But in the full definition, such a life is relatively barren. It is impossible to pack life in such small compass, and express its greatest values. Alexander died in his early thirties, having, as we carelessly say, conquered the world. Conquered the world! How ridiculous the phrase is in the reckonings of an older and better age! No man has made even the conquest of his own life at thirty, not to speak of the rest of the world. The Christian idea does not expect it. It looks for greater works, as life unfolds. It is an eminently Christian thing to extend the span of human existence, as modern science has done. It enlarges the capacity of men and women to be Christian.

One of the popular novels of less than a generation ago opens at five o'clock one afternoon, and closes at about two o'clock the following morning. And it is a bulky volume, quite the size and length of the standard novel. What an amazingly artificial piece of work! It records only the yeasty, feverish love adventures of a girl and a boy at a king's court. How little they knew then or could know, however closely those hours may have been packed with adventure, of life's realities! Just because love is the greatest thing in the world, the attempt to exhaust its expression within the hours of five p. m. to two a. m. must leave it barren and cheap.

One of the greatest words in literature is that about youth's showing but half, the latter half being that for which the first was made, and which bids us trust God, see all, nor be afraid. Nor, be afraid! That is the greatest word of them all. How much easier it is, what scant reserves of courage are needed, to dash in upon a scene of hot strife, strike the blow, take the blow, go down in one quick moment and be wafted forthwith to glory! Therein lies the pernicious spiritual aberration of war. The delusion that such is glory. An immeasurably greater work is to endure to the end, to fulfill all of life's functions, to see all, not merely the flash of a moment, however lurid, but to see all, NOR BE AFRAID!

The writer was once sitting next a physician of near three score and ten, at the speaker's table, looking out over a great assemblage of men in a banquet. The majority were in the neighborhood of forty. In a callow enthusiasm possible only to his youth he remarked upon the impressive spectacle of so goodly a company of the vital forces of their city, each of whom had faced the tests of character and had achieved the security of virtue which forty guarantees. The seasoned student of human bodies and human spirits looked about in a sort of helpless amazement, and gently declared that youth knew nothing of the severer tests of the rugged forties, and of the years following, each of which applies its tests with an insistence commensurate with its greatening glory.

The greatest work of all is a life, a full life, which in its fullest fullness is always a long life.

The Birds and the Windows

A Parable of Safed the Sage

NOW I know not whence they came from, but this I know, that at night I closed my Study and fastened the Windows and locked the Door, and I went my way. And if there were Birds within, I knew it not, nor how they could have gotten in without my knowledge. And in the morning, when I came and opened the Door, a pair of little Birds was within my Study, one at a Window on the Side and one at a Window at the End.

And I said, Did some Magician produce you out of an Hat? Or hath Noah sailed by in his Ark and sent you out instead of Doves. And came ye in through the Roof or up through the Floor?

And they answered me not, for they were frightened. And they flew at the Windows, and the Windows smote them that the Birds fell to the Floor.

And I said, These Birds are Up Against a New Discovery. Hitherto, where there hath been Light, there hath been also Free and Clear Space; and now they see Light, and fly toward it, and behold, they hit something hard as a Flint.

And it seemed to them that all the Laws of Nature had gone back on them.

And I thought of those men who trust to their Experience, and those who trust to established Methods, and who suddenly reach a Point where the Experience of the Past doth prove Inadequate, and who know not what hath hit them nor which way to turn.

Yes, I thought of those who put their trust in God, and who suddenly Collide with a New Adventure that leaveth them Breathless on the Floor, with their flight hindered by something they know not what.

And I said, Little Birds, I could deliver unto you a Learned Lecture on the Science of Opticks, and on the degree to which certain Minerals including Glass may be made Translucent, but I infer that just now you may be more interested in getting out of here.

So I opened one Window at the Top and the other at the Bottom, and I moved about the Room at the other end. And it was not very long before they found the way out. And they sat them upon a tree, and looked back, and they wasted no time trying to explain Mysteries that were too Wonderful for them. And I counted this for good sense.

Blind Guides

AND who are these poor souls who in your name
Malign your spirit with their raucous cries?
They laud their loyalty unto the skies
And hide their hate within your sacred fame.
If these are yours, O Spirit without guile—
These selfish souls who by their narrow creed
Would bind a world, who with a hallowed greed
Would bar from heaven their foes—how reconcile
Their petty notions with those words of grace
Divinely uttered, by the shining sea?
You glimpsed the earth from little Galilee;
You loved all men, although a Jew by race.
Yet these blind guides—your followers, forsooth!—
Would judge the nations by their garbled truth.

The Death of Summer

NOW fair Summer's streaming silver
Yields to Autumn's haze of gold;
Summer hours like sheep are driven
Back again to Nature's fold.
Dimmer grows the Old Year's vision,
Shortened is his vital breath;
All the earth, with hues funereal,
Tells of queenly Summer's death.
Lo! the shadows longer fall,
And a hush is over all.

From her brimming horn of plenty
Autumn soon shall pour her hoard;
Then in cellars, ready waiting,
All with gladness shall be stored,
There to wait the hungry winter,
When the chilling wind shall blow,
And the kettle's cheery singing
Shall drive back the ice and snow.
Then to summer shall we bring
Grateful hearts' glad offering.

The Future of the Methodists

By Ernest F. Tittle

IN attempting to discover what part, if any, Methodism is destined to play in the future of organized Christianity, I have put to myself two questions, simple enough to state, difficult enough to answer: What in Methodism today points to its usefulness tomorrow? What in Methodism today threatens its usefulness tomorrow? In the endeavor to find an answer to these questions I shall, inevitably, betray my own bias; and what other Methodists may think of my conclusions is (for me) the subject of interesting speculation.

I

What in Methodism today points to its usefulness tomorrow?

1. Methodism has revealed a rather extraordinary capacity to adapt its institutional life to practical needs. Wesley himself once explained the ecclesiastical development of Methodism by saying that "everything arose just as the occasion required." The class-meeting, the use of laymen as class-leaders and preachers, the celebration of the sacrament in unconsecrated buildings, the ordination of clerical helpers, the gathering together of preachers in annual conferences, the formation of the "Legal Hundred"—all "arose as occasion required."

This adaptation of ecclesiastical machinery to practical need was made possible by the fact that, in the thought of Wesley and his followers, a church was not an institution which must be built in accordance with a divine pattern once delivered to the saints, but an institution which might and should be fashioned in accordance with the insistent demands of a developing human experience.

Methodism still seems able to form and reform its institutional life in accordance with unfolding needs. It has admitted laymen, on equal terms, into its governing body, the general conference, and will, no doubt, in response to a growing demand, admit them into its annual conferences. It has, likewise, given women a voice in its governing body; and at the last session of the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church women were licensed to preach. The "time limit" restricting the term of pastoral service has been repeatedly varied and finally removed in recognition of the need, under modern conditions, of a greater degree of continuity. Even bishops are not as itinerant as they used to be. They are now assigned to given areas for at least a four-year period; and although in some cases it has been found difficult to curb a roving disposition, a leadership at once more responsible and more efficient is resulting from this new arrangement.

THE EPISCOPACY

To the outsider it may appear that at least one point in Methodism has remained as immovable as the Rock of Gibraltar, even in the face of a veritable tidal wave of popular sentiment. The institution of the episcopacy, with its great and strange "appointing power," may seem to reduce to an absurdity the claim that Methodism is able to adjust its machinery to changing conditions. For, although political autocracy has had a bad fall, and all the king's horses and all the king's men do not appear able to put it together again, ecclesiastical autocracy still sits securely upon the Methodist wall!

But does it? In appearance, yes; in reality, no. Some years ago, at an annual conference, just before the "appointments" were to be read, a certain bishop requested the members of his cabinent to leave him alone for a few minutes with the Lord. And when, a little later, the "appointments" were read, the cabinent decided that it was a mistake to leave a bishop alone with the Lord. Today, there is little danger of any such mistake being made.

Theoretically a bishop has power to appoint any preacher to any church with or without the consent of his cabinet, the preacher in question, or the church in question. But it would be a very bold bishop indeed who would dare to exercise this power in an arbitrary fashion; for in recent years, once and again such exercise of power has resulted in the forcible retirement of the offending bishop. As a matter of fact, the larger churches of Methodism now select their own pastors, using the bishop merely as an intermediary agent. Even the smaller churches are usually able to "get the man they want," provided only that the man himself is willing to be gotten, and the interests of the church which he is now serving can be protected.*

POTENTIAL AUTOCRACY

The potential autocracy of the Methodist system is, today, more likely to become actual in the case of the district superintendents, on whose judgment in respect to the smaller churches in his area the bishop is bound, more or less, to rely. These district superintendents are now appointed by the bishop. But in both the northern and southern branches of Methodism there is a very considerable demand that district superintendents shall be elected by the conferences which they are to serve. If not in this way, almost certainly in some way, a check will be placed upon the possible misuse of their authority.

The collapse of the Interchurch World Movement has robbed autocracy of its sting in another quarter—those secretarial boards who showed a tendency to forget that "taxation without representation" is distasteful to the American people.

Methodism is an autocracy only in appearance. In practice its "autocrats" become, for the most part, merely the servants of the church. And up to this present hour the system, on the whole, seems to have justified its existence. Churches are not left without pastors. Pastors are not left without churches. A strong, closely knit "connectionalism" makes possible the mobilization of vast resources, both material and spiritual, for work at home and abroad. But if, in coming days, it shall appear that a certain amount of decentralization is desirable, one who is acquainted with Methodism's readjustments in the past can only believe that still further readjustments will be made "as the occasion requires."

*In the Methodist Episcopal church, south, the bishops have far more power. They can even veto the action of the general conference! In practice, also, they are often more arbitrary in the exercise of power. And this situation, no less perhaps than the situation in respect to the Negro, militates against the reunion of the northern and southern branches of Methodism.

2. Methodism was born, not of institutionalism, nor of ritualism, nor of intellectualism, but of a vital personal experience of spiritual reality. There is, therefore, in essential Methodism, a certain confident and joyous freedom in respect to ecclesiastical organization and rite and dogma. In essential Methodism, I say, for essential Methodism and historic Methodism have not always been one and the same. Methodists even now do not everywhere nor always appreciate the significance of the essential Methodist position. But if they did, they could say: Whether there be forms of church organization, they shall be done away; whether there be rites and ceremonies, they shall cease; whether there be dogmatic creedal statements, they (perhaps) shall be done away; with men did they come and with men they may go. But religion is not a church; it is not a rite; it is not a creed. Religion, in the words of John Wesley, is "the life of God in the souls of men"; and that abides, irrespective of the fate of any ecclesiastical, ritualistic, or intellectual body in which for a time it may have found lodgment.

AUTHORITY IN RELIGION

The strength of the essential Methodist position becomes evident when one considers the present situation in respect of authority in religion. The long quest for some objective, infallible religious authority has ended in failure. Men first ventured to believe that the judgments of the first six Christian centuries were true and righteous altogether. But now, even the Roman church recognizes the extreme difficulty of harmonizing an unchanging and infallible tradition with a growing mind and a growing world, and is taking the position that while the testimony of the first six centuries is, beyond doubt, an infallible testimony, it does, of course, need to be interpreted, and may be interpreted in accordance with the intellectual, not to mention the political, exigencies of these times. Thus Rome has made it possible for her to keep sufficiently up-to-date to retain some sort of hold upon the confidence and affections of mankind. But she has, in so doing, substituted the judgments of living men for the voice of an ancient tradition—and nullified her own most stubborn contention that an objective, infallible authority exists.

For an infallible tradition Protestantism substituted an infallible Bible. But, leaving the question of inspiration entirely aside, surely it is apparent to every fair-minded observer that the most thoroughgoing bibliolaters find in the Bible what they want to find in it, just as the Roman College find in the tradition of the first six centuries what they want to find in it. In both cases the claim to possess an objective, infallible religious authority is nullified by the introduction of a subjective method of interpretation.

More recently, men have claimed an objective, infallible authority in the historic Jesus. But, alas, their lives have belied their words. The very people who are ready, on the one hand, to ascribe infallibility to Jesus, are, on the other hand, just as ready to insist that when it comes to certain specific sayings, such as, "Resist not the evil man," and "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth," Jesus need not, and ought not, to be taken too seriously!

AUTHORITY OF JESUS

Very great indeed, today, is the authority of Jesus. Slowly but surely the world is opening its eyes to the fact that what is ethically un-christian is economically unsound and politically unsafe. But—to paraphrase a statement recently made by Kirsopp Lake—if men believe, as many of them are beginning to do, what Jesus said, it is because what Jesus said is being verified by the accumulating experience of the race, and not merely because Jesus said it. Or, to state the converse of this proposition, if what Jesus said was not being verified by the accumulating experience of the race, men would not believe it merely because Jesus said it.

And what is true of the authority of Jesus is true, likewise, of the authority of the Bible and of the authority of the church. If certain teachings of the Bible, certain pronouncements of the church, are being accepted today, it is not merely because they are found in the Bible, or because they have been uttered by the church, but only because human experience is showing more and more clearly that they are true. That is to say, the court of last resort, the final authority to which appeal is made, is not any institution, however venerable, nor any book, however wonderful, nor any individual, however unique, but, rather, the accumulating experience of the race.

Now, Methodism seems to have been born for such an hour as this; provided that its present-day adherents have the faith and courage to accept its essential position, its primitive confidence in the reality and significance of spiritual phenomena. In the early days, Methodism depended for its evangelizing power, not upon any kind of external authority, but only upon the "witness of the spirit" proving itself in transformed lives. And if Methodism, true to its spiritual heritage, is willing to trust the "inner light," and to rely upon the testimony of the Christian consciousness, the living experience of transformed lives, it can face the future unafraid. It can place itself confidently and joyously in the way of progress, expecting prophetic messengers to come from the tents of the eternal, and ready to listen to them when they arrive. It can, perhaps, make a real contribution to the universal Christian church by pointing out the true seat of religious authority—the accumulating spiritual experience of the race.

LEARNING

3. In its emphasis upon the "witness of the spirit," and its "vindication of the spiritual rights of the uneducated against the pretensions of mere learning," Methodism has always been in danger of developing a contempt for learning. In fact, it has not always escaped this danger. Garrett Biblical institute was so named because, in the day when it was founded, it would have been tempting Providence—or the devil?—to call it a theological school! But Methodism has never been quite able to forget that its founder was a graduate of Oxford and a Fellow of Lincoln. And Wesley's own heroic attempt to provide the uneducated among his followers not only with religious literature, but with tracts and pamphlets on all sorts of subjects, has helped to counteract a tendency to depreciate learning which otherwise would almost certainly have developed.

The problem of securing a trained ministry for the pioneer work to which Methodism has given itself has always been, and is still, a very serious one. But a really determined attempt is now being made to solve it. In the Methodist Episcopal church, a special educational commission has been created. This commission has provided a four years' course of study for all candidates who have not had seminary training, and is now establishing summer schools at which attendance on the part of such candidates will be compulsory.

Even more significant, perhaps, is the new emphasis upon religious education. In common with other evangelical churches, Methodism has, until recently, proceeded on the assumption that if only men could be persuaded, in some intellectual or emotional sense, to "accept Christ," all would be well. But all has not been well. In a world where millions of people, in this intellectual or emotional sense, had "accepted Christ," the slaughter of Verdun was possible, and the peace of Versailles! Bitter experience has shown that exhortation is not enough. Exhortation without instruction has proved to be as futile a thing as faith without works. It is not enough to exhort men to "come to Jesus." They must be told, or at least helped to discover, what it means to be a Christian under modern conditions. Evangelism must be supplemented by education. Methodism is beginning to recognize this all-important fact, and through its developing programs of religious education gives promise of making a really significant contribution to the thought and life of tomorrow.

CHURCH OF THE PEOPLE

4. Methodism, historically speaking, has been "the church of the people." Wesley might have said to his converts as St. Paul said to his, "Behold your calling, brethren, that not many wise after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called." No, Methodism found its first adherents among the poor of London, and the colliers of Kingswood whose tears left "white gutters in their black cheeks." And, with a few conspicuous exceptions, Methodism has remained the church of the people.

One effect of its early interest in all sorts and conditions of men is somewhat curiously indicated in a letter written by the Duchess of Buckingham to the Countess of Huntingdon: "I thank your ladyship for the information concerning the Methodist preaching; their doctrines are most repulsive, and strongly tinctured with impertinence and disrespect toward their superiors, in perpetually endeavoring to level all ranks and to do away with all distinctions, as it is monstrous to be told that you have a heart as sinful as the common wretches that crawl on the earth. This is highly offensive and insulting."

It was, indeed, to persons of the type of the Duchess of Buckingham—as "offensive and insulting" as to many persons now appears the statement of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal church, issued in 1918, which appeals for "the application of democracy to industry"; and for "an equitable wage for laborers which shall have the right of way over rent, interest, and profit"; and for "collective bargaining as an instrument for the attainment of industrial justice and for training in democratic procedure"; and for the "advance of the workers themselves through profit sharing and through positions on boards of directorship."

But Methodism's conception of the divine solicitude for every son of man made it impossible for Methodists to stop at the initial attempt to "save the souls" of grimy colliers, or even at Wesley's own brave attempt to minister to men's total welfare through loan agencies, free medical dispensaries, and free employment bureaus. Animated by the same conviction, modern Methodists have felt constrained to examine the foundations of the social structure; to ask themselves: Does society, as it is now organized, represent the will of the heavenly Father for all his human children; and to appeal for such a reconstruction of the entire social system as will make it possible for the will of God to be done on earth as it is done in heaven. If Methodism continues to make this appeal, and learns how to make it more effectively by basing it upon a larger and more intimate knowledge of the facts of modern social organization, it cannot but make a valuable contribution to the kingdom of God on earth.

II

But there are, in Methodism, certain other tendencies that are far from promising.

1. A tendency toward legalism is evident in the curious legislation concerning amusements. If only Methodism had been content to abide by Wesley's sane admonition against "the taking of such diversions as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus!" That was a statement of principle which the Christian conscience could be urged to apply under changing conditions. But no! A later generation felt the need of being specific; and now the Discipline of the church contains this startling paragraph:

"In cases of neglect of duties of any kind; imprudent conduct; indulging sinful tempers or words; dancing; playing at games of chance; attending theatres, horse-races, circuses, dancing parties, or patronizing dancing schools, or taking such other amusements as are obviously of misleading or questionable moral tendency; or disobedience to the order and Discipline of the church, on the first offense, let private reproof be given by the pastor or class-leader, and if there be an acknowledgment of the fault and proper humilation, the person may be borne with. On the second offense, the pastor or class-leader may take with him one or two discreet members of the church. On the third offense let him be brought to trial, and if found guilty and there be no sign of real humiliation, he shall be expelled."

At several successive general conferences attempts have been made to substitute exhortation for legislation in respect to this whole matter. But in spite of the fact that the law laid down in the above paragraph is as unenforceable as the law of Kansas which provides that three days each year every male adult shall fight grasshoppers, the church has lacked the courage to repeal it. It remains today as a stumbling block to the conscientious, and a moral peril to the legalist and the casuist. For the Discipline does not specify bull-fights, cock-fights, or Theda Bara movies.

INTELLECTUALISM

2. A tendency, also, toward a hard and barren intellectualism is evident in the creedal list of church membership. To persons desiring to enter the church "in full connection" is put the question, "Do you believe in the doctrines of the holy scriptures as set forth in the articles of religion of the Methodist Episcopal church?"

This question was inserted in the ritual of the church by the general conference of 1864. It appears, on the face of it, to be contrary to the position taken by Wesley and set forth in the general rules of the church: "There is only one condition previously required of those who desire admission into these societies—'a desire to flee from the wrath to come, and to be saved from their sins.'" And, at the last general conference, the judiciary committee reported that, in the judgment of a majority of the committee, the doctrinal test was in violation of the constitution of the church. By the conference, this majority report of the judiciary committee was first adopted, then reconsidered, and finally rejected.

There is, undeniably, on the part of many present-day Methodists, a timid unwillingness to recognize the validity of any merely moral or spiritual test of church membership. Their fear of heterodoxy is, apparently, greater than their concern for spiritual vision and moral purpose. And the real tragedy of the doctrinal test lies not in the fact that it may turn out to be "unconstitutional," but, rather, in the fact that it misses the really significant Christian demand—and the supreme demand of the world in this hour. A man may meet successfully this doctrinal test without any change in his spirit, in his attitude toward his fellows, in the program of his life!

SPIRITUAL COURAGE

3. What has just been said indicates a tendency, also, to distrust the guidance of the "inner light," to refuse to rely upon "the witness of the spirit," even when it is reinforced by the total Christian consciousness, and to fall back upon some kind of external authority. Physical courage seems to be the common possession of the race. But spiritual courage—how rare and faltering it is! One of the restrictions placed upon the power of the general conference is that it "shall not revoke, alter, nor change our articles of religion, nor establish any new standards or rules of doctrine contrary to our present existing and established standards of doctrine." Walter Rauschenbusch remarked that these Methodist articles of religion "seem to have the better of the starry universe." They certainly seem to have the better of most human institutions in a changing world.

This restriction placed upon the power of the general conference is but a symptom of a tendency that has, no doubt, been in Methodism from the beginning. Born though it was of an immediate personal experience of spiritual reality, Methodism has never been quite able to shake itself free from the bondage of external authority. And today, in some quarters, this bondage is painfully evident. Not long ago, a Methodist minister said in my hearing, "There are those who claim that they are seeking after truth. I am not. I have the truth." Truth, for him, is identical with the articles of religion of the Methodist Episcopal church. This minister also declared, "It ought to be so that the same doctrines, with the same interpretation, were being preached in every pulpit in Methodism." Does it need to be said that if this were so, it would be difficult to say the least, to discover any difference between the Methodist and Roman conception of religious authority?

WORSHIP OF TRADITION

This minister is by no means alone in his position. Methodism, also, has its "fundamentalists" who worship tradition rather than truth. Their presence makes it difficult to say whether Methodism has the future. For the time has passed when ecclesiasticism might identify truth with tradition and say to men, "As the fathers believed so must the sons believe throughout all generations." To the modern mind there is thrilling significance in those words of Jesus, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." That is the growing conviction of men of faith the wide world over. Truth was revealed to the fathers, but not all truth. There are, it may be, whole continents of truth that lie yet beyond our human ken. But the spirit of the living God is leading us on. Cry shame to him who fears to follow!

In the day that is now breaking, men will find it difficult not to despise the accredited representatives of religion if they persist in asking not, What is true? but only, What is safe? Not, perhaps, without regret, they will turn away from the official leaders of religion, and, in their doubts and perplexities, look for guidance to more daring souls who do not fear change, but only the deadliness of standing still in a world that is moving on.

4. In Methodism, as in all other religious bodies today, there is a tendency to avoid the social implications of Christianity. Neither in the case of a multitude of individuals, nor in the case of institutions, nor in the case of nations, has Christianity ever fully triumphed. Why? Gilbert Chesterton has said, "Christianity has not been tried and found wanting; it has been found difficult and not tried." This is a part of the truth, but not all of it. It must, in fairness, be said that not until recently have many of the implications of Christianity been discovered. How many of them remain still to be discovered!

Are the professing Christians of this present time willing that the full demand of Christianity should be discovered, and brought to the attention of "waiting congregations?" In Methodism, as in other churches, there are, it appears, many persons whose interest in orthodoxy is far keener than their interest in a better social order. Herein, I suspect, is the real difference between modern churchmen. Differences in respect of creed and rite and ceremony and church organizations still exist. But the deepest of all differences—what is it? Is it not a difference of attitude toward the better world of prophetic dreams? Some believe that a better world is possible; others do not. Some are ready to pay any price in order to secure a diviner civilization; others are determined, at whatever cost, to maintain the existing order. If ecclesiastical organization could start de novo, would it not come to pass that there would soon be two great churches, each calling itself Christian, but thoroughly antipathetic: one, including the champions of the old order in all its aspects; the other, all who look with hope for the coming of a brighter day?

III.

What, then, is the future of Methodism? Has it a future? That depends. If Methodism is given over into the hands of the legalists, the intellectualists, the traditionalists, and defenders of things as they are, its historic justification will have perished.

But if, on the other hand, Methodism dares to break away from the bondage of legalism and of externalism; if it dares to follow the inner light, and to reply upon the testimony of the Christian consciousness, considering earnestly the testimony of the past but refusing to be bound by it; if it dares to believe in the possibility of a better world, and to pay any necessary price to get it; then, Methodism will live on, if not as a separate institution, at least as a quickening, regenerating power in the life of mankind.

Next week Dr. William E. Barton will give an outside view of the Methodists. Dr. Barton is Moderator of the Congregational National Council.

Finding God Where He Finds Us

By Arthur B. Patten

THE immemorial cry of the human soul is voiced by Job, as he exclaims, "O that I knew where I might find Him!" There can be but one answer,—Find God where he finds you. Find him in your sense of need; find him in your sense of duty; and above all, find him in your sentiment of love. In other words, find God in your prayer; find him in your conscience; and find him supremely in your family spirit, filial towards God himself, and fraternal towards all men. This is the experience of mysticism, the immediate intuition of God.

We find God in nature and history as a providence, by our interpretation, but that interpretation is not the mystical experience. As we have seen, mysticism finds God in our own hearts as a presence, by intuition. But while this experience is thus immediate, instinctive, intuitive, it is also intellectual and volitional, since it involves the total reaction of the human spirit to the divine Spirit, working within the human soul itself.

To be sure God is "an inevitable inference" from his providence in nature and history. But we find God in nature and history, because they find God in us. Nature's meaning is revealed through human nature. To repeat, God is vastly more and better than an inevitable inference from without, since he is an immediate intuition by his presence within the soul. Here again Job speaks the great word, "There is a spirit in man, and the breath of the Almighty giveth him knowledge." This is mysticism, but not pantheism, for it honors personality in man as in God. In this divine-human experience, the personal God meets the personal man in the temple of the human life, inspiring prayer, irradiating conscience, and enkindling love. However, let it be remembered that prayer, conscience, and love, under the mystic touch of God, will "abound yet more and more in wisdom and in all discernment." So the true mystic experience is neither fragmentary nor compartmented,—it is rather an experience which renders the whole mind and life incandescent and inspirational. It finds soul-perception as valid as sense-perception, and of infinitely more value. Indeed the soul has its own senses.

I.

FINDING GOD IN OUR SENSE OF NEED

Our deepest need is voiced in our prayer, individual and intercessory. Here surely we find God where he finds us. As Sabatier says, "Religion is prayer; the religious life is a desire, a need." An infidel paper sometime ago remarked editorially, "Never pray, if you can help it." But so long as the finite needs the infinite, man can not help it. He must pray, even if his prayer be only the inarticulate longing of his soul. The evolution of human longing, in its upper ranges, is the life history of religion, reaching its climax in the aspiration and the intercession of the divine man, Christ Jesus. We turn to Prof. William H. Carruth for the latest classical phrasing of this immemorial mysticism:

Like tides on a crescent sea-beach,
  When the moon is new and thin,
Into our hearts high yearnings
  Come welling and surging in.
Come from the mystic ocean,
  Whose rim no foot has trod:
Some of us call it Longing,
  And others call it—God.

It is this very longing that has lifted mankind from savage to saint. And this longing, as we have seen, is not only the deathless quest for God; it is also the sure revelation of God. In his prayer, Pascal hears the inner voice whispering, "Thou wouldst not seek me, hadst thou not already found me." As we see the processional of the divine purpose advancing from chaos to character, in nature and in history, so we see the processional of the divine presence, from brute to brother, in the panorama of human prayer. When Professor George Albert Coe, as a little boy, told his mother that he could not see how God heard and answered his prayers, she replied with the wisdom of a discerning mystic, "May not your very impulse to pray be God's manifestation of himself to you?" This teaching, that the cry of our deeper need is the voice of God, is manifestly a part of the gospel of the Christ who said, "Your Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask him"; "His spirit of truth shall lead you into all truth."

This thought, that our very longing is God's revelation, is most aptly illustrated in a story that comes out of the Near East, and makes pleasant reading in view of the unspeakable tragedies being enacted there today. A sick man, racked with pain, and worn with many weary nights, cries to Allah, till with prayer his heart grows tender, and his soul is composed to trust and to rest. But with a new morning the fair spell is broken, for the old pain and doubt return, and a subtle tempter seems to whisper, "Cry louder! See if Allah ever hear, or answer, 'Here am I' again." His heart is chilled, and his brain is darkened. Then there visits him the devout Elias, asking, "Dost thou loathe thy former fervor; is thy soul of prayer afraid?" But the poor sufferer can only rejoin, "Though I have called so often, I have never heard the 'Here am I' ". It is now that the good Elias is given the sure and saving word, so finely rendered in Thorluck's lyric lines:

"Tell him that his very longing is itself an answering cry;
That his prayer, Come gracious Allah, is my answer, Here am I!
Every inmost aspiration is God's angel undefiled;
And in every O, my Father, slumbers deep a Here, My Child!"

But the sense of need must become altruistic and intercessory, for God would find us supremely in our brotherly interest and in our social yearnings. So the mystic longing must readily rise above self-surrendering prayer, and the mystic aspiration must surpass all self-seeking petition. You can not pray greatly for yourself alone. Great prayer is always a social confession and compassion. In the very same experience in which we cast our own burden upon the Lord, we must bear one another's burdens in deep sympathy, and so fulfil the law of Christ. God cannot find us, and we cannot largely find God in our prayers, if we worship only as personal beggars, and not also as public benefactors.

PRAYER OF PENITENCE

Even the prayer of penitence must be vicarious as well as individual. It must be ready to cry, with Isaiah of old, "I am a man of unclean lips!" but it must cry again, "I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips! for mine eyes have seen the Lord of hosts,—the God of men and nations sinful and needy like myself." Even the prayer of penitence must rise to vision and passion like that of Whitman, as he exclaims: "I see the enslaved of the whole earth; I feel the measureless shame and humiliation of my race; it becomes all mine; mine too the wrongs of ages."

The prayer of need must match in some measure that of the vicarious Christ, and must breathe his yearning consecration, "For their sakes I sanctify myself; that they may be one; that the world may believe; that the world may know." But the one prayer that should be the master prayer of all mystics is the Lord's prayer itself. Here is at once the personal and the public altar at which we find God where He finds us,—in our individual aspiration, and in our social longing. Here is the one standard prayer that fits alike the kindergarten of trustful childhood, the penitential sanctuary of unclean manhood, and the creative kingdom of divine sonship and of human brotherhood.

II.

FINDING GOD IN OUR SENSE OF DUTY

Again we find God where He finds us,—in our sense of duty. The Greek poet Menander has well said, "God is with man by conscience." With apologies to Professor Carruth, let the ensuing lines breathe this thought:

A sense of truth and honor,
And a mandate for the right;
A still small voice of warning,
And a vision of holy light,
Revealing the glory of goodness,
And the shame of hate and fraud:
Some of us call it Conscience,
And others call it—God.

However, if we do not care to pronounce conscience the voice of God himself, we must still recognize that conscience is the oracle of the human spirit in which the voice of God speaks. The mystic who has tuned his prayer to the larger need, will also tune his conscience to the larger duty. When God speaks conviction in his soul, it will be the mandate of social honor as well as of private holiness, it will be the imperative of public morality, as well as of personal morals. It is possible to be conventionally correct in our individual proprieties, and yet not to be creative in the challenging contacts of society, business, and citizenship. The enlightenment of the true mysticism will not only search the soul to find every hidden fault, but it will also scrutinize the account of one's outward stewardship to discern every practical dereliction, and to discover every presumptuous sin. The holy of holies of the modern mystic may at times be found in deep seclusion, but it must also be found in the market-place, in the counting-room, and in the arena of affairs,—"where cross the crowded ways of life." Jesus told Nicodemus that if he were uplifted by the birth from above, it would be only that he might get a bigger vision, and so better see the kingdom of God on earth. The one final test of a reborn conscience is just this social vision. Nicodemus was evidently a conventionally correct and a charmingly companionable fellow,—but he had not greatly seen the kingdom of God. The mystic conscience must yet give us a new code for business and a new covenant for politics, national and international. When the new mysticism demands such a new repentance, and such a new obedience, then the path of the just will be a shining light; "then," in the majestical phrase of Christ, "shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their father." There can be no majesty to our mysticism until it illuminates the world where men live; there can be no kingliness to conscience until it dictates terms to all human affairs; there can be no social sainthood until men put daylight above dividends. A real, vital mysticism will give us the passion of a crusading sincerity. We can never find God supremely until we find our way with him into the supreme paths of justice, and honor, and duty on the map of the world's work. We have seen too much of mysticism in retreat; we have seen not a little of mysticism marking time; now let us see mysticism on the march, with the chivalry of conscience.

III.

FINDING GOD IN OUR SENTIMENT OF LOVE

Let me repeat: we find God supremely in our family spirit, filial towards God himself, and fraternal towards all men. The real mystic can be graciously at home with God only as he shares that home with his brothers. All love is of a piece. Worshiping love and ministering love should never be partitioned, but should blend in one experience. Pious love of God and practical love of men can never function completely or strongly alone. The new mysticism must not only love God, but it must love with God, and like God. Medieval mysticism sought to experience God mainly in mutual admiration and snug reciprocity. The new mysticism seeks to love God no less endearingly and adoringly, but it essays to find him supremely by joining him in his crusading good will towards men. "God so loved the world that he gave." And God still so loves the world that he gives. We meet and know God superlatively when we meet and know him in self-giving love. They are not the loveliest children who are always cuddling about their parents. The loveliest children are those who share with their parents all the ministering love of the home. So the loveliest children to the great heart of God are not those who seek mainly to be his precious pets, but those who seek to please him perfectly in all the attention and thoughtfulness that render his earthly family gracious and strong. Do we not hear God the father speaking through Christ the son, "If ye love me, feed my lambs, tend my sheep"? If we heed Christ, we shall socialize our mysticism.

However, we have the right to know that if we love anybody, it is only because God first loved us. So writes John, the beloved disciple: "We know the love which God hath in us; God is love; and he that abideth in love abideth in God, and God abideth in him." To be sure John might as truly have said, "He that abideth in God abideth in love." But he turned the truth about, and told us that all human love is a revelation of the eternal love of God and a rich experience of his grace. He who loves at all, to that extent, knows God,—and he ought to know that he knows God. A nurse was building a fire in the rear of the rifle-pits of a fighting regiment, and preparing to serve hot drinks and food to the wounded, when an officer passing by asked, "Who told you to build those fires?" She answered true, "God Almighty, sir." Hers was the only right interpretation. She was a devout mystic. She found God where he found her—in her ministering sentiment of love. She knew God; and, fortunately, she also knew that she knew Him. The fire on her mystic altar was doubly pleasing to God, because she worshipped where she worked. And her deed must have warmed the heart of the Christ who said, "If ye love me, keep my commandments."

REAL JOY

The real joy of the mystic experience can never come to those who seek to find God while escaping human responsibility, but rather to those who truly find him by espousing their duty in love. The psalmist has put this thought in classic phrase, "Because thou hast loved righteousness, and hated iniquity, therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." So the real mystic will live a tonic life among men, and the peace that God leaves with him will be the exhilaration of good will.

Then the love in which God is revealed is not only a kindly love, but a kindling love. We love others best not so much by cherishing them as by challenging them. If we would have creative mysticism, we must have creative love. We must love people unto life. "The love that leads life upward is the noblest and the best." There is scant profit in giving others lavishing love, unless it is also lifting love. Coddling love can make only mollycoddles in return. Love must discover and requisition personality in others, and help kindle into a flame the gift of God that is in them. We must be noble in love, and then "the nobleness that lives in other men, sleeping, but never dead, will rise in majesty to meet our own."

The master thought is this: God is a loving presence in men and among men, and all the resources of love in the world have their final source in him. With him is the fountain of life, and in his love-light we see light. All the urgency of love in our souls is the unction of his spirit, and yet, when it passes through the alembic of our experience, it becomes our own. So we discover what God reveals when we feel his divinity shaping our ends in and through the dynamic of our love. And again this is personalism, and not pantheism. We may give it lyric utterance by adding another stanza to the poem already cited:

> A heart of deep compassion,
> Attuned to others' needs,
> A spirit of cheer and challenge,
> And a witness of golden deeds,
> With a charm of kindling manhood,
> Like the grace of Christ the Lord:
> Some call it Lovingkindness,
> And others call it—God.

The Guide

By Arthur B. Rhinow

I—The road is winding, and the oaks are full of mystery.

MYSELF—Am I losing the way?

I—How can you? The guide-posts are bright and distinct.

MYSELF—I am a pilgrim in a strange country.

I—Others have traveled the same road. Look at the footprints.

MYSELF—The same road; but my path is different from all others.

I—Different?

MYSELF—Yes; some time I shall see no footprints.

I—When it grows dark?

MYSELF—When I am alone.

I—And the guide-posts?

MYSELF—They are for all; but not for me.

I—No footprints, and no guide-posts? What do you want?

MYSELF—I want the Guide.

Anti-Labor Propaganda

WHEN the Interchurch committee which investigated the steel strike came to make up its report on the attitude of the Pittsburgh pulpit toward the strike and the strikers, it concluded that, with a few exceptions, the pulpit had said little or nothing and that it could say but little because it had no adequate information. Of course it could preach then and at all other times the Christian fundamentals, and vigorous preaching of them would render impossible in the course of time, such use of the twelve-hour day and seven-day week as the steel companies were making, but that preachment did not need to wait upon the strike. So far as the strike itself was concerned, however, the preachers of Allegheny county had to depend upon the daily press for their information, which meant a bias in direct ratio to their dependence. With a single exception the daily press was the chief medium of war propaganda for the employers. Readers will recall that with some 350,000 men on strike one paper reported the total who returned to work as 2,800,000. Daily reports of the return of large numbers was a part of the propaganda for breaking strike morale.

Headline Bias

Another illustration of how a certain type of daily journal "edits" news and especially headlines with bias may be illustrated by the Cincinnati Enquirer, when it printed Chapter xxxiii of Joseph Tumulty's book on Woodrow Wilson and his administration. The headlines ran as follows: "Appeals of Wilson Ignored As Rail Strike Loomed—Mediation Scorned by Captains of Labor." The writer then described how day after day with utmost patience the president conferred with and sought to persuade first one side, then the other. In bold print the editor put the following words of the President about the labor leaders: "I was shocked to find a peculiar stiffness and hardness about these men. When I pictured to them the distress of our people in case this strike became a reality, they sat unmoved and apparently indifferent to the seriousness of the whole bad business. I am at the end of my tether, and I do not know what further to do."

His words preceding this quotation however were put into small print. They make no little difference in the impression given. They were as follows: "I was not able to make the slightest impression upon these men. They feel so strongly the justice of their cause that they are blind to all the consequences of their action in declaring and prosecuting a strike."

The following account of the employers was also put into small print: "His conferences with the managers were equally unproductive of result. Gathered about him in a semicircle in his office, they were grim and determined men, some of them even resentful of the President's attempt to suggest a settlement of any kind to prevent the strike."

Note also that this paragraph found no reflection in the headlines, which were not arranged to cover the contents of the article but were warped to produce a certain mental stimulus, an effect further emphasized by the selected paragraphs in large print.

During the steel strike such captions as the following were printed in the Pittsburgh dailies: "Pittsburgh Mills Running Full." They were not running full nor did a single paragraph in the article present a statement to that effect. On a certain day three dailies reported in big headlines that 8,000 men had gone back to work in the Cambria mill at Johnstown. A fourth, a little more enterprising, made it 10,000. By actual count the next day 900 men went through the gates to work. Almost daily the reading public was served to headlines of this type, which were not supported by facts in the columns or perhaps even a suggestive phrase. Propaganda rests more on reiteration than on truth. Keep up a line of lurid suggestion and truth can be defeated.

The "Desert Outrage"

For several days recently certain dailies published lurid reports of "the desertion of trains" by their crews at Needles and Las Vegas. We were told of hundreds sweltering in the torrid desert, of the hardships they endured, and especially of one old lady's plight. There was inconvenience of course, and it was not right to submit innocent travelers to the delay, but this serves as an excellent illustration of the way in which news can be turned into lurid propaganda. In the first place, both Needles and Las Vegas are pretty little cities where not only the railroad men but several hundred cultured families live the year around. At both places excellent accommodations are furnished travelers. There are good hotels and the detained travelers tell of how homes were opened to them.

The fact is that the trains were not "deserted" by their crews at all. These are division points and the train crews change. The crews coming on refused to take up the trains because of machine guns mounted in the shops with armed guards upon the trains and stationed about the tracks. The operating crews declared their presence was a danger to life and limb and refused to run the trains out. The claim may have been largely fictitious and the refusal a part of war tactics, but many passengers expressed sympathy for them and their revulsion at seeing peaceful railroad stations picketed by gun-men. With these facts in mind the reader may conclude that the railroad executives as well as the train crews had some responsibility in the matter. When certain executives asked the governor of Missouri for militia he told them guards would be sent where there was real trouble but that he was not out to help them win by use of the state troops. We understand that the "desert outrages" ceased and trains moved out, upon the withdrawal of the guns.

The story of the "aged" woman was so touching that a reporter hunted her up and obtained an interview. She seems to have been somewhat less perturbed than the headline writers. She said, "I cannot see why anyone should be interested in our little experience at Needles. We were held up a few days and some of us had to change our plans in consequence, but none of us underwent any suffering or perils." "Then you were not left to die out in the desert?" said the reporter. In answer she told of the excellent meals provided for them at the Harvey house, ices and cool drinks and all the rest; of the big hotel lobby, the lawns and open homes of the people, including those of striking railroad men. When asked how the passengers felt about the hold-up she replied, "O, they understood how it was. We all saw the armed guards with rows of cartridges strapped around them and guns at their side. We did not feel angry at the engineer. We all knew why he refused to go on."

Wrecks and Massacres

No more heinous thing could happen than the deliberate wrecking of trains and, as we have before written here, no more dastardly thing could happen, not even to labor's just cause, than such a crime as that at Herrin, Illinois. All good citizens desire to have the perpetrators of such crimes severely punished. But our interest here is to note the difference in news treatment given these crimes and those such as the Ludlow massacre and the more recent Bisbee deportation. Both of these were perpetrated upon strikers, and there have been no lurid and oft-repeated headlines nor have there ever been criminal sentences pronounced against the offenders. Judge and jury may appeal for a rehearing for Tom Mooney but he still languishes in prison. Only one side of the Centralia massacre has been given the public. When a prominent churchman who witnessed the Cleveland riot and shooting in 1919 asked a city editor why he did not tell the truth about it instead of giving a biased account, the editor replied frankly that truth was not needed—he was out to hang the radicals. There may be radicals who need hanging, but the public which hangs them without full and fair trial, in the face of the facts fully and fairly stated, overthrows its own institutions.

Recently a railroad executive announced that a certain shop was 96 per cent full, with competent men, and that the strike was over so far as he was concerned. In the very same issue of the daily quoting him was an explanation by another official that service could not be maintained because the aforesaid shop was able to turn out only one-third as many engines as before the strike. One railroad president told the press there was no shortage of cars or locomotives and that the trainmen's claim of danger because of poor equipment was strike propaganda. Within two days the Interstate Commerce commission verified the claims of rapidly deteriorating equipment. Almost daily some journals give statistics of more cars loaded and items of larger hauls made. Daily, too, travelers know of more and more late trains, of hundreds of cancelled schedules and of an increasing number of accidents. Recently a certain governor tried to mine coal with bayonets. He mined some fifty cars in two weeks, with a regiment of soldiers. Leaders on both sides may think that trains can be run with propaganda but the public will find it requires effective equipment and skilled men. There is no basis of equity, justice or peace except in the truth. We have a right to expect the daily press will give it to us.

British Table Talk

London, August 28, 1922.

SOME weeks ago I wrote for Outward Bound, a short meditation on the portrait of Michael Collins, one of a series of articles upon pictures. Sir John Lavery had painted this young Irish patriot, and his work impressed me as an example of the artist as historian. He was indeed recording for all time the face of Collins at one critical hour in his life. It never occurred to me that the hour which was seized in this way was near the end. It seemed rather as though such a man might have many days, and other adventures before him, so that the artist's report of him was but an interim report, but as it proved the picture shows the man as he left this scene, young, daring, powerful in his charm, gallant in his courage. Ireland has yet another tragedy ,and the man has fallen, not by the hand of any "foreign oppressor" but by the cruel fanaticism of his own race. The more we think upon the history of these later years in Europe and in Ireland most of all, the more convincing even on the ground of political wisdom seem the precepts of our Lord. But mankind seems agreed only to put them to the test as a last resort.
